THE PREACHER.

A DISCOURSE

Delivered at the Universalist Church, in Utica, on Christmas Eve, December 24th, 1836.

BY REV. DOLPHUS SKINNER.

Ladies and gentlemen of this respected auditory—I feel devoutly thankful to Almighty God for the glorious occasion and the happy privilege now granted unto us; and I feel truly grateful to you, collectively and individually, for the cheering and gratifying evidence, furnished by your attendance, of your kind and liberal and friendly feeling towards us and the object contemplated by this meeting.* And I devoutly pray that you may not have occasion to regret this expression of your liberality.

As it is doubtless expected and desired by the greater number who have favored us by their attendance this evening, that the principal part of the exercises of the evening shall consist of and be devoted to the concert of sacred music, I do not feel at liberty, so far to divert your attention from that object as to attempt any thing like a set discourse, or regular sermon. But deeming it not unsuited to the occasion, and hoping it may be neither unacceptable nor unprofitable to you, I shall attempt to make a few remarks adapted to the joyful anniversary on which we have met; and for this purpose, and to lead our minds into a suitable channel and train of reflections, I invite your attention to a passage of Holy Writ as my text, or motto. You will find it in John i: 18. "The only begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him."

Long had the dark night of ignorance, delusion and superstition hung over the moral world—long had darkness covered the earth and gross darkness the people. Jews and Gentiles appeared nearly on a par—both sunk into the most degraded ignorance and the most pernicious vices.—Though in former ages, God had at sundry times and in divers manners, spoken to the fathers of the Hebrew nation by his chosen and inspired prophets, yet those favored periods had long since passed by. For the space of about 400 years, no prophet had appeared on the theatre of Israel—no seer had lifted the curtain of futurity, nor revealed ought of the will or counsels of the Most High. The sacred urim and thummim no longer attested the presence of God in their sacrifices, his acceptance of their offerings upon the temple altar, or gave any other visible tokens that He was yet especially the God of Israel, or took the least notice of, or complacency in, their worship. They had, in fact become the degenerate plant of a strange vine—having polluted their souls by oppressing the poor and needy, stained their hands with the blood of innocence, "made void the law of God by their traditions," and "changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like unto corruptible man, and birds, and four footed beasts and creeping things," how truly and how sadly did they need the light of a new revelation! And that light, the most sensible and well informed of the Hebrew nation believed was about to dawn upon them. To them it was evident the time fixed by David and the other prophets for the "coming of the Just One and the glory that should follow," was at hand. Among their most learned Rabbins this opinion almost universally prevailed. Rabbi Ketina, cited in the Gamara, or Gloss of the Jewish Talmud, and Elias, a learned expositor of the prophets, both believed and taught that, as there were 2000 years previous to the law, so there would be 2000 years under the law, previous to the coming of Messiah—that the 2000 years under the law had about expired, and therefore the Lord of life and glory, it might be expected, would suddenly come to his temple, and the glory of the Highest once more overshadow them.

These high expectations were not only generally entertained among the Jews, but the most enlightened among the Gentiles were at this time, from some cause or other, either from traditions originally derived from revelation, or from their information of what the Jewish prophets had taught, or from the peculiar condition of the moral world at that time, led to believe that some extraordinary personage was about to make his appearance on earth. Hence the Magi, or wise men of the East, (as generally supposed, of Arabia Felix, formerly a part of the Persian dominion,) approached the city of Bethlehem at the period of Messiah's birth, inquiring for him who was born king of the Jews, in order to do him suitable homage.

The sun had ceased to gild the temple dome of the magnificent and proud city of Jerusalem, and the humbler spires and minarets of the lesser city of Bethlehem, and retired beyond the western hills—the laborer had ceased from the toils of the day, and sunk in the arms of midnight slumber—the bustle and noise at the inn of Bethlehem, where according to Cæsar's decree, the populace had been assembled during the day for civil enrolment, had gradually died away, as the wealthier and more opulent had taken possession of every room and every couch, and the humbler and poorer classes were compelled to retire to barns and hovels for shelter. All was darkness, save the twinkling light of the midnight stars that kept their centinel forever in the skies. All was silent as the house of death, save the rustling breeze, as the night winds of heaven, borne over the mountains and along the vallies of Israel, played through the groves of palm trees that waved at short intervals on Judea's lovely plains, occasionally interrupted by the dubious but hardly misgiving growl of the faithful watch-dog of the shepherds, attentive to their fleecy charge—when, suddenly as the lightning's flash, bursts on the astonished view of the trembling shepherds, an effulgence of light exceeding in brightness the mid-day sun, and a form celestial and dazzling hovers above them in mid-air, his shining apparel too brilliant for their feeble optics to look upon! Trembling and speechless with amazement and fear, they stand aghast, supposing the vision ominous of some dread calamity about to burst upon them—when the legate of the upper world, gently stooping to the capacity and circumstances of his auditors, in accents mild as the evening zephyr and sweet as the music of Paradise, breaks the silence and dissipates the agonizing suspense of the shepherds:—"Fear not: for, behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people. For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you, ye shall find the babe wrapt in swaddling clothes and lying in a manger." And, anon, the shining train above is increased from one to a vast multitude, come from the regions of glory to convoy and to witness the advent of the great Redeemer, and to clap their golden wings and tune their glad voices in the praise of almighty love, and all as one shout,

"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men!"

Their fears removed, their hearts reassured, glad hope revived in their so recently desponding souls, these now joyful shepherds, eagerly press their way to Bethlehem to witness the confirmation of the tidings they had heard, and to behold and welcome the glorious Messiah. When there arrived, behold, no splendid palace meets their view; no array of royal guards surround the youthful king; no array of haughty lords, and suppliant, cringing, sycophantic courtiers bow before him, to gain a smile, or secure a place; no glittering robes of royalty, nor costly gems adorn the person of the Holy One.

Tho' "angels revere him in slumbers reclining,
As Leader, and Monarch, and Saviour of all;"
Yet "cold in his cradle the dew-drops are shining,
And low lies his head with the beasts of the stall."

Before him bend in humble reverence the wise men of the East, to show mankind that the wisdom of this world must submit to the direction of the wisdom that cometh from above.

Such were the circumstances and manner of the advent to our world of the ever blessed Son of God, who came from the bosom of the Father, full of grace and truth, to be a light to lighten the Gentiles and the glory of the people Israel—the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world.

We will now briefly notice the object of our Saviour's advent. And here I shall be spared the necessity of any very protracted labor, touching this point, by the clear and direct information contained in the text. We are assured in the first part of the verse, and know also from the nature of the case, that "no man hath seen God at any time." Then follows the language, "The only begotten Son which is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him."

Thus the grand object of Messiah's advent was to declare the Father, or in other words, reveal to man, the true character, and sublime perfections, and glorious attributes of his Father and our Father, of his God and our God; and, through the medium of that revelation to enlighten the benighted, make wise the simple, reclaim the wandering, comfort the afflicted and save the lost of our race. In confirmation of this, we find Jesus, in the commencement of his public ministry, appropriating the words of Isaiah li: 1, 2, (see Luke iv: 18, 19,) to himself, "The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captive, the recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." Mankind had long been alienated from the life of God, as well through the ignorance that was in them as by wicked works; and neither the wisdom of Zoroaster, or Zeno, or Socrates, or Xenophon, or Plato, or Seneca, or the combined wisdom and philosophy of all, nor the degraded and corrupted traditions of the Jews, who had greatly corrupted the law, and lost sight of its spiritual instructions, were competent to impart any thing like just views or clear conceptions of the character of the great I AM. Nor especially was it in the power of any, or all these to impart to man the well founded hope of immortality, and give him the assurance of incorruptible and endless beatitude beyond the grave. But Messiah came to answer all these desirable ends.

He was the image of the invisible God—the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express

*A concert of sacred music was given in connexion with the other exercises of the evening, and the avails from the sale of tickets appropriated towards the liquidation of the church debt.

image of his person—and as he came to declare the Father, to bear witness to the truth, so may we expect to find in him, in his words, his instructions, his precepts, his example, his life, his character, his disposition, a true representation of the character and will of the Father. For the Father speaks to the world through him. What then were the illustrations and character which he gave of the Father? They were full of grace and truth. He declares that "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved."

In accordance with the exalted benevolence which God hath thus manifested to man, he exhorts his followers to love their enemies, bless those that curse them, do good to those that hate them, and pray for those who despitefully use and persecute them; and thus would they be imitators of that God who maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth his rain on the just and the unjust. He assures his followers that the kind, benignant and paternal care of God extended to all beings and all events, over the moral and the physical world, the animate and inanimate creation—that the very hairs of their heads were all numbered—that the sparrow falleth not to the ground without our Father's notice—that even the grass of the field and the lillies of the valley were clothed and beautified, and sustained by the munificent hand of God.

In apposition with this character which he ascribes to the Father, his own life, throughout, is employed constantly in acts of benevolence and mercy. Truly graphic is the description the apostle gives of him when he declares he went about doing good. How true to the life is this laconic delineation—"He went about doing good," restoring sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, speech to the dumb, sanity to the lunatic, soundness to the maimed and the halt, giving bread to the hungry, salvation to the lost and life to the dead. He restores to life the widow's son, of Nain, and gives him back to her aged arms, the stay and staff of her declining years, causing tears of joy to follow in quick succession the scalding tears of anguish which were fast coursing down her furrowed cheek. He weeps at the grave of Lazarus, mingling his tears with those of the disconsolate sisters, and then with the voice of celestial mercy calls the sleeper back to life, and gives him to the overjoyed embraces of the tearful Martha and Mary. He drops the tear of pity over the prospectively calamitous fate of the proud city of Jerusalem, and expresses for its inhabitants all that heartfelt pity and yearning tenderness felt by an affectionate parent towards a cherished but prodigal and ruined child. When the combined malice of Jews and Gentiles had conspired his death, and amid scoffs and insults lifted high on the ignominious cross of Calvary the innocent Jesus, the same holy and unconquerable love, the same god-like benevolence, still warmed and animated him; and lifting his meek and anguished eyes to heaven, his last breath is exhaled in the tender petition, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" In short, view him when and where we will, from the first to the last of his benevolent life, wherever misery had erected her ebony throne, or sorrow had planted her cruel thorn, wherever tears were flowing, or sighs were heaving, or affliction abiding, there was the merciful Jesus found, binding up the bleeding heart, and pouring the oil and wine of joy and consolation into the afflicted bosom of suffering humanity.

Most appropriately then, does the great Messiah bear the distinctive and honorable appellations conferred upon him by Holy Writ; as the faithful and true Witness, the bright and morning Star, the Sun of Righteousness, the Author and Finisher of faith, the Captain of Salvation, the Salvation of God to the ends of the earth, the Shiloh, the Shepherd, the Fountain to wash in, the Refiner and Purifier, the Physician, the Refuge for the weary, the Ensign for the people, the Bread of God that giveth life to the world, the Feast of fat things for all people, the Saviour of the world.

Such being the object of Messiah's advent, such the character ascribed to him in the sacred Scriptures, and such the conduct and disposition exhibited by him while on earth, we may exultingly say with the apostle, that "the grace of God which bringeth salvation to all men (et solentis pasin anthropois) hath appeared, teaching us, that, denying ungodliness and worldly desires, we should live soberly, righteously and religiously in this present world, looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ; who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." We may also feel assured that the work is in perfectly safe hands—that "the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hands—He shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied—He shall not fail nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth; and the isles shall wait for his law." "For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. Death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted who did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also, himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all."—In his victory over death he hath conquered the mightiest foe of man, brought life and immortality to light, and given us the pledge of final triumph over every enemy, assuring us that the time shall come when "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things are passed away."

In view of so grand a consummation we may well adopt (not to say the inspired, we will say) the inspiring language of the poet:—

"Then, then I rose. Then first humanity,
Triumphant passed the crystal ports of light—
Stupendous guest!—and seized eternal youth!—
Seized in our name. E'er since 'tis blasphemous
To call man mortal. Man's mortality
Was then transferred to Death, and Heaven's duration
Unalienably sealed to this frail frame—
This child of dust. Man, all immortal, hail!
Hail Heaven all lavish of strange gifts to man!
Thine all the glory—Man's the boundless bliss."

'Tis finished! yes, the glorious work is all complete!
Hail, all victorious Prince! on thee we wait.
Thou of the travail of thy soul shalt see,
And with thy work well satisfied shalt be.
The end shall come, when, to thy Father, thou Shalt reconcile and cause all things to bow;
When all authority shall be subdued,
And every son of Adam be renewed;
When Death, the last and mightiest foe of man,
Shall be destroyed, and sorrow, sin and pain,
No longer man shall hold in dreadful thrall,
But God, himself the King, be all in all.

This is the day our eyes have longed to see,
The day which through eternity shall be
With glory crowned. For this the God of love
For this the Prince of everlasting peace
Left the dear bosom of his Father's grace—
Down to this wretched earth his course he bent,
And to the sons of wo assistance lent,
Bore all their sorrows, took their sins away,
That he might lead them to eternal day;
For this does Gabriel clap his golden wings;
For this the heavenly host of angels sings,
"Fear not, ye sons of men, I bring to you Glad tidings of great joy: to all they're true;
For unto you, this day, I bring you word,
Is born a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord."
Glory to God be given in highest strains,
Good will on earth, and peace forever reigns.

INFALLIBILITY.—To adopt the doctrines of a pretended infallible church, in order that you may be free from doubt and error, is like putting out your eyes because you cannot find your way, or have been misled by a Jack-o'-Lantern.—Tin Trumpet.

This is the second of those two great commands, on which Jesus declares, "hang all the law and the prophets." Hence, it is a matter of the greatest importance that it should be properly understood, duly appreciated and punctually complied with. I may have misapprehended the true meaning and import of the above command; but my views upon the subject, such as they are, I freely submit to public examination, hoping, if wrong, to be corrected.

In the illustration of this divine command, it will, in the first place, become necessary to inquire, whom we are to consider our neighbors. A similar question was once proposed by a certain lawyer to our Saviour, and the answer returned, is contained and clearly illustrated in the parable of the good Samaritan—Luke x: 30-35. But, after all, the answer seems not to be very generally understood, particularly by those who say, "stand by thyself; come not near to me, for I am holier than thou."

In the parable referred to, the self-conceited and self-righteous lawyer, whose Jewish education had induced him to believe, that he could fulfil all the requirements of the divine law, while the fell spirit of hatred and cruelty wrangled in his proud breast toward other nations, was clearly taught, that the despised and persecuted Samaritan, who was supposed by the bigoted Jews to be possessed of demons, was really and truly his neighbor; and he was constrained to acknowledge the humiliating fact on the spot. Hence, the answer to the question we are considering, is plainly as follows. "Every individual is our neighbor, to whom we have an opportunity of doing good." So says Alexander Cruden, in defining the word neighbor, as it is used in the above command. I might enlarge upon this part of my subject, but its plainness renders it unnecessary; I will therefore dismiss it.

Having arrived at the conclusion, that all human beings are our neighbors, it is proper to inquire, in the second place, what is to be understood by the command, to "love thy neighbor as thyself"? Jesus certainly meant something by this command, and we are anxious to learn what it was, and the following brief remarks will, therefore, be directed to this end.

Did our Saviour mean to be understood as commanding us to love our neighbors as well as we love ourselves? Taking it for granted that this is the true intention of the command, many feel justified in questioning the authority and truth of revelation. They contend that the command to love our fellow-beings, enemies and all, as well as ourselves, is not only unreasonable but absolutely preposterous; and that, to be prepared to comply with it, we must be divested of every particle of human nature. But I am inclined to think, that such persons have taken that for granted, which cannot be proved. What authority have we for believing, that the command we are examining requires us to love our neighbors as well as we love ourselves? I contend that the Scriptures furnish no such authority. We are required to love our fellow-beings, even our enemies. This requirement is reasonable and practicable, and a cheerful compliance with it, is the only way in which we can render ourselves happy, and promote the improvement and happiness of others. This requirement is not only reasonable, and consistent with the best affections of our nature, and the most exalted enjoyment of the intellectual world, but it is sanctioned by the repeated declarations of Christ and the apostles. But, if I have not greatly mistaken the meaning of the command, all our Saviour intended to require, was, that we should cherish and manifest toward our fellow humanity, the same kind of affection and tender regard, that we feel for ourselves; but not in the same degree, for this is manifestly impossible. Thus it may be perceived, that we can love our neighbors as we love ourselves, without loving them as well as we love ourselves; and this will render the command of Jesus reasonable, and also consistent with the intuitive principles of human nature.

I look upon the phraseology of this command in the same light that I do upon several other commands recorded in the New Testament. I will notice but one. In Matt. v: 48, Jesus says to his disciples, "Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect." Now, no person of good, common sense, and whose head has not been turned round by the raging blasts of fanaticism, would suppose for a moment, that Jesus meant to require of his disciples the same degree of moral perfection that God possessed; for it would have been requiring of them an infinite impossibility. But he could reasonably have required of them to maintain the same kind of perfection in their finite sphere, as God maintains in his infinite sphere. Noah, Job, David, and several others, are represented in the Scriptures as being "perfect"; but facts clearly prove that their perfection had not attained the highest degree, for they were but men, after all.

But I will not multiply words upon this subject; suffice it to say, if we love our fellow beings with the same kind of affection that we cherish for ourselves, we shall never knowingly injure them; but on the contrary, we shall ever strive to do them good under all circumstances of life. Yes; we shall ever stand ready to "do unto others as we would that others should do unto us," under an exchange of circumstances—we shall ever "seek peace and pursue it." All this we can do; all this we are bound to do; all this it is reasonable and just we should do. Let us not quarrel about the degree of affection which we are commanded to exercise toward our "neighbors"; let us be sure to cherish and exercise the right kind of affection towards them, and union, peace and joy will forever flow, till "this mortal shall put on immortality," and love immortal, love infinite, love impartial, encircles all, and fills every soul in the universe of God with unending joy and gladness.

GALATIANS III: 21.

BY REV. C. BINGLEY BROWN.

"Is the law then, against the promises of God? God forbid."

Whatever is contained in the promises of God, is not subject to be rendered null and void, or be in the least diminished by the law. On the other hand, the divine promises do not make void the law, but do in fact establish the law.—Says the blessed Jesus, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil—for verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot, or one tittle, shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled." Matt. v: 17, 18.

The promises alluded to in the passage that heads this article, were those made to Abraham, see 16th verse. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made; he saith not and to seeds, as of many, but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ." What were these promises? God said to Abraham, "I will make thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great, and thou shalt be a blessing, and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee, shall all families of the earth be blessed." Here, all the families of the earth are embraced. This promise was renewed to Isaac in Gen. xxvi: 3, 4—"I will perform the oath which I swore unto Abraham, thy father.—And I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and will give unto thy seed all these countries; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." How extensive—"All the nations of the earth"! The confirmation of this promise to Jacob, is recorded Gen. xxviii: 13, 14. "I am the Lord God of Abraham, thy father, and the God of Isaac; the land whereon thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed; and thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth; and thou shalt spread abroad to the west and to the east, and to the north and to the south: and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed." The blessing promised to all the nations and families of the earth, is justification through faith. "And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel to Abraham, saying, in thee shall all nations be blessed." Again—"He was delivered for our offences, and raised again, for our justification." Peter, in allusion to these promises, (Acts iii: 25,) says, "ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, and in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed." Here, all the kindreds of the earth are included—and where is the individual who is not a kindred of the earth? "Dust thou art."

These "exceeding great and precious promises," the apostle says, the law is not against. He moreover calls it a covenant confirmed of God in Christ. "Now, this I say, that the covenant that was confirmed of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect." Now, common opinion supposes that the promises of God are confirmed by certain conditions to be performed by the creature. This was not the sentiment of Paul. He says they are confirmed in Christ, and that which these promises contain, he calls an inheritance. This is an inheritance "undefiled and that fadeth not away."

How consoling to the Christian is the fact, that the law is not against the promises of our heavenly Father—that after all the threatenings of the law are executed, after the whole law is fulfilled in every "jot and tittle," the great Creator will retain his unpurchased, unconditional, boundless and changeless love for all his intelligent offspring—fulfil his glorious promises, and give to a ransomed world a crown of immortality and eternal life. Hence the law is our "schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, that we may be justified by faith." Thus the law and the promises harmonize, doing good, to the same subjects, each in its respective way. The opinion therefore, that the law demands the endless damnation of the sinner, under any circumstances, is not a Scripture doctrine; for surely such a doctrine would set the law and promises at eternal variance, and place our Father in heaven in a situation where his purposes, either in his law or in his promises, must be eternally frustrated.

Brethren and sisters, upon the immutable rock of the glorious promises of God, let our faith and our hope rest, remembering, at the same time, that in order for us fully to realize the benefits of this precious faith, it must work in our hearts a conformity to its divine principles—it must lead us to love our enemies, bless those that curse us, do good to those that hate us, and pray for those that despitefully use and persecute us; thus imitating our heavenly Father and thereby becoming characteristically his children.

A CHAPTER,

FOR THOSE WHO KEEP AWAY FROM CHURCH.

Among the keepers-at-home on Sunday, there is every variety of situation and character which marks any other large class of society. And like every other class they have their respective social and moral habits, and their appropriate employments. It is proposed, therefore, in this short essay, to give them such advice as may suit their several circumstances. It may neither be very interesting nor amusing; but if it meets the case only of a few, and relieves the monotony of what to many is a day of weariness, our end is answered.

1. The first variety is the sleepers. These may not be the most numerous, but they are the most effectually beyond the reach of advice or cure. For it is extremely difficult to disturb their slumbers without exciting their indignation; and it is nearly as hopeless an undertaking to reason with an angry person as with one asleep—and not half as comfortable. We propose, then, that the Magazine and Advocate be sent so as to reach them by the Saturday's mail, and that our essay be read to them, or by them, either before, or immediately after breakfast. Because at that important point of time, it is quite common for most people to be awake. Our advice to them is, that they sleep as soundly over their worldly affairs, as over those involving their moral and religious interests. By so doing, they will soon be able to ascertain the importance of keeping awake, at least a part of even Sunday. And from this lesson, they may possibly learn that their moral interests may as certainly become perplexing by neglect, as their temporal. We would further urge the question upon their consideration, whether if they sleep all day, it may not prevent quiet and comfortable rest during the night?

2. Another variety is the weary. These are not numerous, since by far the most industrious portion of every community, are also in general the most faithful and constant attendants on church. And with few exceptions, they are fatigued at the end of the week, not because they have done too much, but because they have done too little. A little consequently wearies them. We advise such to be as moderate and temperate in relaxation, as in toil. For they should remember that even rest may be excessive—like eating too much when hungry. And as a remedy against too great indulgence, it is proposed that they attend meeting—a remedy which has been attended with the best effects, in a number of similar and very obstinate cases.

3. The third variety is the unwell. They are not only numerous, but comprise a monstrous complication of ailments. Happily, none of them is mortal, and they seldom last over Sunday.—But they are distressing enough to every body except those who complain of the diseases. Our advice to them is—let every man get up on Sunday morning in season to wash and shave himself before breakfast—and every woman, in time to prepare the coffee. And then, when comfortably refreshed, let them ask themselves, if they are not well enough to perform all their ordinary week-day business, and whether they would not go about it without complaining? Let them answer it to their conscience—for it is presumed they have one—whether it is more laborious to walk or ride to church, than it would be to travel four times that distance to make a bargain involving fifty cents, or for a visit of ceremony. Our word for it, if these questions were regularly and honestly answered, and our advice in general adopted, it would, in a few months at most, banish almost entirely from the Christian world, a host of headaches, bad colds, liver complaints, weak eyes, weak nerves, and possibly weak moral feelings.

Nothing in the foregoing chapter is intended to have any bearing upon those who, at any time, or on any occasion, can make an apology for staying at home, of which they are not themselves ashamed.

A WORD TO THE WISE.

"Forsake not the assembling of yourselves together as the manner of some is."—Bible.

When I see people professing great love for the truth, absenting themselves from the house of worship whenever the preacher happens to be a man of humble circumstances in life, though of good moral and intellectual qualifications, I am led to ask myself the question,—Do such people really love the truth, or do they think more of the "outside of the cup," than its contents? Give me the waters of life, and I care not whether it be served to me in a golden pitcher, or a tin cup, provided it be clean and sufficient for the purpose. I care not if the preacher be a good man and tell a good story, whether he ride in a gilded coach or whether he come "riding on an ass' colt." And such, I apprehend, will be the feelings of every consistent

A VOICE TO YOUTH.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

INTRODUCTION.

Early youth is justly considered the most interesting and important, yet dangerous period of human existence. It is interesting, because of the innocence, the hilarity, and the zest for enjoyment, which is then evinced. The mind, like the morning flower, at this period, begins more fully to open its leaves to be impressed with the enlivening rays of the sun of knowledge, and evinces by the gradual development of its powers, that its possessor belongs to a grade of beings vastly more elevated than the brute creation. Youth is the most important time of life, inasmuch as the habits then begin to lay their foundations—the character commences its formation, and the occupation is to be chosen—upon which depend mainly, the enjoyments and prosperity of after life. And it is the most dangerous period, because, ardent, volatile, inexperienced, and thirsting for happiness, the young are exceedingly liable to be seduced into wrong paths—into those fascinating, but fatal ways, which lead to degradation and wretchedness. It is at this season, that the sports and amusements of childhood, lose their charm and their influence. Childish things are put away, and there commences a desire, and a looking up, for more mature, yet more dangerous sources of enjoyment.

As the gallant bark leaves the secure haven to go out upon the bosom of the mighty deep, with its snow white sails spread to the inviting wind, its broad flag and gay streamers floating in air—bounding o'er the billows "as a thing of life," and wholly unconscious that Ocean, in its far regions, is nursing the whirlwind and the storm—so youth launches upon the vast sea of life, decked with the gay fancies of the bright morning of existence; spreads the wide expanded sails of hope, and faith would believe that an ever-favoring breeze will speedily waft to prosperity and peace. But the young should be aware that, as the wide waste of waters is ploughed into the mountain wave by the fury of the wind, so life is often beset by the howling tempest of misfortune; and that upon the one, as upon the other, unless they are guided by the pilots, wisdom and discretion, shipwrecked hopes and blasted anticipations must ensue.

Young ladies and young gentlemen—I crave your attention for a short season, from time to time, as I proceed in a series of Essays, on a variety of subjects intimately connected with your welfare and happiness. Will you lend me a listening ear? Will you occasionally devote an hour, to hear what I have to offer upon topics, which you will acknowledge are of the utmost importance to your peace and prosperity? Come, sit down with me, and in a friendly manner, we will converse upon those things which pertain to your future success in life. I am aware that, upon the ears of some youth, the word advice grates harshly. But I attribute this dislike more to the improper manner in which they have been instructed, than to any natural bias. Parents and instructors often seem to imagine there is no method to advise the young, but in the harsh tones of reproof and upbraiding. And the effect of such a course, is to harden those whom they would benefit, and cause them to dislike every thing which comes in the form of counsel. Advice, to be effectual, must be clothed in words of affection and kindness, and accompanied with a tender regard for the feelings of those to whom it is tendered; and it should be given in such manner as not to imply the degradation of those who are its objects. In this manner, I think it can not truly be said, that, as a general rule, youth are averse to counsel. Nevertheless, it is well known that one of the common failings of the young, is to be wise in their own conceit—to imagine they can get along quite well of themselves, and that they can discover coming evils and avoid them, as readily as their elders in life. This wisdom, however, is of a premature growth, and generally passes away as age advances; but often, not until it has involved its possessor in trouble and misfortune, which sometimes extend through life. Hence have arisen those common sayings, that youth is wiser at fifteen than at thirty—i. e. in its own estimation—and that the first indication of true wisdom in the young, is, their ascertaining and acknowledging how little they do, in reality, know.

Listen! You desire to be happy—you thirst for enjoyment. This is natural, and it is proper. God has designedly implanted this desire within you, and he is perfectly willing that you should gratify it in the proper manner! But, remember that in this, as in every thing else, there is a right way and a wrong way, to accomplish your object. If you adopt the right way, the desired good is speedily obtained and enjoyed. But if, unhappily, you select the wrong way, so far from securing the wished for happiness, you will reap nought but misfortune, degradation and wretchedness. And in pursuing this wrong course, however you may imagine, for a season, under the fascinations which evil often assumes, that you have found the real enjoyment desired, you will ere long discover—and often too late—that you have embraced a gilded shadow, filled with human woe, while the actual good is far from you. You can but perceive, therefore, the critical condition in which you stand, and the importance and necessity of obtaining counsel in regard to your future conduct.

Were you about to travel into a far land, a stranger to the way, and though conscious that your course would be surrounded by innumerable dangers, yet ignorant of their nature and of the best means to avoid them, how anxious would you be to obtain information and advice! Prudence, and the desire of self-preservation, would dictate the propriety of seeking some individual who had travelled the road, or the most dangerous portions of it, and of obtaining his instruction in relation to the nature and situation of the dangers, and his advice regarding measures to escape them. And what is life, but a journey to a distant clime, upon an untried highway? This important journey the young are just commencing. Undoubtedly, in the exuberance of youthful fancy, all appears fair and bright before you. Vivid imagination strews your pathway with the gayest and sweetest flowers of existence. How bright and beautiful is the future pictured to the young mind! No clouds or darkness intervene to throw a shade of sadness on the fair prospect of youth's morning.

"Gay are the flowers without a thorn,
And bright the hues of opening day:
Wild music lingers in its bowers—
Grateful the fragrance of its flowers—
And all betoken bliss.
Hope weaves her wild enchanting song,
And sings at every path along,
That all shall be like this."

But notwithstanding the captivating visions of the imagination, and the sweet whisperings of hope, you well know that your way will be beset by many, many dangers. Appearances are often very deceitful. "Poisonous berries frequently look tempting to the appetite—ice, when it sometimes seems sound, if ventured upon, will break, and let him who is daring into the waters—and the wise man says, that 'wine, when it giveth its color in the cup, at the last biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.'" The rose grows in close proximity to the thorn, and beneath the fairest flowers, sometimes nestle the poisonous reptile and the venomous scorpion. Permit not, then, the beauty in which your fancy paints the future, to lull you into false security in respect to the dangers which that future conceals, or to the necessity of guarding yourselves against them. It rather becomes your safety and interest, as well as duty, to seek diligently for all the instruction and knowledge which can throw light upon your way, in the intricate and uneven windings of earthly existence.

Are additional inducements necessary to cause you to listen to counsel and admonition? Look abroad into the world. Here is an individual who enjoys the respect and confidence of community. The aged venerate him, and "the young rise up and call him blessed." He has no enemies—all are his friends—all confide in him, all know him. How has he obtained this universal esteem?—how has he ascended this eminence of respect? In seeking for happiness, he consulted the experience of those who had travelled before him—he studied the history of his race, and marked where others had failed, that he might avoid their errors—he listened patiently to words of advice, and in this way, found the true path and faithfully pursued it, and is now enjoying the prosperity and peace to which it conducts. But another picture presents itself for our contemplation. There is a man whose condition is directly the reverse. He is shunned and despised by all around him. Not because he is poor; but because his poverty has been caused by profligacy and vice. The good avoid him as a moving pestilence—the virtuous point to him as a warning to their children of the sad effects of iniquity—and even his vicious companions are ashamed of him. Follow him in his miserable career. He mingles with the refuse, the outcasts of society; for they alone will become his associates—he becomes familiar with the alms-house, the penitentiary, and finally ends his days in ignominy upon the gallows! Is it not important to inquire into the cause of the disparity between the condition of this man, and of the other, whom we noticed? How did he become involved in so much infamy and wretchedness? Was it his own choice?—did he desire and seek degradation and ruin? No. In the outset of life, his desires were as those of the youth who is now perusing these lines. He wished to enjoy himself through life, precisely as you do. He intended to take the best measures to accomplish this desire, as is now undoubtedly your determination—and he no more foresaw or expected that he should end his days in infamy, the object of scorn and disgust, than are such thoughts now dwelling in your mind. But, alas! he selected the wrong path! He deemed himself very wise—he knew much better than others in more advanced life, where and how he could obtain true enjoyment—he desired no light or instruction upon this subject—he turned an ear deaf as the adder's, to all the counsel, the advice and admonition of parents, relatives, friends—and with headstrong and willing blindness, strided on in that way which eventually involved him in the vortex of disgrace and ruin! Do you desire your condition to become like his? No—no—say one and all! And yet it amounts almost to a certainty, that such, or similar, will be your condition, if you imitate his example in the commencement of life. But that example, I trust, you have no desire to follow; but rather are more wisely inclined to obtain all the information in your power on those subjects connected intimately with your welfare and happiness.

Hearken, then, to one who, though comparatively not far advanced in years, yet may be considered past the most dangerous period of youth—one who has mixed not a little with the world—tasted of its sweets and its bitter—been a learner in the school of experience, and as usual, paid dearly for some of the knowledge which he has thus obtained—and who, not having yet, by reason of age, lost the vivid impressions thus stamped upon his mind, is enabled more readily to appreciate the peculiarities of your situation, and to realize to a good degree, the nature of the dangers around you. I would speak to you as a brother—I would warn, advise, and counsel, as one deeply interested in your welfare and prosperity. I have no wish to deprive you of a single enjoyment, that is proper for you, as intellectual and moral beings—and surely as wise youth, you can desire to participate in none other. I shall make no efforts to frighten you into compliance with the advice imparted; but shall appeal exclusively to your reason, your good sense, to convince you of the propriety of doing that which will enhance your respectability and true happiness, and of avoiding those things which will involve you in disgrace and wretchedness—that, if possible, I may benefit those whom I address.

In carrying my design into execution, I shall first address both sexes indiscriminately, upon those subjects in which it may be supposed they are mutually interested. In the next place, my remarks will be confined exclusively to those topics which pertain to young men. And lastly, the young ladies will be addressed.

SYMPATHY.

—BY REV. MOSES BAILLOU.

Perhaps there is no principle of the human mind more universal in its influence, than that of SYMPATHY. Pervading all ranks, ages, and conditions; from the king to the beggar; the world of mankind, all in a greater or less degree, seem to bow to its influence. Accuse us, if you please, of being selfish beings, it matters not. I care not how well mankind may love self; place human misery before them, and as a general thing, contagion-like it infects the whole within its reach. Indeed we cannot believe that there is a being in the wide world, so totally dead to all the finer sensibilities of our nature, as to be wholly insensible to the welfare of all others. God has created man in his own image, and likeness, and made “of one blood, all nations of men that dwell on the face of the earth,” and this spiritual image must become totally extinct,—those principles which he has implanted in our nature must be forever blotted out, and every thing that binds us together as social beings, must be destroyed, before the sympathies of our common nature will cease to exert their irresistible influence! It is human nature to laugh when others laugh, to weep when others weep, to rejoice when others rejoice, and to mourn when others mourn: and this common bond, that links us together as children of the same family—as beings of the same form and image—as creatures deriving their existence from the same source, and dependent upon the same Power for protection; must be forever sundered, before we can be wholly insensible with regard to the ill or well-being of each other.

We see this principle exhibited every day of our lives. The first greeting when we meet, is to inquire for the welfare of each other. Separate kindred or friends for even a day, and when met again, how quick is the query instituted by each, concerning the well-being of the other; and I have often reiterated the sentiments of a brother, by saying, that this chain of sympathy, which runs through the human family, connecting Adam with his latest posterity—encircling in one common bond the human race, is so strong and indissoluble, that the ultimate happiness or misery of a single individual, will be felt in a greater or less degree by all! That whatever may be our final destiny, “come weal come wo,” it must be shared alike by all the human family! The God of nature has so formed us, that it is utterly impossible for a curse to fall upon one, and not involve others in wretchedness. Every being in the wide world, if not a parent, is at least a child; therefore if everlasting harm falls on a single soul, then is a parent left to mourn! Hence,—

Tenth, or ten thousandth, breaks the chain alike.”

On this very ground, of the relationship in which we stand to each other, constituting us with mutual wants, and mutually dependent, is founded all those Scripture exhortations to the practice of love and good will to each other. On this very principle, is reared all social obligation, and social duty. “Be ye followers of God as dear children”; “deal justly, love mercy;” “Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you,” etc. All those requisitions owe their origin and propriety to the fact, that we have a common interest—that we have no separate good, but mutually partake of each other's joys and sorrows—that we cannot afflict another without injuring ourselves; or raise another's burthen without lightening our own!

Let us now, for a moment, contrast this principle with its opposite. Take that individual, for instance, who cultivates the social, benevolent, and sympathetic feelings of our nature the most of any one;—who is ever engaged in deeds of charity and love—who will not permit the suffering poor to go unfed from his door, or the naked to endure the storms defenceless—whose eye of pity weeps at the woes of suffering humanity, and who is ever ready to rejoice when others are happy. Take for instance, a Howard—that ministering angel who spent a life in deeds of kindness and philanthropy—he who entered the hovels of penury and wo, as the minister of good—who sought out the dens of the vicious, the debauchee, the dissipated, the profligate and abandoned, and gently taking them by the hand, led them back to the paths of virtuous obedience and enjoyment. Human suffering touched the fibres of his soul! Human wo wrung tears from his heart! Human misery brought him anguish, and human happiness yielded him joy! Other's bliss was his heaven; other's misery his hell! Now the world will all agree in awarding such a one the highest seat in the scale of human goodness, and is just the character which the Gospel aims at forming. This principle we are taught to look upon as God-like and good, and is the only spirit that God's laws justify us in exercising.

Take now, for comparison, the opposite character—that being if you can find him, who seems to have lost all sympathy for the human race—a perfect misanthrope, who lives in the narrowness of his own contracted soul—look unmoved upon the groans of the wretched—who can apparently laugh at human wo, and mock at human anguish! We will name for instance, a Nero; who could regale himself with his music, with the dying moans of anguish that rose from his burning victims, as an accompaniment! What does the same tribunal say of him? Why we all know that his very name, that stands as a plague spot upon the records of the past, is reflected on only with feelings of horror! The united voices of heaven and earth, or God and man, thunder forth the sentence of condemnation against such a spirit! An unholy monster who might well shame the most brutal savage that treads the forest! Why? Answer. Not only for his insensibility to the happiness of his fellow-beings, but mostly for his apparent delight in human suffering. Now, we repeat, that the sacred laws of God most pointedly condemn the indulgence of such a spirit, and all are ready to couple its possessor with the fiends of darkness! A Howard's spirit is holy and God-like—a Nero's demoniac and fiend-like! The laws of Jehovah call upon us for the possession of the one, and the sacrifice of the other! Here we have one awfully important question to ask, and we beg the reader to ponder it well. Which of these characters are the ransomed to possess in the regions of immortal life and glory? A correct answer to this will determine the truth or falsity of the doctrine which teaches the final, and hopeless misery, of a part of the human family. When we are raised from the dead and clothed upon with immortality, so that our situation will be fixed for the long ages of eternity, are we there to possess a spirit which the God of heaven and earth condemns as demoniac here? If not, it is idle as the wind to talk of endless suffering for a portion of the human race, and endless happiness for the remainder! Can a Howard in heaven be happy, when viewing the miseries of those wretched beings in hell for whose temporal woes he wept and suffered here? Can a Saviour view unmoved, the undying agonies of those in eternity, for whose salvation and happiness he poured out his life's blood a sacrifice here? If so, (God forgive the thought!) in which place will he possess the better spirit? In which place will he be obedient to God's holy law, which required universal love? Will God permit the dominant spirit which characterises the inhabitants of heaven to be such as we now attribute to the fiends of darkness? Either this must be true, or the doctrine of the endless misery of a part of the human race false! I see no possible method under heaven of avoiding this conclusion, and I would merely add—if this be true, that all the love and sympathy I now bear for my kindred must be blasted and withered before I am fitted for a state of immortal glory—if all the finer feelings of my nature—all that now renders me worthy of existence—all that refines and elevates, or that I can claim as God-like and good—all, in fact that I possess that is worthy of a resurrection—if all these must be frozen up in perpetual congelation on their passage thither—or if they must be exchanged for those principles that are demoniac and fiend-like, in order to fit me for the society of kindred spirits that there inhabit; then I would pray God, if it were with my dying breath, to bar me forever from the gates of heaven!! Give me any corner of the universe, be it ever so dreary; there let me wander forever alone, but spare, O spare me, gracious Heaven, the little goodness I now possess! Give me love for my kindred—love for my friends—love for the human race, and love for all that is God-like in man, and hell, in possession of these, would rather be chosen than the Pharisee's heaven, where I must live without them! Such, Br. Grosh, though perhaps expressed in strong language, are nevertheless, the deep and heart-felt sentiments of thy friend and brother.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 6, 1837.

VOLUME EIGHT.

This number commences a new volume, and the second year of our labors as publishers. Custom requires some remarks on future prospects and purposes.

In our Prospectus we promised less than we expected to perform. We now can say, that instead of “about fifty regular and occasional correspondents,” we think the interest and instruction of our columns will be usefully varied by the labors of about ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY brethren and sisters, most of them well known to our readers, and all, able to aid greatly in the cause of mental and religious improvement.

The deeply interesting and important Essays by Br. J. M. Austin, (“A Voice to Youth,” commenced in this paper,) on the habits of thought and conduct, and social and religious principles and obligations of young gentlemen and ladies, can not fail to be valuable, not only to those addressed, but also to parents, guardians, and all interested in the welfare of the present generation.

Extensive preparations have been commenced for the production of a cheap, comprehensive, explanatory Commentary on the New Testament, for the use of “the common people”; the most interesting and useful portions of which will appear in our columns, commencing at some period within the present volume. (Care will be taken not to overload, but agreeably to diversify, our pages with this work—and yet have the portions published, complete and full in themselves.) Many of the ablest brethren in the denomination, have engaged in this work, and more are yet expected to engage in it. When the plan is fully matured, its details, and the names of these brethren, will be made known. We mention it here, only, because this undertaking may prevent the able author of Notes on Sacred Subjects from immediately proceeding with his Essays to teach children how to think on moral and religious subjects, and aid parents in their educational duties. But the Commentary will certainly be commenced in the present volume—perhaps the Essays also.

The Essays on the Evidences of Christianity, by Br. S. R. Smith, will be commenced within the first quarter of this volume. Intended as they are, to show Par-alist Christians their inability to defend their views of Christianity against skepticism, because of the doctrines so inconsistent with nature, reason and revelation, which they have incorporated with the Gospel—and, at the same time, expose the futility and groundlessness of the objections urged by skeptics, when the Gospel is presented as held by Universalists—these Essays will supply a long desired and much needed work in the religious world, which can not but be very useful to the three great classes here named.

The prize Tales and Essays (with others that will enter into the competition), which we are confident of yet receiving, worthy of the several premiums offered, will also interest and instruct all classes of our readers, and much enhance the literary merit of our paper.

In addition to all these, a friendly discussion of Universalism between Br. D. Skinner and Rev. Alexander Campbell, will soon be commenced in our columns, with a statement of all the particulars leading thereto. Br. Skinner is already so well and favorably known to our readers, that we need only speak of his opponent. Mr. Campbell is the founder of the sect known by his name—the author of a new translation of the New Testament—Editor of the Millennial Harbinger, (in which the discussion will also appear,) published in Bethany, Va.—and the opponent, if not conquerer, of the champion of skepticism, Robert Owen, in a discussion held a few years since in Cincinnati, Ohio. Do we err in promising ourselves much pleasure and profit from a friendly discussion by two such men? We think not.

Had we nothing in expectancy but these subjects, we should feel that we had done enough to render our paper all our subscribers will ask. But in addition to all here named, we will add, the articles of the several Editors in the editorial department—special care in the selection of miscellaneous articles—good paper, good typography, and a faithful discharge of all our publishing duties—the enlistment of new correspondents, from time to time, as they may be needed, and every labor and means in our power, to render still more useful and interesting the paper over which we preside. We may fail; for we are but fallible after all, and events to come, who can wholly control or avoid! But, by the blessing of our heavenly Father, and the assistance of our co-Editors, numerous correspondents, agents and friends, we hope to deserve success. Should we fail, we labor for Universalists, who measure deeds by intentions.

Such are our means, our purposes, our hopes for the present volume. We state them not in the way of boasting, but in that frank and friendly confidence which we wish ever to maintain with those on whose support we are so dependant for means to carry our plans into effect. We believe the support we receive demands our endeavors to please and benefit—our frankness and confidence. And we also believe (and say it in the same honest frankness,) that the above plans merit an increase of the generous support and confidence hitherto received, to carry them into effect. Should our friends not succeed in their efforts to increase this support, they, too, labor for Universalists, who take the will for the deed.

Thankful for the approvals of our past course, already received to cheer our labors during the year before us, and for the attention manifested to our wants—and devoutly praying for the blessing of God on our labors, our correspondents, agents, subscribers, and the cause in which we are engaged, and through it, on the world, we begin THE LABORS OF THE YEAR. A. B. G.

THE NEW YEAR.

Readers of religious journals are generally duly admonished on the importance and necessity of commencing each new year, with new determinations to give more attention to the subject of religion, and the practice of its duties. And presuming that those who have any wish to understand these subjects, are well informed respecting them, it is proposed that something more substantial than mere resolutions be done in the premises. This “resolving, and re-resolving” leaves many both to live and to die the same as though no such resolutions were ever made. What is about to be proposed, may add very little to the stock of human knowledge—but if duly applied to practice, will greatly increase the sum of Christian virtue and social happiness. And if any man doubts this—let him by all means make the experiment.

1. We earnestly recommend to all good Christians, without distinction of sect, to commence the present year, not only with the determination to attend to their own immediate concerns—but actually to do so. One effectual effort is worth a thousand resolutions—as one year of such application will be found productive of more useful results, than seventy spent in digesting plans, and prognosticating conclusions. It is true, that this course would send great numbers from the fields of romance and speculation—from the regions of fancy and of visions, home to the sober realities of common life, and common business. But it will compensate them well—it will give substantial independence where there is more show than reality, more tinsel than wealth; and decent and comfortable competence where there is much real want, suffering and repining. And one important relative consequence would immediately follow—the vexatious distinctions which exist in society, and which are so tormenting to the envious, and so gratifying to those who have the means, or the ingenuity to keep up appearances, would be gradually done away. And while there would be more useful industry, there would be also much less gossip and less crime.

2. It is further recommended to all Christians, constantly to recollect, that there are other persons in this wicked world, besides their dear individual selves—and that however expedient and proper it may be for them to know and do their own business, it should never be done in so selfish a manner, as to exclude all others from any kind of notice or attention. It is too common to neglect one duty under the pretence of performing another. But there is both time and opportunity to observe and do every one—if we will but attempt one at a time. In your intercourse and business transactions with your neighbors, keep constantly in mind, that they have the same common rights as yourselves. And that while it may be lawful for you to live by a bargain—others ought not to apprehend their own death by making one with you. And we cannot but think, that the present year furnishes a fair occasion for putting your moderation to the test, when high prices and scarcity of cash, constitute the order of the day.

But you are entreated to take another view of this subject. Some people seem to think it impossible to be sociable without neglecting their business. Can they suppose that we were made capable of employment and of social intercourse, only that one, or the other, should be neglected? No—our social feelings were evidently given us, that our seasons of relaxation from toil might be made comfortable by the interchange of civilities, and the reciprocation of friendships. And to withdraw oneself from society, because we would be industrious, is to become supremely selfish. It is to circumscribe our world to the dimensions of a study, a counting house, a work shop or a farm; and to concentrate the little all of humanity within the cogitations of a mind, by far too small to fill even that little space. The feelings of such men—but we beg pardon, such human silk-worms have no social feelings, nor the common sympathies with the race of man—they only feel the difference between loss and gain. And if you would not gradually sink into that character, so arrange your business, that you can at least, spend an occasional hour—or now and then one of the long Winter evenings in social converse with your neighbors. It will humanise your hearts—liberalise your minds, and possibly improve your morals and your understandings.

3. It is recommended to those who make any pretences to religion, to carefully avoid a total indifference to the subject on one hand, and too much fire, and fury, and noise on the other. Both are destructive of the purity, consistency and prosperity of Christianity. If you are so cold and dead as never to give any attention to the subject when you can possibly avoid it, you may rest assured that there are those who will set you down as part Heathen, or half infidel. But if you should take upon you to rouse up and act—do not run mad, and abuse your neighbors because they may happen not to be as mad as yourselves. There is one ready way by which the proper medium may be preserved—it is by acting as reasonably, as the religion of the Gospel is reasonable. By doing this, you will avoid the hundred night meetings of the Winter, and the consequent apathy of Summer. As the world now goes, most professors have quite too much religion either for their own comfort, or that of others, for about half the year—and by far too little during the remainder. So that between the lack and the superabundance, they get little time, and feel even less inclination to carry into practice the morality which is the true test of a sound faith, and a useful life. Let it be your aim to be “zealously affected in a good thing”—but let your zeal be “according to knowledge,” and improved and illustrated by “good works.”

4. In conclusion—we recommend what will be particularly gratifying to some of our personal friends, that every man make arrangements to pay his debts as soon as practicable—but at all events in the progress of the current year. This is so common a matter, that like many other familiar subjects, it passes almost without observation. Yet it involves some very high moral interests, as well as the good condition of an immense number of human beings. Inattention to this subject of recommendation, is often productive of most serious injury to individuals and families—as well as to their public reputation. And we must be permitted to name those who are most frequently at the bottom of the roll, both of dues and of payments—printers and preachers. What is subscribed for the paper of the one, or the services of the other, is seldom considered as a debt—but rather as a charity; and is consequently the very last thing of which most people think in their estimate of pecuniary obligations. Call it charity in the first instance, if you please; but when time and labor have been devoted in reliance upon your pledge—it becomes debt, in the same sense as if that time and labor had been appropriated in any other way, or to any other objects. So then, if you would have these two classes pay their debts to you—you will help them to do it speedily, if you will “go and do likewise.” S. R. S.

ONEIDA INSTITUTE.

Does the public know, or can the public know anything about the condition or management of this institution? What statistical documents, or what official report from the trustees, or principal, or any of the officers of that institution, has the public been permitted to see since the Winter or Spring of 1831? What amount of funds have been contributed by private donations, under what pretences were those donations obtained, and what amount of money from the State has that institution obtained; and how have said funds been appropriated? How many students have been educated, and in what manner—at what expense over and above the amount and profits of their labor? What religious tests are required of the students? To what denomination must they belong? How many hours per day are they required to labor, and what allowance is made them for labor performed? What branches of industry are pursued there? etc., etc.

These questions are propounded for the purpose of obtaining, if possible, from any authentic source, the information requisite for their solution. For we have seen no official report, nor any other authentic information touching these matters since the Spring of 1831.

One principal reason of the subject being brought forward at this time, is this: Nearly three months since we received a letter from a friend at a distance making inquiries respecting the Oneida Institute, or Manual Labor School, located at Whitestown—the branches of industry pursued, the amount of labor performed by each student, the manner of conducting it, the profits arising from it, the expenses of a student there over and above his labor, etc. The object of my friend, in wishing these questions answered, I presume was to attempt the establishment of a manual labor school on a somewhat similar plan, provided it were shown to be a valuable and feasible plan of educating youth. With a view of obtaining the information necessary to enable us to answer our friend's letter, we sent a polite verbal request to Dr. Green, the Principal of the Institute, through the medium of Rev. Mr. Wetmore, of this city, that he would furnish the desired information. We waited several weeks and no answer came. We then addressed as polite and respectful a letter to the Doctor as we knew how to endite, requesting information relative to the above particulars either by letter or in any other way he might please to communicate it. It is now nearly or quite two months since this letter was written; and neither the Doctor nor any other officer or friend of the Institute has deigned to give us the least particle of information, or take any notice of our letter whatever.

We are certainly at a loss to know what such contemptuous silence can mean. And under existing circumstances we cannot but ask the questions, Is every thing right—are all things conducted as they should be at the Oneida Institute? If so, why refuse the solicited information? Why fear the light? Why do the Principal and officers choose darkness rather than light? Is there not "something rotten in the state of Denmark?"

PRIZE TALES AND ESSAYS.

The committee selected to decide upon the claims of various Essays and Tales to the premiums offered by Messrs. Grosh and Hutchinson, in the Magazine and Advocate for the 24th of September last, (volume vii, page 311,) make the following REPORT.

After rejecting all articles deficient in the requisite qualifications, there were not left three of either class, for their decision; nor were these, in both classes, deemed worthy of the first and second premiums respectively; and yet, by the strict letter of the offer, many did not feel authorized to award the third premium, unless a third article was in competition. The declared object in offering premiums, being thus placed in opposition to the letter of the offer, the committee, unable to come to any other decision, unanimously recommend Messrs. Grosh and Hutchinson to continue their offer for a few months longer, and so amend it as to relieve the committee then selected, from the difficulty above named.

We believe the credit of the Magazine and Advocate, if not of the cause in which it labors, requires that the articles should be nearly proportionate in merit, with the premiums awarded to each respectively—and that no author desires the honorless award of a premium for which there was not only no competition, but of which all would declare the article unworthy. We therefore hope the above recommendation will be more satisfactory and creditable in its results, than any other conscientious decision a majority of the committee could have made.

SAMUEL BROWN, J. P. NEWLAND,
D. BIDDLECOM, J. L. KELLOGG,
G. N. SMITH, N. C. POWERS.

The above will explain why we present our readers with no prize Tale or Essay in this number. We would add the expression of our deep regrets, but it is useless—all we can do is to remedy the defect as well as we can, provide against its future recurrence, and hope that the delay will serve to increase the feast and improve its quality. The committee discharged a difficult and delicate duty, with great candor and conscientiousness, and deserve our warmest thanks therefor, as well as those of all concerned. And in compliance with their unanimous recommendation, we invite the attention of the former as well as other competitors (for if those who have written wish to write new articles, they will be received; or if they wish to amend their former articles, they can have them returned for that purpose) to the following continuation of the offer.

[The crowded state of our columns compels us, reluctantly, to omit the offer of premiums this week—it is essentially the same as contained in our last volume, above referred to, with the addition of a clause to provide against the difficulty above named, and an extension of time till April 7th, next. It will appear in our next.

PHRENOLOGY.

DR. BRIGHAM'S LETTER TO DR. REESE.—We acknowledge with thanks, the reception of two copies of this pamphlet from the author, per Br. R. O. Williams, of Hartford, Conn. It is a mild—too mild expose of the impudent and ever foolish mendacity, perversions, misrepresentations, abuse and ignorance of Dr. Reese's "Fruits of Phrenology"—or attack on the Brigham's work on Religion—an excellent work, and well "worth," not only "the time spent in reading it," but its cost also; Br. T. J. Sawyer's opinion to the contrary notwithstanding.

I shall probably notice this work further in a future number—also, Br. Thomas' notice of the anti-phrenological article in the last American Quarterly Review, if I can get the Review to read the article. For I conceive Phrenology as a Physiological science to be based on facts, which no metaphysical subtleties can disprove, and to which no exceptions in fact have yet been produced—and as a Philosophical science, to be based and dependent on the Physiological portion, which was first discovered, and is therefore the antecedent of Phrenology as a system of moral and mental philosophy. A. B. G.

THE SERMON, if such it may be called, which appears in this number of the Magazine and Advocate, was prepared in haste, while laboring under considerable bodily infirmity, and without the most distant idea of its ever appearing in print. And it is now given to the public in this form, only in compliance with the earnest solicitation of Mrs. Grosh and Hutchinson, the publishers, seconded by a number of the trustees and members of the society and congregation before whom it was delivered. If its merits shall be found to equal its defects so that the reader does not wholly lose the time occupied by its perusal, I for one shall be satisfied. D. S.

THIS NUMBER is sent to all who discontinued at the close of last volume, and to a few others, for their examination and circulation among others, with a request for them to subscribe. No more will be sent to them unless ordered.

AGENTS and others are requested to make speedy returns of names, etc., that we may regulate our edition. They will retain the Prospectus for further operations. Be particular in giving the Postoffices where papers are sent, and in writing names of persons and places legibly.

AGENTS.—Br. G. D. Countryman, our very excellent agent at Fort Plain, has resigned the agency to Br. William L. Walradt, same place. Br. C. will please accept our warmest thanks for his efficient aid.

* * We invite special attention to the preservation of the lists of agents we commence publishing in this day's paper. See last page.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We are great consumers of "copy"—we therefore solicit those whose articles are on hand, and not to wait their appearance, but write on; and those who have none on hand to send us some. All will appear in due time, and more be wanted.

Br. Whittemore—Credit Sherebiah Hunt, East Hamilton, Madison county, with two dollars for the Trumpet, and charge me. Br. H. wishes it noticed in the Trumpet.

Br. Tompkins—Send current volume of the Repository to Mrs. L. Winslow, Smithville, Jefferson county—and next volume to Br. B. Thayer, Mexico, Oswego county—all of N. Y. Credit them and charge

A. B. G.

A CARD.—The Editors of the Magazine and Advocate return their thanks to Br. Whittemore, for the acceptable present of a copy of The Songs of Zion to each of them.

* * The above was delayed, till too late for insertion in the last volume, in order to present the trio of thanks entire.

POETRY.

Disappointed in procuring a poetic article for our first number, suitable to the season, I have concluded to give the readers what will at least be a rarity—would I could say a treat—the only poetic article from my pen ever published in this paper, except six doggerel lines to fill a corner! It is the translation of an article, of which I have seen three different versions, some superior in beauty to mine, but none so strictly literal.

MIGNON'S LONGING FOR HOME.

Translated from the German of Gathe.

BY A. B. GROSH.

Know'st thou the country where the citron blows,
And 'mid dark leaves the golden orange glows—
Where softer winds from blue heavens sigh,
And myrtle, calm, and laurels grow on high?

Know'st thou it well?

For there! For there!

Would I with thee, oh, my beloved, repair!

Know'st thou the house? Its roofs on columns rest,
Its hall is bright—its rooms in splendor drest;
And marble statues stand and look at me—
Thou hapless child, what has befallen thee!

Know'st thou it well?

For there! oh, there!

Would I with thee, protector dear, repair!

Know'st thou the mountain and its cloudy steep?
There seeks the mule o'er misty ways to creep;
In caverns live the dragon's scaly brood,
Rocks hurtle down, and o'er them rolls the flood!

Know'st thou them well?

For there! For there—

Our way! oh Father, homeward let's repair!

MORALITY OF CHILDHOOD.

Writers on education lay great stress upon the cultivation of early years; and the reason they give, is, that the mind may be qualified for usefulness and happiness at some future period. People in general seem to forget that childhood is a part of existence, and is capable of constituting an individual life, though it be cut off in its very bloom and verdure; that some beings are only born to die young, the purpose of their creation being fulfilled in a short space. This season, for the most part, is regarded as if it possessed no consequence, apart from its relation to the remainder of life. Hence, children are treated as if they had no feelings; their wishes, tastes and impulses are opposed with savage authority, and the vulgar error often obtains, that the more the child is cramped, restrained, and brought under, the better man he will make. But this error is common to the treatment of the child, and to man's treatment of himself. Point, if you can to him who is happy—contented now. All the world are doing something which they think is going to produce happiness. All suffer for the present in behalf of the future. "No matter, then," it is said, "how painful infancy is made, so that the child have the greater chance for happiness, if he live, in time to come."

I wish to consider, briefly, this period of life by itself. I wish to separate it from the rest of existence, and like a precious gem, to insulate it in its own purity, and gaze upon it in its own unalloyed loveliness. It has to my mind an importance in the moral world, distinct from maturity, not acknowledged. Taking no part in the business of society, not even gaining its own support, and being chiefly a care and weight to parents, no wonder that in a world of dollars and cents it should be looked upon as insignificant in itself, and only to be valued for what it may become.

But childhood has immortal mind; it reasons, compares, and judges. It has feelings; how pure! how angelic! It has character; how elevated! how free from envy, jealousy, and hatred! How generous is childhood! How quickly does it melt at the sight of suffering it can understand! How ready is it to relieve hunger and distress, in any form, by any sacrifice of its little means! It has not learned the importance of wealth; it knows nothing of the ostentation of pride; it is under the influence of none of the factitious distinctions of the world, and it acts true to nature. How beautiful then, must childhood be! It cares not whether its play-fellow be rich or poor, black or white; it studies not the texture of the cloth—which in the best personage covers only poor humanity—before it can make up its mind to look kindly or not upon its hap-hazard acquaintances. It knows nothing of genealogy; but all it cares to know, is whether those in contact with itself be good, according to the simple standard by which it forms its opinions.

What a morality is taught us here! What a satire upon human conduct is the simplicity of childhood!

"Papa," says a little rosy cheeked boy in the city to his father, "why must I not ride about with the milk-man?" "My dear," answers his father, "it is not proper for you to be seen in a milk-cart; you shall ride with me in the carriage this afternoon." "But, papa," persists the little fellow, as he catches hold of his father's skirts, and jumps along by his side, trying to get sight of his face, or to get his father to look in his countenance—for childhood argues its causes by the muscles of the face—"papa, I say I had rather ride with the milk-man, because he lets me hold the reins, and drive." "Well, well, my dear, you must not, because papa says so; there, be a good boy, and you shall go with me this afternoon."

The little boy shrinks back, and yields to authority; perhaps he drops a few tears of disappointment; but before they are dry upon his cheek, a smile, at some new project of sport, lights up his features, and he is happy. Nay, he will soon forget his sorrow, greet his father with a kiss, when he returns, and goes to ride with him in his carriage; and if he is a fine boy and has been suffered to express his petty thoughts without reserve, he will minister more to the pleasure of the ride, than forty solemn, dignified, ostentatious men, who treat little boys and girls as if they were so many monkeys.

The moral influence of childhood is beautifully shown by Moore, in his "Paradise and the Peri." A Peri is seeking for some gift which shall gain him admittance to heaven. He has carried thither gold and precious stones, but such offerings are not sufficient. At last, wearied with his fruitless attempts, he is almost in despair of seeing paradise, when he beholds upon the earth, a man full of crime and wickedness, fresh from some scene of murder and baseness, alight near a brook, to refresh his jaded steed. Under the shade of a tree that overhangs the brook, a little child is on his knees in prayer. The stranger is overcome by the sweetness of such an appeal to his conscience, and perhaps dictated by the spirit of God, he falls prostrate beside the supplicating little being, and for the first time in his life, tears of penitence wet his cheek. The Peri speeds swiftly, and catches the falling tear; he bears it to the portals of heaven. Wide open the gates of God's house to receive so precious a token of human repentance, and the Peri enters as the bearer of the token.

Jesus Christ took little children in his arms and blessed them. He said we must "become as little children;" and this perhaps causes us to attribute so much importance to the morality of childhood. J. N. B.

WIFE.—There is no combination of letters in the English language which excites more pleasing and interesting associations in the mind of man than the word wife. There is magic in this little word. It presents to the mind's eye a cheerful companion, a disinterested adviser, a nurse in sickness, a comforter in misfortune, and a faithful and ever affectionate friend. It conjures up the image of a lovely and confiding woman, who cheerfully undertakes to contribute to your happiness, to partake with you the cup, whether of weal or woe, which destiny may offer. This word wife is synonymous with the greatest earthly blessing; and we pity the unfortunate wight who is condemned, by fate's severe decree, to trudge along through life's dull pilgrimage without one.

DEATHS.

In Ashford, Cattaraugus county, December 8, PETER LAMPSON, aged 63 years. Funeral at the Methodist meeting-house in Springville; sermon by Br. Todd, from 1 Cor. xiv: 9. M. S.

In Concord, Erie county, December 10, CAROLINE GREY, consort of Norman Grey, aged 25 years. She was formerly of Herkimer county. Sermon by Br. Todd. M. S.

In Bellville, Jefferson county, in October last—very suddenly, FRANCES CLARK, consort of Calvin Clark, aged 37 years. She adorned the doctrine of universal benevolence by a well ordered life and conversation, and has left a fond husband and numerous children to deplore her early removal. But they mourn not as those who have no hope.

In Chautauque county, November 24, ELMATHAN BEACH, a revolutionary veteran, aged 72 years and 6 months. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourning friends by Rev. Mr. Spencer, a soldier of the revolution, from Rev. xxi: 7. E. M. W.

In Lebanon, December 5, Mrs. PHERE OWEN, aged 29 years. A kind husband has thus been bereaved of an affectionate helpmate and four children left motherless in the world. Sermon by Br. Woolley, from Rom. xii: 21.

In Fort Plain, December 15, SUSAN DEY, consort of Stephen B. Dey, in the 40th year of her age.

AGENTS.

We this week commence publishing a list of agents. The list must, necessarily, be very imperfect, as there are many agents, and many places where we wish to appoint agents, that we have not yet heard from. We shall, at present publish the names of those only who have been recommended to us, or those who have acted, and we are pretty confident, will continue to act, as agents.

In places where we do not publish the name of an agent, our subscribers will act in their own judgment as to the responsibility of those to whom they pay their money, and we again repeat the request to such, to recommend some one of their number to us as their future agent.

MATTHEW XVIII: 23-35.

BY REV. S. C. LOVELAND.

"Therefore is the kingdom of heaven likened unto a certain king which would take account of his servants. And when he had begun to reckon, one was brought unto him which owed him ten thousand talents. But forasmuch as he had not to pay, his lord commanded him to be sold, and his wife and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made. The servant therefore fell down, and worshipped him, saying, lord, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all. Then the lord of that servant was moved with compassion, and loosed him, and forgave him the debt. But the same servant went out, and found one of his fellow-servants which owed him a hundred pence: and he laid hands on him, and took him by the throat, saying, pay me that thou owest. And his fellow-servant fell down at his feet, and besought him, saying, have patience with me and I will pay thee all. And he would not: but went and cast him into prison, till he should pay the debt. So when his fellow-servants saw what was done, they were very sorry, and came and told unto their lord all that was done. Then his lord, after that he had called him, said unto him, O thou wicked servant, I forgave thee all that debt, because thou desiredst me: Shouldst thou not also have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, even as I had pity on thee? And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him. So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses."

Verse 23. "The kingdom of heaven."—The kingdom of heaven, in the New Testament, usually signifies, the Christian dispensation. Christ is represented as a king; John xviii: 36; Col. i: 13; 1 Cor. xv: 24, 25; Heb. i: 8. It was said, Christ's coming into the world brought this kingdom near to men; Matt. iii: 2; iv: 17; x: 7.

"Would take account of his servants."—The Scriptures speak of a judgment in which man will be called to render an account to God. Jesus Christ, called the Son of God, in a peculiar sense, is often represented as the Judge of mankind. See Matt. xii: 36; Rom. xiv: 12; Heb. xiii: 17; John v: 22; 2 Cor. v: 10.

Verse 24. "Ten thousand talents."—What is most probably meant by this, was, a very great debt. "The Jewish talent appears from Ex: xxxviii: 25, 26, to have been equal to three thousand shekels, and as the shekel is estimated at about fifty cents, the value of the talent would be about fifteen hundred dollars."—WAHL. Ten thousand talents, therefore, at this computation, would amount to fifteen millions of dollars. It would seem that this servant held some responsible office by his accruing a debt of such a vast amount.

Verse 25. "Had not to pay."—"When a debtor was unable to discharge his debt, the Jews permitted him to be sold for a slave, together with his wife and children, as appears from 2 Kings iv: 1, where we are told that a certain woman of the wives of the sons of the prophets, cried unto Elisha, saying, "Thy servant my husband is dead, and thou knowest that thy servant did fear the Lord, and the creditor is come, to take unto him my two sons to be bondmen." The king therefore proposed to do in this instance, no more than what was usually practiced, and what the law authorized."—KENRICK.

Verse 28. "An hundred pence."—The denarius, here called a penny, is allowed to be about fourteen cents of our money. A hundred denarii, would therefore amount to fourteen dollars. According to another estimate, it is considered nine and three-eighths cents, making in the whole nine dollars thirty seven and a half cents.

Verse 34. "Delivered him to the tormentors."—A question would seem to present itself, whether his lord, in this case, did not violate his own engagement, in delivering this servant to the tormentors, after he had previously loosed him and forgave him the debt. Some understand that this forgiveness was only a delay of payment, because this was all he asked. But this is giving to the term forgiveness, an unusual signification. When a debtor is forgiven, we always understand, that he is discharged from any further obligation, on account of the debt which is forgiven. This is the most natural and usual meaning of the corresponding Greek word, as well as the English word, forgiveness. It is moreover very evident that the first debtor understood his discharge from the debt to be full, freeing him from all further obligation, or accountability, on account of it.

It has always been a maxim in law, that whatever is fraudulently or surreptitiously obtained, is not obligatory on the part of the promiser or giver. Between a king and his servant or officer, there is not exactly the same relation, as between two individuals, in other respects wholly independent of each other. Every subject owes complete loyalty to his sovereign. When the servant fell down and worshipped his lord, saying, "have patience with me and I will pay thee all," he professed to be a loyal and obedient subject. He professed to his lord that all which he could do, he would do, to promote the interests of his master's kingdom. All this is clear from the professions he made to his lord. It was on this ground, that he obtained the forgiveness of his debt. When, therefore, he took a fellow-servant, and cast him into prison with the utmost violence, he did his lord an injury, by imprisoning one of his subjects, and directly violated the profession he had made to him, when he obtained the discharge from his own debt, and on which ground this discharge was made.

The "tormentors" are the keepers of jails. They are so called in allusion to the rigor formerly practiced, on many occasions, with prisoners.

Verse 35. "So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you."—"The goodness and indulgence of God towards us, is the pattern we should follow in our dealings with others. If we take man for our exemplar, we shall err, because our copy is a bad one; and our lives are not likely to be better than the copy we imitate. Follow Christ, be merciful as your Father who is in heaven is merciful. You cannot complain of the fairness of your copy. Reader, hast thou a child or servant who has offended thee, and humbly asks forgiveness! Hast thou a debtor or a tenant who is insolvent, and asks for a little longer time? And hast thou not forgiven that child or servant! Hast thou not given time to that debtor or tenant? How, then, canst thou ever expect to see the face of the just and merciful God? Thy child is banished, or kept at a distance; thy debtor is thrown into prison, or thy tenant sold up; yet the child offered to fall at thy feet: and the debtor or tenant, utterly insolvent, prayed for a little longer time; hoping God would enable him to pay thee all; but to these things thy stony heart and seared conscience paid no regard! O monster of ingratitude! scandal to human nature! reproach to God! if thou canst, go hide thyself—even in hell—from the face of the Lord!"—DR. ADAM CLARKE.

"Their trespasses."—"These words are properly left out by GRIESBACH, and other eminent critics, because they are wanting in some of the very best manuscripts, most of the versions, and by some of the chief of the Fathers. The words are evidently an interpolation; the construction of them is utterly improper, and the concord false.

"In our common method of dealing with insolvent debtors, we in some sort imitate the Asiatic customs; we put them in prison, and all their circumstances there are so many tormentors; the place, the air, the company, the provision, the accommodations, all, all is destructive to comfort, to peace, to health, and to every thing that humanity can devise. If the person be poor, or comparatively poor, is his imprisonment likely to lead him to discharge his debt? His creditor may rest assured that he is now further from his object than ever; the man had no other way of discharging the debt, but by his labor; that is now impossible, through his confinement, and the creditor is put to a certain expense towards his maintenance. How foolish is this policy! And how much do such laws stand in need of revision and amendment.

Imprisonment for debt, in such a case as that supposed above, can answer no other end than the gratification of the malice, revenge or inhumanity of the creditor. Better sell all that he has, and, with his hands and feet untied, let him begin the world afresh. Dr. DODD very feelingly inquires here, "Whether rigor in exacting temporal debts, in treating without mercy such as are unable to satisfy them—whether this can be allowed to a Christian, who is bound to imitate his God and Father?—to a debtor, who can expect forgiveness only on the condition of forgiving others!—to a servant, who should obey his Master?—and to a criminal who is in daily expectation of his Judge and final sentence?" Little did he think, when he wrote this sentence, that himself should be a melancholy proof, not only of human weakness, but of the relentless nature of those laws by which property, or rather money, is guarded. The unfortunate Dr. Dodd was hanged for forgery, in 1777, and the above note was written only seven years before.

"The unbridled and extravagant appetites of men, sometimes require a rigor even beyond the law, to suppress them. While, then, we learn lessons of humanity from what is before us, let us also learn lessons of prudence, sobriety and moderation. The parable of the two debtors is blessedly calculated to give this information."—DR. ADAM CLARKE.

We cannot suppose that our Lord intended, that every minute circumstance in his parables, should be dwelt upon, as analagous to the subjects he designed to illustrate. A servant may deceive an earthly prince, by making fair and false pretensions, and thus obtain the same decision, which the most faithful and loyal subject would be entitled to receive. Our heavenly Father cannot be thus deceived. But in the exercise of the divine economy, it would sometimes appear that God treats men as taking them at their word, and shows them their wickedness by their works. In their distresses, they cry unto God for the exercise of his pardoning spirit, to soothe their guilty and perturbed consciences. They profess to receive an answer of peace, and undoubtedly do. The stinging power of conscience is allayed, and they are confident that their sins are forgiven. But still, lurking evils are not purged, but are permitted to remain; in some instances, are particularly nourished. Such may expect the feeling of the old debt of guilt to return. They may be sure that God will visit it upon them, in such a manner, as will fully remind them of the hardness and depravity of their hearts. How many there are that make great pretensions to religion, but forget to show mercy! When they exercise the rigor of the law against their dependents, they feel that they are excused, because they do no more than the law allows; little remembering, that God requires mercy, and that without mercy, it is in vain to pretend to be a disciple of Jesus Christ.

VALUE OF THOUGHT.—Gold is but a poor legacy in comparison with immortal thought. The one is human, worthless; the other divine, invaluable.

SCENE AT AN INQUIRING MEETING.

BY REV. L. C. BROWNE.

Clergyman. Mr. A, do you believe in Christ?

Mr. A. Yes Sir; I believe that Christ "gave himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time; and that "the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion, with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads."

Clerg. I perceive you are a Universalist. Mr. B. what is your opinion in these matters? Do you trust in God?

Mr. B. Yes Sir; I "trust in the living God who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe."

Clerg. It is strange what wild notions people are running into! Mr. C. I hope you have been better taught.

Mr. C. I was religiously educated, Sir, when a child, and for many years have made the study of the Scriptures the employment of my leisure; and I have at last arrived at the conclusion, that as "the Son of God was manifested for this purpose; that he might destroy the works of the devil—that the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand—he shall see of the travail of his soul and shall be satisfied;" and that—Clerg. I have heard enough of that trash! Mr. D. I hope you are not also deluded—I hope you do not expect salvation without repenting and turning to God.

Mr. D. O no, Sir. But I rejoice in the assurance of the Psalmist, that "all the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord; and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him."

Clerg. It is really lamentable to see what ravages infidelity is making in this community! Mr. E. are you also infected with the poison?

Mr. E. I am not aware, Sir, of having imbibed any moral venom; but if I had, you know there is "balm in Gilead, and a physician there." Jesus, the good Physician, came to "save his people from their sins;" and as he cleansed the leper—

Clerg. That's enough!—I want no argument with Universalists. Mr. F. I fear you have also imbibed the "doctrine of devils," as you are surrounded by demons incarnate.

Mr. F. "The doctrine of devils?" O no, Sir. I believe in the destruction of the devil and all his works—that Christ shall reign "till he hath put all enemies under his feet—that as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he himself likewise took part of the same; that through death, he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil, and deliver them who through fear of death, were all their life time subject to bondage."

Clerg. It is deplorable to think of the moral influence of such a doctrine! Surely Satan's emissaries are spreading heresy through the land.—Mr. G. I hope better things of you.

Mr. G. Yes Sir; I hope for "better things." I believe in the destruction not only of sin and the devil, but also of hell. I read that "death and hell were cast into the lake of fire."

Clerg. Abominable!! If this doctrine prevails it will overthrow the very foundation of evangelical religion! The meeting is closed.

NATURE A THINKING BEING.

BY REV. E. GAGE.

It is common for skeptics to acknowledge a creative principle in nature, from whence originated the heavens and the earth, together with man and brutes; but still they are not willing to allow that this creative principle is possessed of reason, intelligence, or the thinking faculties. They contend that the reason why man possesses those faculties above the brutes, is the effect of organization: the more perfect the organization, say they, the more perfect will be developed those faculties. Ask them, then, if nature ever produces anything above itself, and they are ready to answer in the negative—it cannot.

Now, I wish to know if this creative principle in nature, which is capable of creating worlds and systems, and setting them in motion with such regularity and order; and which produces man; is not the effect of organization—and therefore possessed of those powers and faculties which it bestows on man in such abundance? Man is the creation of nature, and is endowed with reason, intelligence, or the thinking faculties, which faculties this power in nature could not bestow if it did not possess them. We must conclude then that nature is more perfect in its organization than man, for it produces man; therefore we must conclude that nature (on skeptical principles) is possessed of all those powers and faculties, and the several attributes which the Christian ascribes to his God! I pause for a reply.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ XXVIII. EXTRACTS FROM A RELIGIOUS CORRESPONDENCE.—* * * "God is not in all their thoughts." I have just been reflecting upon the very marked contrast there is between the spirit and tenor of sentiment now prevalent in society—Christian society—and the spirit and feeling of Paul. Read over any small portion of his epistles, and you cannot fail to notice the very frequent references he makes to God as the author and source of all good—of wisdom and uprightness, of peace, of love, of salvation, of strength; then note how oft there occurs in the conversation you listen to, or the writings which you read, any mark of a similar acknowledgement of the Supreme, and you will doubtless, both mark and lament the contrast. This forgetfulness of God is characteristic not only of those engaged in the pursuit of pleasure, and wealth, and honor—not only of the merchant, the mechanic, the student, the lawyer, the physician; but it is true, my dear friend, of those who call themselves by the name of Christian, of those who profess to lead their devotions and be their instructors, and of many who have long lived a Christian life. Yes, it is the spirit of the age; it is the style of sentiment, which pervades society, this forgetfulness of the First Cause. While my thoughts were thus employed, it was sweet and consonant to my feelings to peruse that eloquent passage, in Foster's first Essay, every paragraph and step in the climax of which commences with "And why did you not think of Him?" You recollect it, I have no doubt, for we have oft expressed our mutual admiration of its finished beauty and power.

"God is not in all their thoughts." These words have frequently recurred to me while reading the accounts of the late conflagration, and the commentaries which newspaper-editors have made thereon. [This was written shortly after the great fire in New-York last winter.] Not one seems to have asked himself the question, may not the Deity have permitted this event in order to teach many a needful lesson? May it not be an impressive and extended mode of proclaiming that "covetousness is idolatry"? May it not be permitted as an arousing but much-needed herald of the neglected precept, "Treasure not up to yourselves treasures upon the earth!" No such questions—no such reflections seem ever to have occurred to the public mind. I cannot, at all, agree with those who would presume to say, that this conflagration was meant to arouse the public mind, or to impress upon it any such words of warning and of wisdom as are contained in the above quotations; but I am ready to subscribe to the opinion of those who think that it is a part and a proof of true wisdom to learn lessons of similar import from this very calamitous event.

"God is not in all their thoughts." Else how is it that from every press throughout our land, we have not heard a voice like this? Have we not thought too much of earth and the enjoyments it can yield, and too little of higher enjoyments, and of the Author of all enjoyment? Have we not pursued the treasures and enjoyments of earth too greedily, too eagerly, and been too unmindful of treasures more lasting and pleasures more refined? Have we not gloried in earth—the wise man in his wisdom, the rich man in his riches, the strong man in his might, and have neglected the true source of glorying, that we understand and know the Lord? We are willing, in words, to admit that the possession of riches and of rank will neither make us more exalted nor more happy beings: yet, in works, have we not been denying this truth? Have we not made money our God? Have not the calls of the seasons of piety and devotion been neglected and put aside, in order that we might, without disturbance, employ ourselves with heart, and soul, and strength, in the planning and pursuit of mammon? And in reflecting upon our state of feeling, are we not well convinced that no man can serve two masters—God and mammon? Have we not found that where our treasure was, there our heart was also?

Would not reflections like these, my dear friend, well become rational men enlightened by Christianity? But they have either seldom been entertained, or the avowal of them has been restrained by a mistaken shame.

You will notice that I have said that the possession of riches or of rank, will not ennoble or render us happy. I would not be willing to say so of the pursuit of these things. I consider that our merchants and men of enterprise do enjoy a very great degree of felicity—that arising from activity, almost ceaseless activity. Compared with the indolent man, how happy the man whose thoughts and whose hours are ever occupied to the full! From our own experience we can well conceive the difference in enjoyment. Whom do we behold more industrious, more bustling, more busy than our merchants and men of wealth? Do they not ponder the signs of the times? Do they not watch the winds and the waves? Do they not scrutinize men's dispositions, character and capabilities with the keenness of an insight almost intuitive? Do they not investigate the genius and the policy of governments? Do they not rise early and sit up late, eating the bread of carefulness? Are there not some who have developed mind and talent enough in the pursuit of wealth, to have governed an empire, to have mastered sciences, to have become giants in literature, to have swayed the minds and the passions of multitudes? From all this activity there could not fail to be furnished ample sources of enjoyment and gratification; and from the constant exercise of mind, there could not fail to arise an exaltation and invigoration of its intellectual powers. Of whatever pleasures and improvements those who are indefatigable and unrelaxing in their efforts to lay up treasures on the earth, do deprive themselves, those arising from activity and engagedness are not denied to them.

* * * * *
What a changed man our friend M. has become! He that was formerly hot and hasty in his temper, is now mild and gentle! This felicitous change, I am inclined to ascribe to the management of his wife. I never saw more strikingly exemplified the truth of the proverb—"a soft answer turneth away wrath." Instead of answering his little bursts of anger in an unamiable and feverish tone, she restrained the "grievous words" that were ready to burst forth, and replied with calmness, composure, yea, often with kindness. And this kindness has conquered—he feels ashamed of his anger, almost always causeless; and when disposed, he restrains himself from the heartfelt respect he is obliged to entertain for his prudent and gentle companion. If I could take some heads of families to this scene, they might learn and see exemplified a very useful lesson. They might see one kind word, or one recollection of the wife's worth dispel gathering gloom and discontent—they might witness the power of gentleness, of a kind mien, a pleasant reply upon displeasure depicted on the countenance, upon a temper tried by some inconvenience or vexation, upon the "unruly member" ready to vent its spleen. What nature will not kindness and worth subdue? What will they not accomplish? Let man—let woman try.

I have witnessed a few instances in which the industrious, hardy, manly, steady habits of the East have yielded and fallen before the richer and more plenteous rewards which well-applied skill and capital do generally secure in the West. This has reminded me of an anecdote of ancient times, read in my school-boy days. The Persians, after their extensive conquest, were desirous to remove from their own comparatively barren and mountainous country to one more rich and fruitful. Cyrus, their wise general and king, bid them do as they would, but begged them at the same time to remember, that for the future they must not expect to rule, but to obey; Providence having ordered it, that an effeminate race were the almost certain produce of a delicious country. The habits of New-England were generated and nursed by necessity: pity to see them fall when that necessity is relaxed or removed.

It is the concurrent testimony of many witnesses, that by prayer we obtain true peace of mind—that peace to which those who never pray are utter strangers. "Be anxious for nothing," says Paul, "but in every thing, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God, and the peace of God which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus." How calm and composed may he be amid the storms and distractions of this world, who has daily—hourly communion with the Creator, Ruler and Preserver of all things! The Christian falls below his true happiness in this life, if he does not enjoy a prevailing, if not constant peace of mind. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace," says the Psalmist, "whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee." What is the experience, what the testimony of our own Gospel?

It is my opinion that we do not "grow in grace"—do not increase in a devotional spirit—do not approximate to the character of a perfect child of God, when we neglect secret prayer. Nor are our daily employments so pleasant and prosperous.

There is no more frequent mistake in religion than that which supposes the obedience of the Gospel to be an irksome task. That service, indeed, which springs from a fear of punishment, must, I should suppose, be painful and irksome; but, this, you know, is not the kind of service which God requires or which is acceptable in his sight. There is no love of God—no love of God with all our heart, in such obedience. It is an unwilling servitude in which there is none of that peace and joy which is described in the Scriptures, as the portion of the obedient children of God. No! my friend, it is not until we are enabled, by the sweet constraining influence of love, to say with the Psalmist, "I delight to do thy will, O my God"—not till then, will our obedience be acceptable in his sight, or easy and pleasant to ourselves. Without the love of God shed abroad in our hearts, we can know little or nothing of the blessedness of that spirit of adoption by which we call Abba, Father; and as little of that liberty from the power of sin, and the fear of death, wherewith Christ doth make us free. Yes! love, and love alone, is indeed, the fulfilling of the law.

My ideas on some points connected with education, very nearly approximate to those of the late Hon. Mr. Grimke. In the present systems of collegiate or complete education, the Greek and Latin classics, and mathematics hold the most prominent place. Indeed every one's scholarship is estimated according to his proficiency in these branches. Mr. G. contended not that these were useless, but that they ought to hold a subordinate place. He would assign the first and most important place to sacred literature, through the whole course, from the infant school to the University; making the pupil acquainted first with practical religion, with the ordinary explanations of facts and precepts, the manners and customs of the Jews and other ancient nations, with geography and history. To these he would add the antiquities of the Bible, the evidences of its truth, the superiority of Christianity over every other system of morals and religion, ecclesiastical history, and sacred literature in its English forms only, together with the connexions between sacred history and literature, with profane history and literature. He would then proceed to Hebrew, Greek and Latin, the metaphysics of religion, and sacred literature in the highest sense of the term.

The following are some of the valuable textbooks which Mr. G. would employ in such a course of study: Faber's Horæ Mosaicæ; Paley's Horæ Paulinæ; Connexions of Shuckford, Prideaux, and Gray; Evidences of Grotius, Paley, and Chalmers; Stillingfleet's Originæ Sacræ; Butler's Analogy; Berkeley's Minute Philosopher; Bleekwall's Sacred Classics; Lowth's Prælections and Isaiah; Horsey's Hosea and Sermons on the Resurrection, and his Discourse on the Sybilline Oracles; Horne's Introduction; Hall on Modern Infidelity; Chalmers's Astronomical Discourses; and Bryant on Ancient Mythology.

In addition to the public course, Mr. Grimke would have the student made thoroughly acquainted with the important and interesting facts in Natural History, its curiosities and wonders as tending to illustrate the power, wisdom, and goodness of God, and furnishing an inexhaustible and varied fund for social intercourse. He would also have him thoroughly versed in political science and the nature of our institutions, with the structure of our government, and the duties of all its offices.

In the letter which Professor Silliman addressed to Dr. Edwards, dated "Boston, March 10, 1836," and which was pretty generally copied in the newspapers at that time, there is, to me, more argument, more weight, more influence in favor of temperance, than in all the exaggerated statements, unfeeling abuse, and enthusiastic rant which have been poured forth from certain presses for months. Perhaps in some of your papers you may have it: but the amount of it is, briefly, this. At the age of forty-three, the health of the Professor became entirely prostrated in consequence of excessive labors and domestic afflictions. For several years, during which he continued to sink, he tried, in vain, under medical direction, the most approved forms of stimulus, joined with nutritious diet. When his powers were almost broken down, he was persuaded to abandon the use of wine and every other alcoholic stimulus, and take the simplest diet, as rice, cracker, bread with milk, or water, and in small quantities. In a few weeks his health began to mend; and at the end of one year he was able to return to his arduous duties, requiring constant exertions of both body and mind. Now, thirteen years after the period of his greatest depression, he is able, upon a simple diet, consisting of the most common and useful articles of food, and without any alcoholic stimulus, to perform constant labor in his profession, with much public speaking, and he sustains, even at his advanced age, no inconvenience, except the fatigue which sleep removes, as in other healthy persons.* This to me "speaks volumes" in favor of temperance in eating as well as in drinking—points out the sources of our most common complaints and uneasy feelings—and is persuasive to adopt a simple and spare system of living. "Man needs but little here below."

You mention with respect your Family Bible, and with veneration your mother's judicious and affectionate employment of it. I too have a revered family record. And to those who have been properly educated, how dear, how heart-stirring are the recollections which will sometimes crowd into the mind at the sight—at the mention of the "Family Bible." The form and figure of the book, its very type are at this moment fresh in my memory as it was when produced at the morning and evening sacrifice. With it are associated our fondest reflections of domestic peace, and parental affection. A parent's love—a parent's piety—a parent's care are all brought vividly to remembrance by that venerated volume. Associated with it home is recollected as a house of prayer, where first our young heart glowed with love and gratitude to our Parent in heaven, where a parent's pious spirit was infused, and where we found ourselves more near to heaven, as it were, than ever we have done since. "Forever hallowed be the word of God!" Let every fireside witness its frequent perusal! If taught to our children with wisdom and ardor—in the house and by the way—when we lay down and when we rise up, our memories will be blessed to them, our name will be precious, we shall see of the travail of our souls and be satisfied.

NOTICE.

Br. EZRA LONG, of Troy, Bradford county, Pa., who was fellowshiped by the Susquehanna Association of Universalists at Brooklyn, Pa., in 1833, has delivered up his letter to the committee on letters of fellowship of said Association, and wishes to be considered no longer a public preacher of the Gospel. His reasons are, first, that his secular avocations are wholly unfavorable to his success and usefulness. Secondly, that he is troubled with a stoppage in the throat, which so affects his lungs, that many times it is impossible for him to articulate sounds. Thirdly, he thinks that he is deficient in the requisite theological qualifications, and his advanced age, and infirmity of the eyes, will prevent his ever obtaining them. He thinks these reasons are sufficient to satisfy his brethren of the Abrahamic faith, that he had better be considered a mere individual believer in, and supporter of the truth, than a public teacher.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

Br. GROSH—I have observed in our Universalist friends, in many instances, a want of attention to our preaching notices as published in the Magazine and Advocate. This is entirely wrong.—Preachers frequently subject themselves to postage on a letter, for the express purpose of notifying appointments at a distance—the publisher devotes half a column or more, to give them a conspicuous insertion, and sends them into the neighborhood or society where the appointment is made, from one to three weeks previous, and yet when the preacher arrives, they are as ignorant about the meeting as if no notice had been given!—whereas if they had spent five minutes in reading the preaching notices, all would have been right—the preacher would have had the satisfaction of meeting a congregation, and of dispensing the words of eternal life, and perhaps some poor victim of error and false doctrine might have been enlightened, and liberated from the galling yoke of bondage.—Brethren, please to read attentively the religious notices, the first thing.

One thing more.—In some places, where there is occasional preaching, not more than one, two or three of the Magazines are sent. In such cases, I have known a want of zeal in those few individuals, in circulating the notices. Brethren, do you not love the holy cause of Universalism well enough to spend half a day, if necessary, in riding about and inviting your friends and neighbors to attend meeting, where you believe they will hear the Gospel dispensed in its purity? I speak as unto wise men, and surely a word to the wise should be sufficient.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER I.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

THE NECESSITY OF REFLECTION.

By reflection, I would signify, the habit of seriously and often meditating upon the various topics connected with your prosperity and enjoyments. On arriving at years of understanding, you perceive that the race to which you belong, exists in company with countless grades of other beings. And you also discover that man is elevated far above, and is, indeed, ruler over all other forms of earthly existence. The cause of this exaltation, it can not fail to be perceived, arises from the superior faculties with which you are endowed—the intellectual and moral capacities which compose the mind. These mental powers make man all that he is—the sage, the philosopher, the mathematician, the astronomer—capable of penetrating deep into the operations of Nature's laws—capable of converting the elements to his purposes, and of ascending high the infinite scale of attainable knowledge. Take from the human race these powers, and the bright chain which links them to a higher world, to a more lofty grade of beings, is severed, and they sink to the level of the brutes—differing from them only in form and feature. For what purpose are these ennobling faculties bestowed upon you?—to remain idle and dormant? Surely not. Nature never imparts any power but for use. To animals is granted instinct for their guidance and control; and the dictates of this instinct, which is ever in active operation, they invariably follow while life endures. But to man has been given the higher power of reason, for a similar purpose—to direct and govern him in his intercourse with his fellow-beings. These mental faculties in man, should no more be idle, than is instinct in brutes. And a neglect in the one case, would be as deleterious to the enjoyments of its possessor, as in the other.

The habit of exercising the mind in reflection upon the future, as well as the past and present, is one of the most valuable that can be established. And yet it is one, in regard to which, the young are extremely liable to fail. The present—the present—with its amusements and its gayeties, absorbs the greater proportion of their thoughts. And when they occasionally glance at the future, it is too often, but to dress it in the bright attire of the imagination—in the blooming garlands of life's sweetest pleasures. I would not unnecessarily overshadow present enjoyments, by the gloomy clouds of future anticipated evils. But the young should bear in mind the truth of the stanza—

"The beam of the morning, the bud of the Spring,
The promise of beauty and brightness may bring;
But clouds gather darkness, and, touched by the frost,
The pride of the plant and the morning are lost.
Thus the bright and the beautiful ever decay,
Life's morn and life's flowers—O, they quick pass away!"

It is important that youth should remember these things, because they are true; and because a knowledge of them may inspire the mind with a sense of the importance of frequently casting your thoughts into the future, to select your course of life, rather than to rush blindfolded along. When the ship approaches a dangerous coast, a "look out" is stationed, to warn of the approach to reef or breaker. So the young, in navigating the dangerous voyage of life, should establish reflection as the "look out," to give timely notice of those fatal shoals of imprudence and vice, upon which so many, originally possessing the brightest prospects, have been wrecked.

There are many advantages accruing from a well established habit of reflection. It will enable you to form those just conceptions of your nature and constitution, and of the laws by which they are governed, that will make you wise in regard to the true sources of your happiness. It will show the vast distinction between those enjoyments that are proper to you, as intellectual beings, and those belonging more expressly to your animal nature. Reflection will convince you that your higher faculties are bestowed upon you, to become sources of more pure, elevated and lasting enjoyments, than can possibly be experienced from the passions. It will teach you that the individuals who forget or overlook these evident truths, and who depend for all their happiness, upon the indulgence of evil propensities, not only disgrace themselves, and the race to which they belong, but are deprived of all the advantages of the higher powers bestowed upon them, and might as well have been created the brute, as for any important benefit which they obtain from these valuable sources. It will convince you that those in this condition, are in a bondage, deep, disgraceful and miserable—a bondage to be feared more deeply than prisons, chains and fetters. It will satisfy you that "man was created for purposes high and noble—such as angels engage in, and in comparison with which, all other objects sink into insignificance, and all other enjoyments are contemptible as ashes."

Reflection is an important safe-guard in selecting associates, forming habits, choosing occupations, and, indeed, in all that concerns youth.—The young man or the young woman, who thinks deeply, will act wisely. They will be aware of the nature of the dangers which hover around their path, and therefore, will act cautiously and safely. They will be enabled to penetrate those specious appearances in which vice so frequently presents itself—they will look beneath the gaudy veil which so often covers the deformities of sin, and behold the native blackness of the monster. They will be aware that "all is not gold that glitters," and will readily detect the gilded imitation, when it would occupy the place of the pure metal. They will weigh well the influences and the effects of every important step, and not be led astray by the deceitful devices of the transgressor.

How few, who are now advanced in years, would not act materially different were they to pass over the track of life again! Experience has taught them wisdom. In looking back upon their history, they can clearly perceive where they have been mistaken, where they have failed, where they have acted foolishly. And could they again pass through life, this dear bought wisdom would enable them to amend where they before had gone counter to their true welfare. How many, when it is too late, unavailingly regret, that in early years, they had not been more reflective and cautious. The young are now, where the aged would desire to be, to do better than they have done. But as this can not be, they willingly impart their wisdom and experience to youth, to enable them to avoid those evils which they experienced. Those who have failed, readily instruct you where they missed their way; and all wise youth will listen and reflect deeply on their suggestions. Solomon says—"A wise man will hear, and will increase learning; and a man of understanding shall attain unto wise counsels." There is no indication more promising in youth, than a desire to hear counsel in regard to their future conduct. And when such listen to words of instruction, they will treasure them up as food for future meditation.

Permit me to impress upon the mind of every youth who reads these lines, the importance of seeking for wise counsel, and of bestowing much thought and reflection upon all those subjects connected with your prosperity. Meditate not only on those affairs which are transacting around you, but upon the prospects of the future which open to your view. Reflect upon the sources of human happiness and human woe—ascertain the real causes of peace and satisfaction on the one hand, and of degradation and wretchedness on the other. Examine with thoughtful care, the history of your race, and the history of those of your acquaintance who are advanced in years.—Ascertain and remember what has caused one individual to be respected and loved, while another is shunned and despised. And where you perceive that others have failed, do you remedy; for let it always be remembered, that the same causes which led others to infamy and ruin, will involve you in the same disastrous circumstances, if you place yourselves within their influence. Meditate seriously upon the dangers which surround the path of the young. Were you pursuing a solitary road, around which you had reason to apprehend lurked the deadly assassin, how cautiously would you proceed—with what vigilance and watchfulness would you examine every object you approached. But remember, there are legions of foes hovering around the pathway of life, ready to assail you at every opportunity—they are the human vices. They will beset you at every turn, and fasten upon you with all their accompanying woes, unless warded off by a firm and determined opposition. But let cautious reflection be your handmaid, and you will be enabled, in a good degree, to withstand the temptations which surround you, and to walk in that wise path wherein lies every pure earthly enjoyment.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT—BIGOTRY AND MEANNESS.

Messrs. EDITORS—It becomes my painful duty to record a heart-rending occurrence, which transpired on Saturday, December 10th. Two boys, both of the same age, (eight years, one month and twenty-five days,) obtained leave of absence from their parents, in the afternoon, for the purpose of play—went on the ice, which soon gave way, and they both found a watery grave together! One was Andrew I. Prentice, son of Lorenzo and Esther C. Prentice; the other Albert Whitcher, son of B. H. Whitcher, both of this place.

Assistance was immediately procured, and medical aid was at hand, but, alas! all was too late—the vital spark had fled, and all means to resuscitate proved unavailing.

Oh, how uncertain and fleeting are the joys of earth! Within the space of one brief hour from the time each left the parental abode, instead of returning to renew the parents' joys, the lifeless remains were presented to bear testimony of their sad fate.

Thus two families have been left to mourn, each a loved one. We earnestly pray that each mourner may share the rich consolations of the Gospel, and the comforts of that hope "which is an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast," and a firm confidence in that God, who has said, "that the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." And by the light of his word and spirit, may both families be enabled truly to say, "it is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good."

After being thus somewhat minute in our details, we should be happy to dismiss the subject; but wounded feelings, and an injured and insulted public, demand us to make a further expose of subsequent events, connected with the above truly melancholy occurrence. Arrangements were made of course, for performing the funeral rites, and the last offices to their remains. Br. Prentice made choice of the writer, to perform the services in a school house in his neighborhood, and Mr. Whitcher of the Rev. Mr. Crawford, in the Presbyterian meeting-house, near by, of which church he is a member; but as there was a coincidence in the circumstance of their deaths, Mr. Whitcher proposed to Mr. Prentice to join the services in the meeting-house, which was declined on the part of Mr. P. and friends. The arrangement was also urged by a large and respectable number of the members of the Presbyterian church. Mr. Prentice insisted on his course, as first marked out—Mr. Crawford, at the same time, urging and dictating to Mr. W. to make the arrangement—until between ten and eleven o'clock on Sunday morning, when, an assurance being given by W., and a large number of the Presbyterian church, that each clergyman should officiate, not in set sermons, but in addresses suited to the solemnity of the occasion, Br. Prentice and friends consented. The funeral was appointed to take place at two o'clock, P. M. On arriving at the meeting-house at the time appointed, it was much crowded. The coffins were deposited in the house, and we found the desk already occupied by the Rev. Mr. C.; but the writer not finding admission to the desk, it was soon ascertained that the arrangements were not to be complied with. When a request for compliance was communicated to the desk, the reverend apostle (not of Jesus Christ, but) of John Calvin, arose and said, "he felt himself bound to object to my occupying the desk, as he did not consider me a Christian minister, and did not wish to recognize me as such." And on his being informed that unless the conditions under which we came there, were complied with, we should be under the necessity of withdrawing—the same course was persisted in from the desk. Whereupon Br. Prentice gave notice, that the services would be performed at the Court-house in the village. We repaired there, accordingly, and performed the services in presence of a large, respectable, deeply afflicted and sympathising congregation of mourners and friends.

Such are the times upon which we have fallen, in Western New-York, and such duplicity has been resorted to, in order to lacerate afresh the already bleeding bosoms of the afflicted mourners, by administering the tender mercies of John Calvin's infatigable domination. How long will an insulted community suffer themselves to be deluded by the craft of self-styled Orthodoxy? How long will people suffer themselves to be deceived by a hypocritical appearance of sanctity, and yield up their religious opinions to the tender mercies of the wicked which are cruel?

May God, whose is the government and dominion over all flesh, by the influence of his word and spirit, move upon the hearts of all, until man is brought up to the dignity of his own nature, to respect his own rights, and then he will have no occasion to impair or injure the rights of his neighbor. Then the word and spirit of God will have free course, run and be glorified—then will the mourner find comfort—the weak, strength—the desponding, hope—and the weary, rest.

CAUSE OF COMPLAINT.

In reading the various periodicals of our denomination, I not unfrequently find complaints of the non-attendance of many professing Universalists upon religious services, and of the incompetent support received by many of our preachers. And in connexion with these complaints, I find too, that the fault is almost invariably laid upon the shoulders of the laymen. But I think differently. Now in my humble opinion, the blame does not belong in that quarter, but in a different direction. Is it not the fault of the clergymen themselves? Have they not harped upon doctrines, cut and thrust at denominations, until their hearers have become disgusted, and they themselves brought into disrepute as ministers of the Gospel? Have they not surfeited their hearers with sermon after sermon on the doctrines of the trinity, total depravity, original sin, and other equally uninteresting subjects, instead of preaching, as they ought, Jesus Christ, and him crucified? Are there not preachers in our order who have, by pursuing such a course, run out, if I may so speak, every society over which they have had charge, and consequently checked the progress of the truth "as it is in Jesus"?

And need ministers who pursue such a course, wonder that their meetings are but poorly attended, and they themselves incompetently supported? Surely not. It is just what might be expected. But let them pursue a different course. Let them "preach the word," the great and glorious doctrine of the final "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began"—let them tell of the long suffering, the goodness, and the forbearance of our God—let them proclaim him as the chief among ten thousands, and the one altogether lovely—let them tell of the Lamb of God who shall eventually take away the sin of the world—let them tell of the love of God, that mighty safety-fund of the universe—in one word let them preach UNIVERSALISM, and great will be their reward. They will no longer have occasion to complain of thin houses, and an incompetent support. But they will have the rich satisfaction of beholding, on each succeeding Sabbath day, multitudes of the famishing sons and daughters of our race flocking to the sanctuaries of our God, like doves to their windows. The cause of truth will then have free course, run, and be glorified.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 13, 1837.

ROMANS VIII: 20.

"For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope."

Having been requested to give an opinion on this passage—whether it was the creation ["creature"] that was unwilling, or the Creator—I respectfully submit the following for consideration. Luther's German version renders it—"Whereas the creature is subjected to vanity, without its will, but by the will of him who subjected it, in hope."—Macknight renders it—"For the creature was subjected to vanity, not willing it, but by him who hath subjected it," etc. These, Dr. Clarke, and every writer on the subject with whose works I am acquainted, all seem to agree that the "not willingly" refers to the creature, and not to the Creator. The question is not, whether the phrase "not willingly" can be applied to God in reference to an action he has nevertheless performed—for that it can, there is no doubt—but does that phrase here apply thus? I can see no reason, either in the wording of the verse, or the nature of the case, to differ from the authorities cited above.

True, it may be asked how we can with propriety, speak of the creature as willing or not willing, before it existed—while it was a nonentity? With the same propriety that we speak of man as creating or not creating, before he exists. Yet we often say, "man did not create himself—he had no choice given him when and where he would be born, or whether he would exist at all—he was created without any will about it," etc. Not existing, the intelligent creature could not will to be created subject to vanity—so that the text may be literally true, without any violation of propriety, as I understand it. But while I am persuaded of the correctness of this view of the passage, I would be pleased to see the opposite opinion explained, especially if any thing not here noticed can be adduced in its favor.

A. B. G.

COULD JESUS SIN?

A friend has requested my opinion on this subject. It is one which has caused more discussion among Partisians, and more abuse of those who advocated the affirmative, than either it or they merited. But I have been applied to by one who can hear it discussed in charity, and while differing from others in opinion can remain united with them in affection. To gratify his wishes, I offer my remarks. I beg leave to premise that the subject is merely speculative, and rendered complex, by reason of many attendant considerations, and that, therefore, I may not be very clear or very concise in what I have to offer. Were I anxious to be very short, and get rid of the subject easily, I would say, at once—Jesus was naturally able to sin, but morally unable—and thus, perhaps, satisfy both sides of the question—perhaps, neither!

As a mere human being, separate and apart from the special influences of God's spirit—as a man, not connected with his great mission and office—Jesus of Nazareth had the same nature, capacities, endowments, passions and propensities other men have—exercised, and was exercised by them, as all men. True, (as God violates not the general laws of nature unnecessarily,) he was probably gifted with a mental and moral organization superior to most if not all other human beings.

And this superior organization raised him above the influences which commonly tempt other men. To illustrate. The office of general in the British army, and a few thousand dollars were enough not only to tempt, but to induce Arnold to sin against the cause of liberty. His mind was of an order to be swayed by such motives. But Washington's mind was of a superior cast. A vice-kingship and millions of dollars were no temptation to the father of our country. But had an offer embracing the peace and happiness of that generation, been made to Washington, he might have been tempted to abandon the present generation to its fate—and had that offer embraced still more, he might even have been induced to abandon the cause of our political freedom altogether. Suppose it so—there might have been a still more capacious mind and noble soul, capable of perceiving the importance of the revolutionary struggle to the other nations of the world, for many generations to come, to whom the offer which subdued Washington, could be no inducement at all, to yield the contest. Yet Washington, in one sense, could have sinned as did Arnold, for the same paltry consideration—or for the viceroyship and millions of dollars, And so the supposedly more noble mind than Washington's, could, in the same sense, have sinned for a consideration that would not have induced even Washington to betray the cause of liberty. He could, but would not. And, in another sense, he could not—because it was against his will, the controlling power of his actions. This is what is meant by natural ability and moral inability.

It is my opinion that Jesus was tempted as a mere man—i. e., while not under the full, special influence of God's spirit—for this supposition renders his example useful to us. He was tempted, not with what would tempt a mean mind—but with something held in estimation by a noble one. He was not asked to steal a trifle from a neighbor—to tell a lie to gain a few pence in the way of trade—or to use his miraculous powers, to rob a poor man of a day's wages. For such considerations were of no more value in the mind of Jesus, when weighed against his obligations to perform his duty, than the sword belt of Arnold would have been to Washington's mind, when weighed against the freedom of America! Accordingly higher—yes, the highest possible temptations, or considerations, were presented to, or rose up in the mind of Jesus. The language of the evangelists in describing his temptation, and the Scripture usage of the word "devil," allow us to suppose that, either the tempter was a real personage—a human being—or, suggestions which arose in the mind of Jesus under the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed—in a vision, or a train of deep consideration and reflection on his condition and prospects. The temptations were in accordance with the duty of Jesus to his country, the religion of his nation, and to himself. As a mere citizen of Judea he would have done well to avail himself of the general opinion in his favor, and seize the reins of empire, to which his descent entitled him—to free the Jews from the Roman yoke—and, (in the opinions and customs of even the present day,) to subdue all the surrounding nations to his sway. But he must, to do these things, renounce his mission to save the human family from sin. He must sacrifice the welfare of our whole race to be a patriot, an earthly monarch and conqueror. As a mere Jewish citizen he would do well to comply with the suggestions of the tempter, and was tempted to do so; but as the Messiah, he would sin by complying—duty was dearer than country and earthly dominion, and therefore he sinned not.

Again. It was his duty, as an individual, to supply himself with needed food, when he could do so without depriving another of it without an equivalent. But as the Messiah, it was his duty to use his miraculous powers for no merely selfish purpose, but for the benefit of others—and to trust to Him who sent him for his own protection. The motives to rely on God were greater than the motives to rely on himself. Duty was better in his sight, than bread. He preferred what he knew was best—the stones were not made bread—and Jesus was sinless—"tempted in all points as we are, yet without sin."

Such are my views of the temptation of Jesus, and his ability to sin. He could have sinned, had he chosen to do so—but as the motives were not sufficient, in his mind, he did not choose to sin, or could not choose to sin, if the opposite side prefers the phrase. But, remember, if the prospect of gaining a cent, is not a sufficient motive to induce me to murder a man, then it may also be said of me, after such an offer, that I could not choose to sin—of course could not sin. I consider the cases parallel in kind; for Jesus could have chosen to do an act, on insufficient motives, as well I can, on similarly insufficient motives. If not, how was he "tempted in all points as we are"—and where was his merit in resisting the temptation—and how can his resistance of temptation be an example to us?

The reader will see that the answer has run me into the question of free will or necessity—but that I leave him his choice of either, in adopting or rejecting my opinions. I have also written more than I intended, but shall erase nothing, leaving all I have offered go for what it is worth—i. e., for the value of the question that called it forth. If any one deems me in an injurious error—or that the above may injure any of our readers—"there is room for further remarks." A. B. G.

DISINTERESTED BENEVOLENCE.

AN AMUSING ANECDOTE.

It is well known that according to the Hopkinsian doctrine, the whole sum and essence of religion is made to consist of pure disinterested benevolence. And notwithstanding the existence of such a principle and its indispensable necessity, were generally admitted and strenuously contended for by the great body of Calvinistic divines of New-England, half a century ago; yet even then, there was occasionally found a lurking skepticism upon this point, in some bold spirit more adventurous and less cautious than his spiritual compeers. Here and there an individual was found who would either directly question the validity of the sentiment, or in a seeming half-earnest, half-jesting way, propound some objection to it which the keenest of their metaphysicians found it difficult to answer—such for instance as the following:—If a person sees a fellow-being in great distress, takes pity on, and relieves him, without any hope or expectation of the least pecuniary or earthly reward, is he entirely disinterested in the act—or are his sympathies and feelings so wrought up that he feels himself so much interested for, and concerned in the welfare of his fellow-being, that he cannot enjoy a moment's peace till he has relieved him, and therefore has a selfish aim—the desire of relieving the oppression of self—as well as a benevolent aim in performing the act? Or if he look for a reward in the eternal world, is not self at the bottom, and the mainspring prompting to the benevolent act?

It was on a beautiful afternoon of a New-England Autumn, that Mr. A—, Mr. S— and Mr. W—, three Calvinistic Congregational divines of the Southern part of New-Hampshire, sat in social chit-chat, dividing the conversation between the grave and the gay, in the neat country parlor of Parson S., of D—n. Now this same Parson S., was a very large, corpulent man, a lover of good eating, and I don't know but of good drinking, (as parsons themselves occasionally took a drop, half a century ago.) He had received a liberal education, studied his profession, and generally passed as a very clever minister, in the Yankee sense of the phrase; though the discerning, who best knew him, generally supposed that had it not been for his learning, he would hardly have known how to keep out of fire and water. Parson A., of J—y, was a keen, witty, jocular, wary and well informed parson, who, to use a homely figure, generally 'knew which side his bread was buttered on.' He was almost perpetually, when in company with Parson S., playing off some trick or pun upon the latter, who always took such things in good part, as he was aware that it would be of no use to get angry at his brother of the neighboring parish; and as for retaliation, it was generally conceded that this was out of the question, he having no coin of this sort by which to pay off his Br. A. There were no peculiarities in Parson W., of the next adjoining parish, worthy of particular notice.

It so happened in the course of the afternoon, that Parson S. was called out of the room in which his guests were sitting, for some length of time; and during his absence, Parsons A. and W. fell into conversation on the subject of disinterested benevolence. They argued the principle pro and con with considerable animation—whether seriously, or merely for argument's sake, perhaps it would have been difficult for themselves to tell. However, as they were not likely of themselves to come together in the premises, they mutually agreed to refer the question to Parson S., who should decide the matter on his return, and they would abide his decision. At length Parson S. returned to the room. On his entering, Parson A. thus addresses him: "Well, Br. S., Br. W. and I have had a long debate upon a very interesting but intricate question; and as we can't agree between ourselves how it should be settled, we have mutually made choice of you as our umpire, and according as you decide, the question shall be settled."

"Ay! Br. A., and what is your question?"

"Whether there is or is not, such a principle in existence as disinterested benevolence."

"Ay, ay, Br. A. Well, let me think a moment. Well, Br. A., there is but one argument in all creation that I can think of that in the least favors the idea of the existence of such a principle. But that argument is so clear, so plenary and so convincing, that I am constrained to yield to its force, though it be but one, and decide in favor of the principle."

"Will you tell us what that argument is, Br. S.?"

"Yes, Br. A. It is the remarkable fact of the town of J—y's supporting you and giving you a salary of five hundred dollars per annum!" D. S.

THE PRIMITIVE CHRISTIAN.

This is the title of a small monthly periodical, published in Auburn, N. Y., and edited by E. S. Shepard. It is devoted to the doctrines and principles held by Alexander Campbell, of Virginia. But we opine—judging from the specimen now before us, in the January number of the work—that Mr. Campbell cannot feel very much flattered by, nor proud of the labors of such a coadjutor.

In the number before us, the Editor has copied into his columns an article entitled "Immersion—Campbellism," which appeared in our paper for November 12th, ult., and accompanied the same with his strictures and what we suppose he meant his readers should understand, his learned criticism! For this purpose he has mounted—what shall we call it—his "noble charger," his "fiery steed," his "large well-bred horse"? or his "little poney"? or his "Rozinante"? No, not even as good as either of these. It is evidently of a breed below that of the "ponies," and cannot begin to compare with the famous "Rozinante" which the renowned and invincible Don Quixote rode in the days of knight errantry. It is most evidently of the same species as that which Balaam rode on his way to Balak, when he went "to curse Israel." And if it does not now "rebuken the madness of the prophete" like his prototype of old, it must be because he has greatly degenerated since the days of the son of Beor.

But to be serious: the article before us is really beneath criticism. It abounds in low and vulgar witticism, and awkward attempts at grammatical criticism, which show the writer not only of a vulgar turn of mind, but a mere tyro—no, not even that, a complete ignoramus—so far as the common rules of syntax are concerned. We should not have noticed the article at all, but should have regarded it, as the silly production of some boyish correspondent of the paper, who was permitted by the Editor to occupy a little space in his columns either to gratify his vanity or secure his services as agent, or both, had he not at the close of the article, noticed the significant signature of the "Editor."

Though our Saviour speaks of the "first and great commandment," (not that of water baptism, however,) yet this sapient "Editor," who is undoubtedly a "great" man, [in his own esteem,] cannot conceive of any "great" duties to perform, either "moral, practical or social." He even ridicules the idea of such "great" duties.

The only thing that bears the semblance of argument in the article, is what the "Editor" says in the last division on 1 Cor. i: 14, respecting Paul's thankfulness that he had baptized no more at Corinth than he had. But in his zeal to show why Paul was thankful that he had baptized no more, viz. lest he might thereby have promoted sectarianism and divisions, and so have drawn the Corinthians away from the simplicity of Christ, (which view of the subject we presume no Christian ever questioned who had read the apostle's remarks in the context,) he entirely forgot or overlooked what Paul says immediately after, viz. "For Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel." Was Paul a Gospel preacher? and was he commissioned especially and directly by Jesus Christ, to preach to Jews and Gentiles, to disciple people of all nations, and to work miracles in the name of Christ, and yet not sent to baptize, while yet baptism is an essential ordinance, and indispensably necessary to discipleship? Believe it who can. Perhaps the "Editor" of the "Primitive Christian" may, we can not. D. S.

THE RECORD

THE SOUTH CAROLINA CONVENTION met in Liberty meeting-house, Fairfield district, October 31st, 1836. Br. Allen Fuller, Moderator; Br. Jacob Feaster, Jr., (layman,) Clerk. The following report and resolutions of a committee appointed for that purpose, were unanimously adopted, the Council and the whole congregation voting in its favor.

Your committee, to whom was referred the subject of a theological seminary, would REPORT,

That while we regard the progress of our cause in the United States as matter of gratitude and astonishment, we consider it, under the blessing of God, as having been the result of the plainness and simplicity of the truths we hold, together with the peace, harmony and Christian love, which have so generally prevailed amongst us, in addition to the purity of life, independence, firmness, zeal, and perseverance manifested by the public advocates of this cause. Having this view of the subject we are decidedly of opinion that a theological seminary ought not to be established by our order.

Because, while we highly appreciate learning and intelligence, we believe the plainness and simplicity of the truths of the Gospel are such, that an institution of this kind is not required, that it would be destructive of that peace, harmony, and love with which we have been blessed; that it would have a direct tendency to lessen the independence, firmness, zeal, and perseverance of those who might receive their theological education thereat; that it would be likely to substitute other qualifications instead of moral character in the candidates for the ministry; and that it would prevent many worthy persons from becoming public advocates for the truth, and, therefore, would destroy the prosperity of the cause.

But though we thus speak, we wish to be distinctly understood as cherishing a high regard for many of our brethren who have expressed a different opinion. We are far from impeaching their motives; but we firmly and solemnly protest against their pressing this subject to the injury of our cause. Observation has clearly proved to us that such institutions have been pernicious to the interests of truth in other denominations, and we are fully persuaded they would be productive of the same consequences among us. Therefore,

Resolved, That this Convention unanimously disapprove the establishment of a theological seminary by the Universalists of the United States.

A committee appointed for the purpose, reported in favor of establishing a seminary of learning in a healthy part of the State, which shall be free from sectarian influence. The constitution was so amended as to prevent any business being transacted in the Council unless it was composed of at least half laymen—to provide for the trial of preachers by laymen, residing in his neighborhood, on written specifications, and after the directions in Matt. xviii: 15-22, and Luke xvii: 3, 4, had been complied with—and to prevent any withdrawal of fellowship from being couched in harsh or unkind language. Appointed Brs. D. R. Coleman, of Fairfield; Samuel Chapman of Newberry, and J. C. Holcomb, of Charleston to be the standing committee of the Convention, to act for it during its recess, receive complaints against members, and provide for the trial of preachers in its fellowship. Appointed Br. T. Fisk to deliver the occasional sermon at the next session—Br. Allen Fuller, substitute. Passed a tribute of respect to Gen. John B. Earle, late of Anderson district, and Col. John Summers, of Newberry, deceased—two eminent and valuable citizens of South Carolina, and active and consistent Universalists. Five sermons were preached by Brs. Linch, Fisk, Fuller, and Mulliken. Nine lay delegates present. Adjourned to meet in Anderson district, on the Friday preceding the first Sunday in August, 1837, and continue in session three days.

NEW SOCIETIES.—A new society, not hitherto noticed, was organized in Lockport, Ontario county, on the 12th of September last, under the labors of Br. Potter. It numbered thirty-one members—has probably much increased since then. Another was formed in Ashtabula, Ohio, in November last. Another in Yarmouth, Mass., on October 31st—it owns the new meeting-house recently erected on a lot of ground, presented for that purpose by a deacon of a Partialist church in that place, and recently dedicated.

NEW PREACHERS.—Br. Zephaniah Baker, of Dudley, Mass., has lately commenced preaching Universalism. Br. Boyden speaks of him as possessing good talents and character. Br. Dunbar B. Harris, whose abilities exerted as President of the Young Men's Universalist Institute, of Boston, Mass., have greatly aided our cause in that city, has also commenced preaching to good acceptance.

ORDINATION.—Br. Otis Warren was ordained, November 9th, in Williamsville, (Newfane,) Vt. Sermon by Br. A. Bugbee.

REMOVALS.—Br. O. A. Skinner has removed from Haverhill, Mass., to take charge of the Fifth Universalist society in Boston. He still remains Editor of the Gospel Sun at the former place. Br. M. H. Smith has removed from Quincy to supply the pastoral charge left vacant by Br. O. A. Skinner at Haverhill. Br. J. Hollister from Pawlet, Vt., to West Granville, N. Y. Br. J. C. Baldwin has removed from some place to Middlebury, Vt. Br. E. M. Wolley from East Hamilton to his farm in Cazenovia. He will continue his ministerial labors at Lebanon until they can procure those of some one else—and preach the remainder of his time in the vicinity of his present residence. Br. J. French has removed from Ellsburg, Jefferson county, to Denmark, Lewis county, where he is engaged to labor one-half the time. We augur well for the cause in that region from this removal. The region about Denmark needed the presence of a preacher.

MEETING-HOUSES.—One in Stafford, Conn., is erected and covered. A subscription of one thousand dollars has been raised towards erecting another in Newton, same State. The societies in these places are prospering under the labors of our active and faithful young Br. F. Hitchcock. A meeting-house is being erected in Ohio City, where Br. Whitney, formerly of this city, is now laboring part of the time.

DEDICATIONS.—A new meeting-house was lately dedicated in Mattpoisett, Mass. Sermon by Br. Ballou of Boston. The society is prosperous under Br. T. K. Taylor's labors. December 1st, the new Union meeting-house in Contoocook village, (Hopkinton,) N. H., was dedicated. Sermon by Br. J. P. Atkinson. More than seven-eighths of the house are owned by Universalists. The day for dedication was beautiful—the house is elegant, and the congregation was large. December 14th, the new meeting-house in Essex, Mass., was dedicated. Sermon by Br. T. Whittemore. A sermon was preached in the afternoon by Br. T. F. King, and a conference or concert of praise held in the evening. December 15th, the new meeting-house in Cabotville, (Springfield,) Mass., was dedicated. Sermon by Br. H. Ballou, also in the evening. Br. C. Spear's efficient labors, we doubt not, have much contributed to the success and prosperity of this society, whose pastor he was until lately. The house has seventy-four pews, which have rented for $800 per annum—the rent of the basement story already pays the interest of the cost of the house.

ITEMS.—The society in Cincinnati, is very prosperous under the labors of Br. West. The second collection for the Orphan Asylum, lately taken up by that society, amounted to about $100—nearly as much as Dr. Beecher's congregation raised for the same purpose. Br. West officiates in turn, with the other clergymen of that city, in the Asylum—no small proof of the liberality of the good people of Cincinnati.

Br. F. W. Baxter, is engaged for three-fourths of his time in Frankfort, Maine. The Universalists own one-fourth in each of two meeting-houses in that town—one in the village; the other in the northwest part of the town. A. B. G.

MEETING-HOUSE DESTROYED.

A letter from Ellicottville, Cattaraugus county—as also the United States Gazette, from Philadelphia, Pa.—conveys to us the intelligence that the new meeting-house lately erected and nearly finished by our friends in the former place, was utterly consumed by fire on the 7th of December last. The fire, it is supposed originated in some shavings. The house was to have been finished before this time. Loss from seven hundred to eight hundred dollars. No insurance.

Trifling as the loss may seem to our wealthy societies, it is a serious one to our friends in that vicinity. They nearly exhausted their society means, to erect this, and are now without a house, and destitute of means sufficient to build another. They intend endeavoring, another season, to try it again, in the hope that some distant brethren will aid them. It is said that many of our opposers in that section, rejoice considerably over this disaster—if so, they but prove their want of manliness and of Christian spirit.

If any friends to the cause can conveniently aid our Ellicottville brethren, we hope they will do it. Remittances for any such purpose, until further directions can be given, may be received at this office—or placed in the hands of any ministering brother, and notice sent to this office. We will provide a way that the sufferers may receive it, when they need it; and if not needed, that it may be returned to the givers. A. B. G.

SOUTHERN PIONEER.—For several weeks we have not been favored with the sight of this periodical. Has Br. Andrews concluded to cast us off, as unworthy an exchange—or, has some one between this and Baltimore appropriated the copy intended for us to some other destination? We pause for a reply. A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Br. Austin's second sheet has been received. Br. T. P. Abell's answer is perfectly satisfactory—let him give himself no further concern about it. Br. M. S., of Bath, N. H., will oblige us by occasionally (as time and inclination favor) sending us a full sheet. Br. J. H. S.'s favors are acceptable.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.—The second Winter Term of this institution will commence on the 23d inst.

THE individual who sent us a $10 Rochester bill about the close of 1836, is informed that counterfeit money will not pay our debts. He will please inform us, as early as convenient, whether he chooses us to return it to him, or destroy it, and charge him with the amount. G. and H.

Br. Sanderson—Please send the Herald to Rev. J. H. Sanford, and to S. R. Crittenden, Belfast, Allegany county, per request of J. H. S.

Br. Tompkins—Please send current volume of the Repository to Miss A. T. Peake, Canajoharie, Montgomery county—and the latter half of current volume to Mr. C. T. Curtis, Madison, N. Y. Charge Br. C.'s to A. B. G.

CANADA.—Our subscribers in Maitland and Merrickville, U. C., will find appointments for their vicinities in the religious notices.

ERRATUM.—In current volume, page 1, column 1, fifth line from bottom of text, for David read Daniel.

* * In Br. Browne's notices, that for Trenton, should read Trenton Falls.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE PRODIGAL'S RETURN.

BY REV. L. C. BROWNE.

The fond father rose from a pillow
Bemoistened with many a tear;
His head was bowed down like the willow,
For one, to his bosom was dear.

The sun had arisen in splendor,
The happy reunion to hail,
When he, with emotions most tender,
Looked out o'er the distant green vale.

A form bent and weary advancing,
Now draws indistinctly to view—
The eye of affection, quick glancing,
His own darling wanderer knew!

With rapture he hastens to meet him,
And fold him in joy to his breast;
With the kiss of affection to greet him,
And welcome him home to his rest.

"O Eber! O Eber! my dearest!
My Eber, again do I see!
Come hither! What is it thou fearest?
O hasten, my lost one, to me!"

"O Father! behold me in pity,
Thy wayward but penitent son;
I've wandered from city to city,
And many vile deeds have I done.

"Thy jewel and gold have I wasted
In riots and wassals impure;
The dregs of the wine-cup have tasted,
And followed the syren's false lure.

"Afar o'er the Aegean waters,
I've wandered from virtue and home;
Have revelled with Corinth's lewd daughters,
And learned the debauches of Rome.

"The prayer and the sacred hosannah
No more could my bosom inspire;
I knelt at the shrine of Diana,
And chaunted the song of desire.

"And oft have I sought (how mistaken!)
To quench my heart burnings in wine—
Unfriended, despised, and forsaken,
I fain would have shared with the swine.

"Of all thy kind words unobservant,
I claim not to call thee my sire;
But make me a menial servant,
'Tis only to this I aspire."

Again did his father embrace him;
With mutual tears did they greet—
"Let white robes and ornaments grace him,
And sandals prepare for his feet:

"Let music resound through my dwelling,
And let the best fating be slain—
Such rapture my bosom is swelling!
Our Eber salutes us again!"

And so let each prodigal spirit
From wand'ring and famine return;
No sinner that owns his demerit
The Lover of sinners will spurn.

CONTINUATION OF THE OFFERS.

PREMIUMS FOR PRIZE TALES AND ESSAYS.

The publishers of the Magazine and Advocate offer premiums to the amount of SIXTY-SIX DOLLARS, as follows:—

1. For the best essay, on the best practicable means of promoting the knowledge and practice of Universalism—Twenty dollars.

2. For the second best essay on the same subject—Ten dollars.

3. For the third best essay on the same subject—two free subscriptions to the Magazine and Advocate for one year—or one, for two years.

[It is designed that the essay shall embrace the best means for teaching the principles of the Gospel not only to the adult, by the preacher, but to the young, by the parent.]

1. For the best religious tale, embracing an illustration of the principles of Universalism—Twenty dollars.

2. For the second best tale of the same character—Ten dollars.

3. For the third best tale of the same character—two free subscriptions to the Magazine and Advocate for one, or one for two years.

writer—but there must be one stated, worthy the principles embraced in it.]

Each essay and each tale to exceed three columns of this paper; in the largest type now used for matter in it; and not to exceed fifteen columns of the same.

The articles to be sent to the undersigned, free of postage, on or before the 6th day of April next, for submission to the decision of an impartial committee, and the after disposal of the proprietors of this paper. To do this properly, each essay or tale should be designated by one or more marks or mottos, and those marks or mottos should be enclosed in a separate paper, sealed, with the author's name within—this enclosure will not be opened until after the decision of the committee has been made.

In deciding on the claims of the various articles that may be submitted for premiums, the committee will be instructed to proceed in the following order with each. 1. Its adaptation to the object for which it is written. 2. The Christian feeling and spirit it breathes. 3. Its literary merit and finish. 4. Its grammatical accuracy and plain expression. 5. Its preparation for the press. 6. Its legibility in the manuscript. The article having the greatest number of these requisites, in the highest perfection, and in the order here named, (if coming under the conditions previously laid down,) will be preferred to all others. Those greatly deficient in them will be rejected altogether, even if they are the only articles of the kind that are offered.

If but one or two essays or tales deserving a premium, are received, the committee may award it any one, or to the two, any two of the premiums here offered. If more than three essays or tales deserving premiums are received, the committee may award to each over that number, a free subscription to this paper for not more than one year, as they deem proper—the objects of our offer being encouragement to authors, as well as the improvement of our paper, and the advancement of the cause.

The award of the committee, names of the successful authors, and one of the essays or tales to which is awarded the highest premium, will be published in this paper, on or before the close of April next.

UNIVERSALIST BELIEF.

A friendly Epistle, designed for the perusal of all Clergymen who hold the doctrine of endless misery, but addressed particularly, to those residing in the town and vicinity of Boston, N. Y.

BY EV. JASON LEWIS.

REVEREND GENTLEMEN—You are aware that a certain sentiment exists in these parts, denominated Universalism, and that it has increased considerably within two or three years, particularly in this town. During this period, and up to the present time, the doctrine has received from you a goodly share of attention; which in such circumstances, is certainly not more than would naturally be expected from honest men, believing, as you profess to do, that the doctrine of the endless sinfulness and misery of a part of mankind, is the immutable truth of Jehovah, revealed in the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Accordingly you have preached much against this new doctrine, so called, and have exhibited no little zeal in the endeavor to arrest its further progress, if not to banish it from the land. Whether your success has been equal to your expectations, or any way proportionate to your endeavors, is not for me to decide. But there is one circumstance to which I would particularly call your attention. In your remarks respecting Universalism, you are in the practice, so far as I know, of misrepresenting it. Whether you are aware of the fact, is another thing. But many, if not most, or all of you, very frequently set forth that Universalists believe, or profess to believe, points of doctrine which they not only do not profess, but some which they totally disavow. I am sorry to know that it is so, but I can not avoid knowing it. I have thought much upon the probable cause or causes which have given rise to such misrepresentation; and I have always been inclined to attribute it to any thing else, rather than to a wilful design of violating the ninth commandment. For to consider you merely as men in common station, desirous of extirpating a hated creed, and at the same time to conclude that you would misrepresent it purposely, is to suppose in you such a want of foresight as is scarcely compatible with even "the wisdom of this world." Because if the doctrine be wholly bad, to misrepresent it, would be to make it appear better than it really is, and thus aid its advancement. And if it be but partly bad, the setting of it forth as worse than it is, is certainly preparing the way for the enlistment of the public sympathies in its behalf, so soon as the fraud shall be detected. But you are not only men, but clergymen, professed servants and imitators of Him in whose mouth was found no guile. Hence, as all can see, to charge you with intentional misrepresentation, is to impeach your characters as ministers of the Gospel, as Christians, and as men. This being the case, I prefer the conclusion, that though Universalism is, in itself, by no means hard to be understood, yet from some cause or causes, separate from obtuseness of intellect, its opposers, as a general thing, do not understand enough of the system to be able to state it fairly. I have therefore thought proper to take up the subject, and shall endeavor to present you such information as I pray, and hope, and trust, may be profitable to you, if not acceptable.

In entering upon our subject, I deem it proper to give the following definition:

Universalism is that system of belief which teaches, that according to the Scriptures, spiritual salvation, as conferred upon mankind, in a hereafter state of being, by "the Father of spirits," through Jesus Christ, His Son, our Lord, shall ultimately be universal, as respects the human race.

The above presents, in a prominent manner, that particular point of doctrine which first gave the system its name; and I beg leave to recommend it to your serious consideration, as a fair and candid statement of Universalism, so far as it goes. I think, also, that it will be found to either express or imply, or lead to, every other article of religious belief held by Universalists. And it ought to be remarked that with the exception of the particular point of doctrine above specified, most or all of our articles of belief, are held by some other Christian sect.

Universalists, as a body, not only allow, but approve, and even take much pains to promote, the free discussion of religious doctrines, and free inquiry upon all religious topics. Hence, as is usually the case, amongst all sects who even tolerate religious inquiry, some diversity of opinion prevails respecting certain points of doctrine.—Yet I hesitate not to say that Universalists differ far less amongst themselves, than their opposers do with one another. And our differences are all upon minor points. In this communication, the views presented will be such as I doubt not would be readily subscribed by nearly every member of the denomination. But be it understood, that though I speak in the name of my brethren, I pledge no man but him who now addresses you.

It does appear to me, that any person of intelligence and candor, who should know no more of Universalism than is embodied in the definition herein given, might reasonably be expected to form a far more favorable opinion of the system, than what its opposers generally express. For example, I cannot think otherwise than that such a person, in such circumstances, though he should feel himself compelled to consider the doctrine untrue, ought in reason to be content with naming it heresy, without going on to denounce it as infidelity. Infidelity is usually understood to be a name for skepticism, atheism, or deism. But Universalism is a "system of belief"—how then can it be skepticism? It recognizes the existence of Almighty God—hence it is not atheism. It teaches that Jesus Christ is the Son of God—it therefore can not be deism. It also acknowledges the authority of the Scriptures, the reality of a future state, etc., etc. Shame on the folly of the assertion so oft repeated, that Universalism is but another name for infidelity! It is properly, and specifically, Christianity, as understood by Universalists. But as we lay no claim to infallibility, we are free to acknowledge that it is quite possible that our views of the Christian religion may not, in every particular, be correct. Yet sure am I, that if some of our views shall prove erroneous, we are but in the same predicament with ninety-nine hundredths of the Christian world.

If it be asked why I should be so sensitive respecting the charge of infidelity as brought against Universalists, I reply, no person who loves our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, loves also to be considered as a scoffer. If Christians of other denominations would feel hurt at being denounced as infidels, and treated as such, how much more a sincere and conscientious Universalist, who probably believes twice as much in Christ as those do who thus unchristianize him! "I speak as to wise men; judge ye what I say."

Permit me now to present you with some more particular specifications of Universalist doctrine.

I. As I have before intimated, and as the definition I have given of Universalism evidently implies, Universalists believe in the existence of one and only one God, the Creator, Supporter, Benefactor, and Governor of all, whose character is revealed in the Scriptures, illustrated in his works and exemplified and demonstrated in the life and conduct of Jesus Christ. They believe the Deity to be possessed of all the attributes and perfections usually ascribed to Him by Christian philosophers and theologians—that He is a Spirit, uncaused, eternal, infinite, independent, immutable, all-pervading, all-knowing, all-wise, all-powerful, and all-controlling—also that he is a being of pure and perfect holiness and love; which last is the same as to say, that in his nature and character, are contained and exemplified all those virtues and excellencies which are known by the names of moral purity or goodness, truth, justice, judgment, equity, faithfulness, righteousness; also benignity, good will, kindness, grace, goodness or benevolence, gentleness, patience, forbearance, pity, compassion, mercy, etc. In other words, they believe all the teachings of Scripture upon this subject; as for example, that there is "One God and Father of all," who is also "Judge of all;" that he is "good to all," "kind to the unthankful and to the evil," and that "his tender mercies are over all his works;" that he is a "just God and a Saviour," "a God of truth, and without iniquity," "with whom is no variableness neither shadow of turning;" that he is "the Almighty God," and "the only wise God," and that "God is love."

II. Universalists believe not only that "there is one God," and in the language of Scripture, "but one God, the Father," but they also believe that there is "one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus," respecting whom they believe all that the Scriptures teach; as for example, that he was "a man approved of God;" that he "is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world," the personage "of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets [in their prophecies] did write;" that he is "the Son of God," "the image of the invisible God," "the beginning [or chief] of the creation of God;" that he "died for us;" "that he rose from the dead;" that he "is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God;" that he "being raised from the dead, dieth no more;" that "to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living;" etc., etc. Or in other words, they believe that Jesus of Nazareth was the promised Christ, or Messiah, expected by the Jews, the personage anointed or commissioned of God to reveal to mankind, more fully and perfectly, the Divine character, and will, and purposes, and to effect the salvation of mankind; that to qualify him for the accomplishment of these objects, the Divine spirit was communicated to him without measure, power and means were bestowed upon him in a plenitude of abundance, he was required to pass through death, was raised to an immortal existence, was exalted to a state of celestial glory, and is constituted Ruler, Governor, Prince, King, Lord, Judge, Redeemer, Deliverer, and Saviour, having jurisdiction over all the human race, not only in this state of being, but also in the invisible world.

III. In accordance with the foregoing, it is believed by Universalists, that the Old and New Testaments contain a true and faithful account of a revelation made from God to man, "at sundry times, and in divers manners," through the prophets, the apostles and Jesus Christ, his Son, and that this account contains numerous and sufficient specifications of the subject matter of said revelation. Of course, they believe in the authenticity of the Scriptures, and their authority in matters of doctrine and morals.

IV. Universalists believe that man is "the offspring of God;" that we have "all one Father," even "the Father of spirits;" and that all persons, even though they may be undutiful and disobedient children, are authorised to address the divine Being by the appellation of Father, and are directed and commanded to pray "Our Father who art in heaven,.....forgive us our sins."

V. It is believed by Universalists that though all are God's children by creation, yet that those who imbibe his spirit, and imitate his character, become his children in a higher and more religious sense, being such from moral resemblance, and that such are represented in the Scriptures as being "begotten of God," "born of God," "begotten again," "born again," "born from above," "born of the spirit," "sons of God," "children of God," etc. For example, "As many as are led by the spirit of God, they are the sons of God:" "Love your enemies,.....that ye may be the children of your Father who is in heaven:" "See that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently, being born again:" "Beloved, let us love one another: for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not, knoweth not God; for God is love."

VI. Universalists believe that man is an accountable being, a moral agent or actor, and that therefore God "will render to every man according to his deeds," or will cause, (to use the language of another scripture,) "that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad;" that is to say, will reward every individual for all his good deeds, and will punish every individual for all his evil deeds; hence, that rewards and punishments are positively certain. "He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons." Again, God "will by no means clear the guilty."

VII. Though it is declared in the Scriptures, that God will by no means clear the guilty, yet in the same passage we read of his "forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin." And as the scripture writers so frequently speak of "the forgiveness of sins," etc., but never mention the forgiveness of punishment, except, perhaps, in some such case as that in Acts viii: 24, Universalists therefore believe in the forgiveness or remission, not of punishment, but of sins.

VIII. In like manner, they believe that salvation is a deliverance from sin, not from deserved punishment; for, said the angel who predicted the birth of our Lord, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus [or Saviour]; for he shall save his people from their sins." Says Paul, "All Israel shall be raised: as it is written, There shall come out of Zion a Deliverer, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. For this is my covenant unto them, when I shall take away their sins." And says another, "Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world."

offending brother "seven times." But let them hearken to the reply of Christ, to such limited views:—"I say not unto thee, until seven times; but, until seventy times seven." The precept of Christ, thus expressed, is not all which should stimulate us to cherish and cultivate forgiveness continually. Behold, he hath given us an example. Before we give our enemies over to despair, let us review the sufferings of our Master, and mark the way by which he overcame the enmity of his tormentors. What did he not endure, and what barrier prevented the exercise of that principle of forgiveness which conquers enemies? Saducees and Pharisees combined their forces, to sink at once his cause and himself to destruction. But these open enemies probed not his heart with the keenest dagger. This bitterest pang was reserved for Judas to inflict. In view of this, hear Christ say, in the magnitude of his grief—"he that eateth bread with me, hath lifted up his heel against me." Look, Christians, see Judas leading the "chief priests and the scribes," armed with sword and spear, to take away your Master for crucifixion. When Judas comes up to Christ, with his malignant crew, what is the language of your Saviour? Does he tell his betrayer, he need not look again for mercy—that wrath and perdition must henceforth be his unmixed portion? Harken, ye who have enemies seeking your ruin: and ye who have set yourselves up as lights in the moral world, give ear. What is the language? "FRIEND, wherefore art thou come!" It was the language of friendship and affection. And what was the effect upon the corrupted heart of Judas? Did it lead him to cast off restraint, vent anew his calumnies upon the head of Jesus, and to retire from the field rejoicing in his conquest? no, far otherwise. This manifestation of his Master's tenderness and forgiveness, had a power upon his heart which malice itself could not withstand. It brought him upon the knee of penitence, and extorted from his lips the soul-melting exclamation, "I have sinned, in that I have betrayed the innocent blood!"

Indulgent reader, have you an enemy who was once your friend? Remember, Christ hath given you an example, by following which you can overcome his enmity, and enjoy his society and friendship. It can not be done by curses and retaliations. If you would effectually conquer your enemy, you should do it so as to obtain the victory. But, mind ye, he gets the victory, if you manifest an unrelenting disposition, or if you do not forgive him. The only way to destroy an enemy, so as to be victorious, is to make him a friend. This is the way that Christ destroyed his enemies, and he is still engaged in the same heavenly work by the power of the Gospel. "Go," kind reader, "and do likewise." If thou hast an enemy who is seeking to blast thy reputation, forgive him, pity his errors and treat him as a friend; until kneeling for peace, he will exclaim, "I have sinned, in that I have betrayed the innocent."

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER II.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

CLAIMS ON YOUTH.

The young should be fully aware that there are claims upon them, of the most important and enduring nature. It is, therefore, highly necessary, that they should become acquainted with the character of these claims, that they may qualify themselves to discharge their demands in an efficient manner.

1. Society has claims on the Young.—In every civilized and well regulated community, there are certain important duties, of a public and general character, which must be properly discharged, to insure the safety and welfare of its members.—Those who now execute these trusts will soon become old and pass from the stage of life. They can not always remain, to instruct by their wisdom, and guide by their counsels; but as time's unceasing wheels roll on, they recede from our view, and no more mingle with us. "I look forward a few short years, and see the aspect of society entirely changed. The venerable fathers who have borne the heat and burden of the day, are dropping, one after another, into the grave, and soon they will all be gone. Of those, too, who are now the acting members of society, some have passed the meridian of life, others are passing it, and all will soon be going down its decline, to mingle with the generations who have disappeared before them from this transient scene of action. To a mind seriously contemplating this mournful fact, it is an inquiry of deep interest—who are to rise up and fill their places? To whom are to be committed the invaluable interests of society? Who are to sustain its responsibilities and discharge its duties? You anticipate the answer.* It is upon the young that these duties and responsibilities will devolve. You will soon be called to occupy all the various stations now held by those more advanced in life. You will become parents, and guardians, and directors, in all that pertains to the welfare of society. Soon will it depend upon you to determine, whether religion, morality and virtue shall prevail and shed their benign influences upon community, or whether infidelity, immorality and deep corruption, shall blight all that is valuable in our midst. Soon will it be your prerogative to declare, whether institutions of learning shall be fostered and multiplied, sending their light into the dark abodes of ignorance and raising man to that elevation in knowledge for which his faculties so eminently fit him, or whether the darkness and ignorance of ancient times, with all their follies, their superstitions and wretchedness, shall return and shut out the beams of science and art, and plunge this happy land into degradation and ruin. Soon will it be with you to decide, whether wholesome restraints, good order, harmony and peace, shall prevail and continue to impart their blessings, or whether all shall be unbridled profligacy and wild anarchy. Soon will it be in your power to perpetuate and hand down to succeeding generations, those wonderful improvements in the arts and sciences, and all that pertains to our prosperity which have so eminently characterized the present age, and which are sending their blessings to earth's far ends, or whether the spirit of improvement shall be arrested in its valuable career, all anticipations of future exaltation and perfection be cut off, and the mind, with all its high capabilities, made to stagnate in stupid indolence! In fine, all those interests which render life a blessing, will ere long come into the keeping and control, and be at the disposal of those who are now young.

Do you not, then, perceive that society has claims, deep, abiding, important claims upon you? And how will you answer them? Surely I can receive but one reply to this inquiry, from all youth of reflection and forethought. You undoubtedly discover the propriety, yea, the urgent necessity of preparing to discharge these claims with honor to yourselves and advantage to your fellow-beings. It becomes you, therefore, to study diligently the character of our government and the genius of our institutions—to meditate upon the peculiar nature of the privileges and blessings which we, as a people, enjoy—to reflect upon the nature of the true interests of society, and of the most efficient modes of forwarding them. As a spur to these duties, you have but to reflect upon the immense sacrifice of treasure and of life, by which our numerous high advantages were obtained. The blood of our fathers cries to us from the stained battle-fields of old, to cherish "as the apple of the eye," those exalted privileges, which it was shed to obtain. To this voice you will not turn a deaf ear. Permit not selfishness to chill your energies in this work of preparation. Let it be remembered that you are bound by a thousand ties, to your fellow-beings—your interests and enjoyments are indissolubly interwoven with theirs—and, therefore, in discharging public du-

FORGIVENESS.

BY REV. MERRITT SANFORD.

In this fluctuating world, where "offences must come," and where our happiness depends upon cultivating "a right spirit within us," forgiveness should have "free course and be glorified." To forgive, is the noblest act of humanity, the greatest work of the philosopher and the glory of the Christian. How it quenches the fire of revenge, softens the cruelty of resentment, and arrests the tornado of crime! But, alas! how few are the hearts that are pure enough for this Promethean spark; and how many, even under the garb of Christianity, harbor a spirit of retaliation, instead of forgiveness!

Too many there are, who, like Peter, think they have performed miracles if they forgive an ties, and advancing public prosperity, you are but securing your own welfare and happiness. "He who does no good, gets none. He who cares not for others, will soon find that others will not care for him." He who neglects public interests, has no just right to expect that the public will cherish him; and the tendency of such neglect, is to produce this result.

2. The world has claims upon the youth of this land.—Here, under the blessings of Heaven, our fathers were enabled to establish a government upon the broad principles of civil and religious freedom. Here man enjoys all those rights to which, as an intellectual, religious and social being, he is entitled by nature and immutable equity. Here we are blessed with every privilege and with every means of comfort and happiness that can be expected in this imperfect state of existence. Here we enjoy liberty of speech, liberty of the press, liberty on all matters connected with religion, liberty in every respect, as far as accountable beings can possess it.

But let it be remembered that here only, are these privileges enjoyed. In every other section of the globe, mankind are deprived, to a greater or less extent, of these blessings of freedom.—Except in this land, justice, equality and liberty, in their true acceptation, are unknown on earth; and man's dearest rights are trampled beneath the iron hoof of tyranny! Among the greater proportion of mankind, all that elevates human nature, and causes it to put forth its high powers and capabilities, is wanting. Now if the nations of the earth are ever to become emancipated, it must be accomplished by the spirit which goes forth from this people—by the example which the inhabitants of these United States, set before the world. Let the flame of liberty which has been kindled in this land, continue to burn in its pristine splendor, and in due time, its pure and holy light will penetrate and dispel the darkness of other hemispheres. It will flash from land to land, from shore to shore, from the rivers even unto the ends of the earth—until man, every where, shall enjoy all those rights which his Creator has made him capable of exercising. But if the principles of freedom here established, become neglected—if the love for its blessings be swallowed up by selfishness, ignorance or corruption—the sacred flame will be quenched in darkness, the hopes of millions will expire, and earth again become an universal Aceldama!

And upon whom depends the preservation and perpetuity of our free institutions? Upon the young, does this high responsibility rest! Our fathers obtained the invaluable boon of liberty, by their sufferings and perseverance; and it devolves upon the generation now coming upon the stage of action, to determine the question, whether their toils and blood shall prove unavailing, or whether the fruits of their labor shall descend to posterity. Upon the young of the present age, depends to a great degree, the solution of the important problem, whether man is capable of governing himself—capable of enjoying liberty, without licentiousness and anarchy—or whether he can only be restrained by tyranny and oppression. This great experiment is now in progress; and the eyes of the philanthropist and the patriot—the eyes of the enslaved and the oppressed, throughout the world—are turned towards this land, and fixed, intensely fixed upon the young especially! With deep anxiety do they watch for every indication which shall develop the nature of the principles which are cherished, and which will, ere long, be brought into a testing activity, by the youth of this Union.

The world, thus, has claims—important claims—upon the young of this nation—claims recognized by philanthropy and humanity. The voice of enslaved millions, comes up on every breeze, beseeching the young, who are soon to become the pillars of our republic, to cherish and feed that flame of freedom, whose light they behold at a far distance, until they shall be enabled to bask in its grateful beams. Will you not listen to these cries?—will you not recognize these claims, and be admonished of the importance of the position which you occupy? "Never, since the creation, were the youth of any age or country, so imperiously called upon to exert themselves, as those of this country. Never, before, were there so many important interests at stake. Never were such immense results depending upon a generation of men, as upon that which is now approaching the stage of action. The rising millions of this land, are destined, according to all human probability, to form by far the greatest nation that ever constituted an entire community of freemen, since the world began. To form the character of these millions, involves a greater amount of responsibility, individual and collective, than any other work to which humanity has ever been called. Now, it is for you, my young friends, to determine whether these weighty responsibilities shall be fulfilled. It is for you to decide, whether this greatest of free nations, shall at the same time be the best."* How important that the young should qualify themselves for the discharge of the high responsibilities thus resting upon them! How important that they should study the nature of enlightened liberty, and of the most effectual means of perpetuating our valuable institutions, with all their increasing blessings, down to posterity!†

3. Your Maker has claims upon you.—These claims are paramount to all others. He has given you life, sensation, and all the high endowments and capabilities which you possess. He has greatly elevated you in the vast scale of being, and given you dominion over all other forms of earthly existence. He has bestowed upon you numerous advantages in political and religious respects—permitting you to exist under the sway of just and equitable laws, which insure you "liberty and the pursuit of happiness," and enable you to worship God as your conscience dictates. In the land where your lot has been cast, every thing that can conduce to human improvement, elevation and happiness, is profusely scattered round. These blessings have come from the goodness of your Creator. Unsolicited and unmerited on your part, has he thus lavished the highest of earthly favors upon you; and you are honestly indebted to him for them. The Deity, therefore, has lasting claims upon you, to discharge this debt, as far as your capabilities and opportunities will allow. In return for his gifts, he claims of you a due cultivation and exercise of your intellectual and moral faculties. He bestowed them upon you, not to lie dormant, but for activity and improvement; and that activity and improvement he claims. He has claims upon your gratitude, your veneration and love, for his continued kindness and his tender mercies. He has, also, claims upon your obedience. His laws are instituted and exercised over the children of men, not for their injury, but for their benefit—to lead them into paths of peace and happiness; and he has therefore every just right to demand the obedience of mankind.—These claims of the Creator, exist properly against you. They grow out of the nature of the benefits conferred upon you. And such is the character and undoubted value of the favors granted, that he is justified in urging and enforcing these claims, if we do not fulfil them voluntarily. And what renders these claims still more worthy your consideration, and portrays the goodness of God in characters surpassingly lovely, is, that in complying with them, you are only doing that which improves your character, enlarges your mind, and ministers greatly to your true enjoyments.

* Young Man's Guide.

† Let not the ladies imagine the remarks under this and the preceding heads, inapplicable to themselves. I deem them highly appropriate to their consideration.—Although it would be improper for them to become politicians, in the general acceptation of that word—yet that they can exert a powerful and enduring influence, either for good or evil, upon the institutions of our country, is an undoubted truth. They can most sensibly affect the character of brothers, husbands and especially sons.—They can influence them to public virtue and usefulness—to an interest in the welfare of the nation and the rights of mankind—or stupify them into negligence and inattention. In what work more worthy and important, can a mother engage, than instilling into the mind of a son, a love for the public good, and for the principles of civil and religious liberty! Let females, therefore, be interested in these topics, as subjects with which their happiness is intimately blended. Every woman should become familiar with the principles of our system of government, and with those peculiar characteristics which render it preferable to all other forms.

Let your minds become impressed with the importance of the claims which I have thus briefly brought to your notice. Reflect upon their character, the grounds upon which they rest, and the influence which their fulfilment will exercise upon your own happiness, and the welfare of your fellow-beings. And let the spirit arise within you, to meet their demands with that energy and fidelity which is the best guaranty of success.

NATURE OF FEAR.

BY REV. L. C. BROWNE.

There are evidently two kinds of fear spoken of in Scripture; or rather, the word fear is used, in Scripture, in two different acceptations. Mr. Webster says, "In Scripture, fear is used to express a filial, or a slavish passion." It sometimes signifies a dread—a shuddering anticipation; and at others, a sentiment of reverence or respect.

It is in the former sense that the word is used 1 John iv: 18. "There is no fear in love; but perfect love casteth out fear; because fear hath torment. He that feareth, is not made perfect in love." The word is used in the other sense, Prov. ix: 10. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." Eccl. xii: 13. "Fear God and keep his commandments." 1 Peter iii: 15. "And be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear."

Fear, in this latter acceptation of the term, is laudable, and perfectly consistent with the faith of the Gospel and the Christian character. In the former sense, it is an ignoble passion and never led to the performance of a noble action.

These remarks were suggested by the receipt of a religious paper, from a friend, sometime since, containing an article on Fear. It was written by a gentleman of considerable reputation as a teacher, and my friend had marked it as referring to a conversation which the writer held with the writer of this, last June. The gentleman was surprised at the assertion that "fear never led to the performance of a noble action;" and among other instances, refers to the conduct of Noah and Lot, who he says, were moved by fear.

It may be answered that the nobleness of an act consists not in its consequences, (unless such consequences were contemplated,) but in the motive that inspires it. And if Noah and Lot were moved simply by the fear of death, in escaping the flood and flame, these acts were no more noble in them, than they would have been in any other individuals. It would have been equally noble in Pharaoh to have attempted an escape from the waters of the Red Sea.

CONFERENCE.

A Universalist Conference was held at Portageville, Allegany county, on the 24th and 25th of this month. The congregation was large and attentive. They contained individuals from the ranks of our opposers—all, however, seemed interested in knowing the truth. They appeared to be anxious to obtain and enjoy durable treasures of Gospel hope and heavenly promise.

Sermons were preached on the occasion, by Brs. I. Billings, C. Morton, T. P. Abell, I. Babcock and Lucius Brown. Usual addresses, by Br. Morton. Br. Babcock labors in Portageville one-fourth of the time. Hitherto he has had the soul-cheering satisfaction of seeing the work of the Lord prosper in his hands. May Heaven bless him and our holy cause, wherever he may go.

T. P. ABELL.

LETTER FROM BR. GREGORY.

Toward the close of last volume, I noticed a pamphlet published by Br. Gregory, in which he handled very severely, and censured too indiscriminately, temperance societies and their members, and especially attempted to prove the pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, to be opposed to the teachings of the Bible—also, the ridicule, invectives and appeals to prejudice used by some brethren at the East, against said pamphlet. I did not mean to “rebuke” either party, but to dissuade them from measures better calculated to destroy peace and affection, than to convince the judgment—to ruin each other’s characters, than to refute errors. In reply to that article, Br. Gregory has sent us the following letter, which I cheerfully insert. My forgiveness for his almost vindictive accusations of me, some years ago, was given him the next day, when he refused to retract them—for, as I then said, he knew not what he did. That forgiveness has never been retracted—he has it yet. I sympathise with him on his being subjected to the same charges from others, and still more so, as the violent severity of his pamphlet, and many injudicious expressions in it, give his accusers an advantage over him, and enable them to give a show of fairness to their charges, however false they may be. Br. Gregory will, I trust, learn charity to those who differ from him in relation to measures, from the lesson he is now reading, nor suffer his zeal as a new convert to any question, to eat him up, or ruin the cause he advocates. It is not necessary to destroy a man, in order to beat him in argument—unless he has truth on his side.

A. B. G.

BR. GROSH—From the time I first saw your paper I have been pleased with its judicious management—and therefore I felt it a duty incumbent upon me to do what little I could for its support.

The particular good quality of the Magazine is the independence manifested by its Editors. They started the work with the promise, that they would contend earnestly for RELIGIOUS LIBERTY, and the right of private judgment. On the subject of religion, our opposers have had “fair play,” and have had the privilege of laying their arguments before the Universalist public: and on the subject of abstinence, and the measures adopted to suppress intemperance, articles have been published for and against. But I know not that any Universalist or Partialist brother has been denied the use of your paper to vindicate his character and sentiments, against aught advanced in it. And I sincerely hope that no one will ever have cause to complain in this respect. Universalists profess much liberality, consequently we expect more from them, than from their opposing brethren. But when one brother assails another—misrepresents his sentiments, and endeavors to prejudice the public against him—it shows (in my humble opinion) that his profession is all a farce!

It will be recollected, that you took occasion to rebuke Mr. Whittemore, Editor of the Boston Trumpet, for his illiberal remarks on “The Bramble.” That Editor (and others) stated that I was opposed to temperance. I requested him to take back the assertion—But he refused!!

You will likewise remember, Br. Grosh, that you thought me severe, in my animadversions on temperance societies—and you referred to my denunciations against you, a few years ago, for not falling in with those measures. Well, Br. Grosh, I honestly confess that I did you wrong—and now take the opportunity of asking your forgiveness—“To err is human, to forgive divine.” But what was the charge I brought against you? The same that Mr. Whittemore and others have brought against me, viz. that you were opposed to temperance. As well might I contend, that you are opposed to religion because your views on that subject clash with the Partialist’s. I consider your views of temperance, to be compatible with reason and revelation.

But some will say, “this supposes a change of your sentiments, on that subject.” I think not, when fairly understood. I never held to total abstinence, as held in New-England. I have always contended for temperance, and probably always shall. But I have changed my opinion in regard to the measures adopted in our land, to make people temperate. In short, Br. Grosh, I was (in those days, when I assailed you,) a young convert—and you know how young converts feel. I supposed that all who would not adopt certain measures, were opposed to temperance itself—Hence my assertions. If my friends in your vicinity wish to know what has changed my opinions, I will inform them.

Trusting that your paper will pursue the same straight forward course, that it has done formerly, I shall ever feel bound to support it, and remain your friend and brother,

JOHN GREGORY.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

REV. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL vs. UNIVERSALISM.

The following important discussion was commenced, some months since, in the columns of the Millennial Harbinger, a monthly periodical, edited and published at Bethany, Va., by Rev. Alexander Campbell, the celebrated controversialist who successfully confuted and triumphed over the noted atheist, Robert Owen, at Cincinnati, a few years since, and is now, the leader of the class of Christians calling themselves Disciples, or advocates of the ancient order of things, but commonly called by other denominations, Campbellites. The first article is addressed to Mr. Campbell and signed “Spencer;” to which Mr. C. replies in the same number. The next was written by Br. G. W. Montgomery, of Auburn, in answer to Mr. Campbell, and replied to by him in the Harbinger of February, 1836. Here the discussion rested, till the present time. The discussion will now be revived and continued. We shall first publish the four articles above mentioned, then give a couple of brief notes from Br. Montgomery explaining the reasons why the controversy is transferred from his hands to ours, after which we shall answer Mr. C.’s last article: and the discussion will be continued and published entire in the Magazine and Advocate and in the Millennial Harbinger.

D. SKINNER.

No. 1—Spencer to Mr. Campbell.

RESPECTED SIR—You will not suspect me of insincerity or flattery when I assure you, that I know of no person in whose literary and biblical attainments I have a higher opinion than in yours. Hence, the propriety of my selecting you as one at whose hand to solicit help in some matters of importance, about which I have some difficulties. As I have some leisure from secular engagements, I have concluded that I could not do better than to employ those moments in disclosing to you those difficulties, a solution of which would be of importance to many of the community as well as to myself.

I begin with the Greek word gehenna. Dr. Adam Clarke says that gehenna is a compound of two Greek words, ghe and hinom, and means the Valley of Hinnom, south-east of Jerusalem. Mr. William tells us about the same words, and further observes that in this valley was kept a continual fire, from the days of Josiah, king of Israel, to consume dead bodies and unclean things. From the name of this valley originated the word gehenna, which is translated hell.

No. 21st of the Appendix to the new translation of the Living Oracles, says gehenna is compound of ge and hinom, the name of a person.

It does not appear from all the data before me, that the term gehenna, was ever used by the Jews to express future punishment, even down to the days of Josephus. Hence it would seem, that as the Scriptures were all written prior to the days of Josephus, the word gehenna was never used by our Saviour nor his apostles to express future punishment; but was used by them in reference to the Valley of Hinnom, near Jerusalem. So the phrase hell fire means the fire of Hinnom, in which the filth of the city was consumed, and where criminals were sometimes burned to death.

Thus it seems that hell fire and damnation of hell simply mean temporal judgments executed in the Valley of Hinnom; and so we get a clue to the phrase unquenchable fire. This figure of expression would be very readily drawn from the circumstance of that fire of gehenna, being continually burning in the Valley of Hinnom, to consume the filth, and keep offenders in awe. The fire of gehenna was a place of capital punishment among the Jews, and calculated to terrify the mind; it was, therefore, a natural figurative usage, to express any severe judgment inflicted in this life. Thus Jeremiah calls it a fire that shall not be quenched, chap. vii: 20. See also chap. xvii: 27; Isaiah i: 31, and xxxiv: 8, 9, 10, 11. Temporal judgments are alluded to in the foregoing quotations; are they not?

Now, my dear Sir, if these things be so, how can we prove or rationally imbibe and sustain the doctrine that there is an eternal punishment for sinners beyond this life? Shall we say the Saviour, in speaking of gehenna, used it as an emblem of hell? Doctors Clarke and Campbell tell us that the Jews made the Valley of Hinnom an emblem of a place of punishment after death. But when did the Jews make this emblematic use of gehenna? Long after the days of our Saviour, and then they made it an emblem of the Pagan hell, the notion of which they borrowed from the Chaldeans.

Hell, says Dr. Adam Clarke, is derived from the Anglo-Saxon helan, which, in the Saxon language, signifies to cover or conceal. Hence the slating or tiling of a house in Cornwall, and the covering of a book in Lancashire, are called helling. “The term, hell” says the Doctor, “is now used to signify the place of the damned; but the word in the original has no such ideas attached to it.” And although the Doctor opines that our Lord used the term gehenna as an emblem of the place of future punishment, yet he does not venture to use it himself in that way, but simply calls it “the place of the damned spirits.” [Notes on Matt. xxv: 26.]

Now does it not appear that mankind have been shamefully hoodwinked by the priesthood in these matters? Have we not repeatedly had our ears stunned with the declamations of hell fire and brimstone, and when the truth comes out they all admit that the Valley of Hinnom, a place near Jerusalem, is alluded to by our Lord in those expressions. Some of the Jews imbibed the Pagan idea of future punishment of the wicked; and after the destruction of their city and temple, having seen so many dead carcases consumed in the Valley of Hinnom, they held the place in such utter abhorrence they made it an emblem of the infernal regions of Pluto. And after the Heathen became too enlightened to give further credence to such notions, they were engrafted with the mild and merciful Gospel of the compassionate Son of God.

Will it be admitted that the Jews borrowed their notion of a future punishment from the Chaldeans, while in captivity at Babylon? and is it not well known that they also borrowed the term by which those Pagans spoke of their place of punishment in their world of ghosts? Every Jewish writer, from the time they imbibed their notion of future punishment, spoke of the place by the term hades, until long after the days of our Saviour. Josephus speaks of it by this term, and I know of no Jewish writer, from the Babylonish captivity to Josephus, that speaks of these ghostly regions by any other name than that of hades. Hades is a compound of a, negative, and idien, to see; and literally means hidden, invisible, or obscure. Hades expresses the state of dislodgment of the soul from the body, but does not express the nature of that state only as it regards its obscurity. It may be a state of happiness or misery.

Orthodox critics say the outward and primary meaning of gehenna is the Valley of Hinnom, and was used by the Jews as an emblem of a future state of punishment. Before the name of one place can be used as an emblem of another, the place for which the emblem is used must be known to exist. Now I simply ask, By what name was this place of punishment (if there was one) known before gehenna was used to express an idea of it? Our critics will not admit that either the Hebrew sheol or the Greek hades is a proper name by which this nameless place can be rightly expressed. It appears this "place of damned spirits" never had a name until long after the days of our Saviour, when some pious Jews thought proper to act as godfather to this place of damned spirits, and consecrate it to the valley in which his forefathers executed criminals—and thus furnish Christians with a hell for sinners. If the doctrine of a place of future punishment be a truth of revelation, is it not reasonable to suppose that some term of definite import, by which this place of damned spirits might be expressed, without borrowing the name of a valley in Judea, through the aid of Jewish chimera and superstition, would have been employed?

Now, Sir, if the Scriptures, both Jewish and Christian, can furnish evidence to prove a punishment for sinners after death, do let me have it; and if such punishment is established, then I want to know the nature of such punishment in point of duration.

Aion and aionios are the Greek terms which are in the New Testament translated everlasting and eternal. Aion occurs 117 times in the Greek version of the Scriptures, and is variously rendered. It occurs in the adjective form 69 times; also, differently translated. See 2d Balfour, page 251.

The corresponding word in Hebrew to these two Greek terms is olem; and in Latin it is avum. "The Hebrew olem and the Greek aion are both used to express a limited time; but, in general, a time, the limits of which is unknown." So says Dr. Clarke. "The Greek aion denotes time finite or infinite."—Ewing.

"Aion is a compound of two words, ai and on, always being. It denotes duration or continuation of time, but with great variety." This definition is given by Parkhurst. And on the Hebrew olem he says, "It seems to be much more frequently used for an indefinite than for an infinite time." In his Greek Lexicon, on the words aion and aionios, he says, "The Hebrew olem answers as the corresponding word for these two words in the Greek of the Seventy; which words," says he, "denote time hidden from man, whether definite or indefinite." "The words kedesh and oa, rendered by Turretine eternity, are like the Greek aion, that also signifies any thing ancient, which has endured, or is to endure for a long period."—Professor Stuart.

This is the substance of what all learned critics say with respect to the use of the Hebrew and Greek words which are translated eternal, etc. Olem is the original word from which the two Greek words in question are rendered. Hence it is, as seems to me, by the use of that word that we are to determine the sense—the true scriptural sense of everlasting, eternal, etc.

Olem, in Hebrew, signifies any thing old or ancient. Hence we read of the old (olem) way, the olem land marks, the olem times, etc. Circumcision is called the olem covenant—that is, the everlasting; the priesthood of Aaron is called an olem priesthood. All these, and many other everlastings, are translated from the Hebrew olem, and have had their beginnings and endings, and in this mode of existence, and in no case are they to be understood as relating to eternity.

Macknight and Wakefield both agree that aion and avum are used to express a limited time. For instance, the age of a man, or that of a child, if it should die at one day old. The word is used among the Greeks in a relative sense—it means a longer or a shorter period, according to the nature of the thing to which it is applied—as we use the phrase a long time. When we speak of a man who lives to be very old, we say he lived a long time; if we speak of one who died at twenty, we say he lived a short time. If a person should lie sick eight weeks, we would say he was sick a long time; but if one were to go to Jerusalem and return in six months, we would say he was gone but a short time. If one had to hold his finger in the fire but for one minute, he would say it was a long time. In this sense it seems the Hebrew olem, the Greek aion, the Latin avum, and the English everlasting are used. When the Hebrews or Greeks spoke of a man's life time, they called it olem or aion—forever, everlasting, always being.

Now, Sir, I cannot avoid three conclusions as the result of all research which I am able to make in these matters; which I will name. The first is this: If gehenna means the Valley of Hinnom, near Jerusalem, then the Scriptures do not teach a punishment beyond the Jordan of death. 2d. If a future punishment should be proved, we have no knowledge in reference to the time of its duration; for there is no certainty whether olem or aionios punishment is one minute or a thousand years, or just a person's life time. 3d. If olem or aionios punishment belongs exclusively and is confined to this life, how can we get aionios zoe (eternal life) to extend its boundaries over or beyond the narrow limits of the present existence? A hint to the wise is sufficient. In carefully examining this communication, you will, I think readily apprehend my difficulties—a solution of which will confer a favor on several of the Lord's disciples, as well as your servant.

Your affectionate friend—and, forsooth, your brother in the Lord,

SPENCER.

No. 2.—Mr. Campbell to Spencer.

MY DEAR SIR—In all that appertains to religion, the first thing with me is, What say the Scriptures? The previous question undoubtedly is, Is the Book of the Law, and is the Book of the Gospel of divine authority? This question being decided, (and with me it has been long since most certainly decided in the affirmative,) what remains is to regard all its developments of the vast unseen and unbounded future as fixed and certain principles, no more to be doubted than the axioms of the most exact and demonstrative sciences. Faith, then, and not reason alone, is the rule of thought, of feeling, and of action.

Every thing in religion is supernatural. Its hopes and its fears are drawn from oracles superhuman and divine. No natural man, by all his senses and perceptions, by all his reflections and reasonings, unaided by the lamp of eternity, could arrive at the knowledge of immortality. Eternal life and eternal punishment, "everlasting salvation" and "everlasting destruction" are not deductions of reason, are not inferences drawn from the data of material nature, but revelations from the sempiternal Author of human existence.

That the words of this message are to be fairly interpreted not by by-laws and private canons, but by the universal and long since established laws in the dominions of language and mind, is also a principle as well ascertained as that God has spoken in human speech to mortal man. Through the imagery of nature, and the costume of society, ideas of things divine, spiritual and eternal, are conveyed by the spirit of wisdom and revelation into the mind of man: therefore, that imagery and those variant costumes of society must be understood as the stipulated signs of thought antecedent to a clear and full apprehension of the things revealed.

We have long since unanimously agreed that things figuratively represented, are to be understood in accordance with such representations; and that the unfigurative delineations of things are ever to be the landmarks of thought and inquiry by which the interpretations of metaphor, parable, and allegory are to be authoritatively decided. I say, unanimously; for all the educated of all parties and of all creeds have been compelled to this conclusion. Hence, when without figure, and with all the clearness and authority of supreme law, it is promulgated by the Christian Lawgiver, "He that shall believe and shall have been immersed shall be saved; and he that will not believe shall be damned, or condemned"—no allusion to ancient customs—no figurative representations through the imagery of nature, or costume of society, can have authority to make it read or mean, "He that shall believe, and shall have been immersed, shall be saved; and he that will not believe shall also be saved." Saved and condemned are opposites, and no reasoning upon any figure, custom, or form of speech, can make them identical. If saved is temporal, so is condemned; if saved is spiritual, so is condemned; if saved is corporeal, so is condemned: but saved and condemned are two states, fates, or fortunes, that are perfect contrasts. Life and death, good and evil, happiness and misery, yes and no, will as readily and as rationally mean one and the same thing, as saved and damned. These are by the Judge of all, by the Judge of the supreme court of heaven, declared to be the fate inexorable of two classes of mankind. Belief and unbelief are not the same; neither is salvation and condemnation the same thing—they form not the same character, and cannot issue in the same state—it is impossible.—Therefore, reasonings upon gehenna, and theory based on figure, or on the supposed nature and perfections of the Deity, must stand awant when they issue in results that falsify the promulgations of Heaven's own Lawgiver and man's Redeemer.

All that you, my dear Sir, say about gehenna, and more than you have said, may be admitted, (and indeed I have said more on the abuse of this term and its correlates than you have said, in the way of definition and illustration; and sometimes in the way of censure on those "hell-fire preachers," who seem to be guided more by apocalyptic vision and figurative representations, known only in Judea, but no where found in the teachings of the apostles to the Gentiles, than by the style of the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles;) and yet eternal life and eternal death remain the immutable and invincible sanctions of God's last message to mankind; and yet your inferences and conclusions must be cordially and unequivocally repudiated by all the believers of Christ's Gospel. I say, in one short sentence, your remarks on gehenna and its correlates may be admitted as indisputable; and yet your inferences, or your seeming inferences, are essentially illogical and unscriptural—and, as such, must be repudiated.

The same concessions I would extend to your quotations and remarks on hades, on olem, and aion, and with all these criticisms and reasonings before me, I must reject your inferences as wholly at fault in the presence of all the oracles of reason, the decisions of logic, and the plain and unfigurative declarations of the apostles. I might, perhaps, make some exceptions to the extent and applications of your criticisms, and to the style of your reasonings upon these words; but to save time and labor (with me always a desideratum) I will concede the whole, and show that your inferences are necessarily and unavoidably to be rejected by every man who believes the apostles' doctrine:—

1st. Because your reasonings, by one fatal sweep, destroy the eternity of God and the immortality of man; for if the words olem, aionion, avum, [your avum is not Latin,] everlasting, eternal, applied to the destruction of the wicked, mean not duration without end—then have we no words in human speech that certify us that God, angels, or saints shall have duration without end. One of the oracles of reason and one of the decisions of logic say, that what proves too much proves nothing. Your reasonings, then, prove too much for you as well as for me. Therefore, you must reconsider the matter, if you please. There is no word in human language that expresses duration without end, which is not applied to the future punishment of the wicked. Because these words are sometimes taken only in part of their signification, is it good logic to say that they are never used in their full meaning! Or can you, with any reason or consistency, affirm that they are taken in their full signification when applied to future bliss, and only in a part of their signification when applied to future misery!

2d. You say, "If gehenna means the Valley of Hinnom, near Jerusalem, then the Scriptures do not teach punishment beyond the Jordan of death." Your conclusion is not in your premises. To make it logical it must read thus: "If gehenna means the Valley of Hinnom, near Jerusalem, and if this word gehenna include all that the Scriptures say of future punishment, then the Scriptures do not teach any other punishment for sin than the Valley of Hinnom."

3d. You add, that there is no certainty whether olem or aiônios punishment means one minute or a thousand years; and so of eternal life and the eternal God. But, my good Sir, there are not minutes, hours, nor years after death, and all such reasonings are without definite terms, and therefore wholly fallacious. But if God be eternal, then are life and death, happiness and misery eternal realities.

Let me now say in conclusion of my present reply to all your inferences, that they are subversive of the most plain and express sayings of Jesus and the apostles; for all their teachings tend to the conclusion that it shall not be hereafter with the wicked as with the righteous; whereas you have no fears for the wicked, nor hope for the righteous—you have no eternal life and no everlasting destruction in your system; for the one makes the other necessary. And instead of everlasting life and an "everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power" at his appearing and his kingdom, you have not one minute of bliss to propose to the good, nor a second of woe for the greatest transgressor of the laws of Heaven. Now can it require more than a bird's eye glance at your philosophy, to assure the candid reader of the New Testament that it is clearly subversive of all the hopes and fears which the Lord and his apostles promulgated to the world, and makes the Gospel a dead letter? Be assured, my dear Sir, that he is no friend of Jesus who preaches that he who believeth not shall be saved; or who infers that the righteous and the wicked shall after death be equally pure, holy, and happy for one moment or for duration without end.

Your friend,

UTICA, FRIDAY, JANUARY 20, 1837.

ROMANS IX: 22.—VESSELS OF WRATH.

Mr. SKINNER—Will you (or some one of your numerous correspondents) have the goodness to furnish your readers with an exposition of the following passage, found in the 9th chapter of Paul's epistle to the Romans and 23d verse? "What if God, willing to shew his wrath and to make his power known, endured with much long suffering the vessels of wrath fitted to destruction."

I request this favor, Sir, because it is a portion of Scripture which is harped upon more than any other by those who believe in the eternal condemnation of part of the human family, and because I consider that it may be the means of throwing some light upon this somewhat mysterious passage.

With all due respect, I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

ASPASIO.

Hamilton, December 10, 1836.

ANSWER.

Although the advocates of particular election and reprobation have long considered this passage, with the context, as clearly teaching that sentiment, we must confess we have never been able to discover in it the least evidence of so monstrous a theory. Indeed, the scope of the 9th, 10th and 11th chapters of Romans, when taken in connexion, as they were obviously designed to be understood, stand out in bold relief most clearly and forcibly against the doctrine of Calvinism.

The grand mistake made by the advocates of Calvinism on this subject is, in supposing the election spoken of means election to eternal life and immortal glory in another state of being; and that the rejection or reprobation is the predestination of others to endless damnation in the eternal world; whereas neither the one nor the other is true, nor does the context afford even the faintest evidence of any such position. The election spoken of means an election to the present privileges and external advantages of the kingdom of God, in this world; and reprobation or rejection, the not being favored with those privileges and advantages.

Dr. Adam Clarke in his Commentary, gives a summary view of the three chapters, (9, 10 and 11,) and we think very clearly shows that the common doctrine of election and reprobation was far from the mind of the apostle when he wrote them. He says:—

"The election of which the apostle speaks, took place, first in Abraham and his seed, before his seed was born; and then, (secluding Ishmael and all his posterity,) in Isaac and his seed, before they were born. And then, (secluding Esau and all his posterity,) in Jacob and his seed before they were born. But the Scriptures nowhere represent eternal life as bestowed upon any family or race of men in this manner. Therefore, this election mentioned by the apostle can not be an election unto eternal life."

"Now, if we turn back and review those three chapters, we shall find that the apostle, chap. xi: 1, heartily desired and prayed that those same reprobated and rejected people of Israel might be saved; he affirms that they had not stumbled so as to fall finally and irrecoverably; chap. xi: 11, that they should have again a fulness; ver. 12, that they should be received again into the church; ver. 15, that a holiness still belonged to them; ver. 16, that if they did not still abide in unbelief, they should be grafted in their own olive-tree again; ver. 23, 24, that blindness had happened unto them only for a time, till the fulness of the Gentiles be come in; ver. 25, and then he proves from Scripture, that all Israel, all those nations at present under blindness, shall be saved; ver. 26, 27, that as touching the (original) election, they were still beloved for the fathers' sake, the patriarch's sake, ver. 28, that in their case, the gifts and calling of God were without repentance; ver. 29, that through our (the believing Gentiles') mercy, they shall at length obtain mercy, ver. 31. All these several things are spoken of that Israel, or the body of people concerning whose rejection the apostle argues in the ninth chapter. And, therefore, the rejection which he there argues about, cannot be absolute reprobation to eternal damnation; but to their being as a nation, stripped of those honors and privileges of God's peculiar church and kingdom in this world, to which, at a certain future period, they shall again be restored."

The following is his comment on verse 22, chap. ix:—

"What if God, willing to show his wrath? The apostle refers here to the case of Pharaoh and the Egyptians; and to which he applies Jeremiah's parable of the potter: and, from them, to the then state of the Jews. Pharaoh and the Egyptians were vessels of wrath, persons deeply guilty before God; and, by their obstinate refusal of his grace, and abuse of his goodness, they had fitted themselves for that destruction which the wrath, the vindictive justice of God, inflicted; after he had endured their obstinate rebellion, with much long suffering: which is a most absolute proof, that the hardening of their hearts, and their ultimate punishment, were the consequences of their obstinate refusal of his grace, and abuse of his goodness; as the history in Exodus sufficiently shows. As the Jews of the apostle's time had sinned, after the similitude of the Egyptians, hardening their hearts and abusing his goodness, after every display of his long-suffering kindness, being now fitted for destruction, they were ripe for punishment; and that power, which God was making known for their salvation, having been so long and so much abused and provoked, was now about to show itself in their destruction as a nation. But, even in this case, there is not a word of their final damnation; much less that either they, or any others, were, by a sovereign decree, reprobated from all eternity; and that their very sins, the proximate cause of their punishment, were the necessary effect of that decree, which had, from all eternity, doomed them to endless torments. As such a doctrine could never come from God, so it never can be found in the words of his apostle."

In the expression "vessels of wrath fitted to destruction," the apostle doubtless has reference to the parable of the potter's work mentioned in Jeremiah. "For the word came to Jeremiah from the Lord, saying, arise, go down to the potter's house, and there I will cause thee to hear my words. Then I went down to the potter's house and behold he wrought a work upon the wheels. And the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hands of the potter: so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it."

Here it is worthy of remark that the potter is by no means represented as making vessels on purpose to dash to pieces or destroy; nor do we ever see rational men of this occupation making vessels of any description on purpose to destroy—all the vessels are made for some useful purpose or other. Some of them, it is true, are for more honorable places than others—some of finer and some of coarser materials, but all for some use.

Again, the vessel wrought by the potter, described by Jeremiah, became marred, or defaced, in the hands of the potter, and again "he made it another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it." Now suppose God had made a vessel, or any of the human family for endless misery, would such an end seem good to any benevolent mind? Could any good result therefrom, either to the sufferer, or to God, angels, devils, or men? Has any advocate of endless misery ever shown, or by any ingenuity been able to show, the least possible good in such a doom? Never. On the other hand, could a greater evil than endless misery possibly be imagined? No. Then the great Potter that moulded humanity into being never designed any part thereof for so horrid a doom.

But what is meant by "vessels of wrath fitted to destruction?" The same kind of wicked creatures as the Psalmist speaks of, Ps. cxlv: 20, "All the wicked will he destroy"—the same as Malachi iv: 1, "For behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea and all that do wickedly shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch."

What is meant by the destruction of the wicked, or the vessels of wrath? We will give the reader a sample. The persecuting Saul of Tarsus, was most evidently a vessel of wrath, fitted to destruction. He breathed out threatening and slaughter against the church; and being exceedingly mad, he persecuted them even unto strange cities; and when they were put to death he gave his voice against them. Destruction and misery were in his way, and the way of peace he knew not. His mouth was full of cursing and bitterness, and his feet were swift to shed blood. This same vessel of wrath the great Potter, so to speak, saw fit to take in hand, and "dash him in pieces as a potter's vessel"—in other words, destroy him in his wicked character, (for all the wicked will he destroy,) and his old and corrupt man became marred in the hands of the potter, and again he made him another vessel—even a vessel of mercy—"a chosen vessel unto God, to bear his name before the Gentiles and kings and the children of Israel." Acts ix: 15. Thus the "vessel of wrath fitted to destruction" and "marred in the hands of the potter," and "made again another vessel," was in a short time, "transformed by the renewing of his mind," from the persecuting Saul of Tarsus, (every root and branch of which was destroyed and burnt up,) into the meek, and devout, and zealous, and faithful apostle Paul, a chosen vessel of mercy. For the great Potter can easily break up an old vessel and mould it over into a new; for he “turneth the hearts of the children of men as the rivers of water are turned.” Thus also shall “the vessels of wrath” mentioned in Rom. ix: 22, in God’s own time be remoulded into vessels of mercy, (they shall obtain mercy that had not obtained mercy,) and be made living stones and pillars in the spiritual temple of the Most High, to “go no more out forever.” In proof of this, see Rom. xi: 23–36 inclusive. HEBREWS IX: 27, ETC. ETC.

A correspondent who asks an explanation of the above passage will find two in volume 2, p. 177 and volume 4, p. 133. If he has not those volumes, and cannot find them in his neighborhood, he may gather the meaning by regarding the scope and subject of the context. The writer is comparing the high priest under the law, with Jesus our High Priest—showing that as the Jewish priest entered the holy of holies once a year with the blood of the sacrifices, (in which he died a sacrificial or figurative death,) so Jesus entered into heaven itself, once for all, by his own literal death. And as it was appointed unto the men who were high priests, once a year to die a sacrificial figurative death, and after this put on the breast plate of judgment, and appear to bless the people, (see Exod. xxviii: xxx; Levit. xvi: and Num. vi: 22-27,) so Jesus was once offered to bear the sins of the many, (the high priests only bore the sins of the Jewish nation,) and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation.

The "etc., etc." passages named above, are—"As death leaves us so judgment will find" us, and "As the tree falls, so it shall lie." When our correspondent informs us in what book, chapter and verse of the Bible they can be found, it will be time enough to give an explanation of them. He will also be entitled to a reward of five dollars for finding either of them—but I give him fair warning that he will earn the money many times over before he will be able to claim the reward—for they cannot be found in the Bible.

GENESIS XXII: 1; JAMES I: 13.

"And it came to pass after these days, that God did tempt Abraham," etc.

"Let no man say, when he is tempted, I am tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man."

A correspondent requests an explanation of these two passages, which he deems contradictory to each other. That they are not so, will appear when we consider

1. Abraham was not tempted to do evil, (for if He who gave life has a right to take it away when and how he pleases, then to take life by God's express command, can not be evil), but to give evidence of his faith in the promise of God, by offering up that very son, in and by whom that very promise was to be fulfilled. But the passage in James treats only of tempting to sin, as is evident from the whole connexion. God does not tempt any one to do evil—and the reason is plain; for, says the apostle, “God can not be tempted with evil”—he has no desire to do wrong, consequently he can not, does not employ agents to do it for him.

2. The passage in Genesis would be better rendered, according to Dr. Clarke and others—"And it came to pass after these days, that God did try Abraham," etc.

Horne, in his Introduction to the study of the Scriptures, remarks on these two passages—"Temptation signifies nothing more than trial; any opposition or difficulty that may exercise our virtues and make them known. In this sense God may be said to tempt men, that is, he tries and proves them, and thus he tempted Abraham. Sometimes temptation means dangerous trials and enticements to sin, under which we are more likely to sink than to overcome them. In this sense, God "tempteth not any man;" nor, if we resist them, will he suffer us to be tempted above what we are able. 1 Cor. x: 13." Philadelphia ed., 1835, vol. 1, p. 414.

3. In relation to Abraham's motives in complying with the command to offer up his son, it may be remarked, that as he did not doubt God's ability to fulfil his promise in and by that very son, it is probable he supposed Isaac would again be restored to him, by Him who so miraculously gave him in the first place. If so, that he no more contemplated the total cessation of his son's existence, by the act of sacrifice, than if he had given him a powerful narcotic, which would cause his son to be dead, as it were, for the same length of time. At all events, the act, even if it had been accomplished, would not have been murder; for there was no malice in the act—no intention to injure Isaac, or any one else, but the contrary. But the act was not accomplished, nor intended to be. The trial of Abraham being complete, God rejected the sacrifice—a sacrifice which he ever after solemnly forbade.

In this explanation, I have proceeded on the common view of the subject—which, however, is not the only one that might be offered. Mr. Bellamy, in his translation of the Bible, so renders the passage as not to involve a command even to sacrifice Isaac. But not having his work, and distrusting my memory, I cannot here quote his rendering and explanation. A. B. G.

SUSQUEHANNA ASSOCIATION.

The minutes of this body, as published in the last volume of our paper, were corrected, and the manner of their preparation commented on, by Br. Bartholomew—which corrections, etc., I condensed in an editorial article, to save room. A reply by Br. Ames, the recording Clerk, has been received, which, also, I am under the necessity of condensing to find room for it. This reply, unless misstatements in important facts can be pointed out, must close the controversy in our columns. These matters should be so attended to, before their publication, as to need no wordy warfare afterwards.

After expressions of affection and friendship, which we believe are sincere, Br. Ames says the errors noticed by Br. Bartholomew, exist not in fact. He prepared the minutes between the forenoon and afternoon services of the last day, read them to Br. B., (who was one of the Clerks,) and corrected it as Br. B. then suggested. If errors therefore exist, the fault is Br. Bartholomew's as much as Br. Ames'. He also names some unimportant errors in Br. Bartholomew's corrections.

As to the remarks on the liberality and hospitality of our friends in Mount Pleasant, they are correct, and were omitted by Br. Ames only to save room, and because well known to all most concerned. Besides, he deemed most important to the Association, what he did write respecting the lukewarm and indifferent. As to Br. B.'s excuses for this class, the snow storm did not commence till the very night before the Association met—of course, kept none from coming; for the delegates who intended coming would already be in the neighborhood, if not in the place. As to the hilly roads, the societies to whom Br. A.'s remarks were applicable, had but at most eighteen miles of such roads, the rest being the valley of the Susquehanna. As to the busy season for farmers, it is no excuse for mechanics and merchants, of which some of those very societies are mostly composed. Br. Ames closes by hoping no offence will be taken at his plain speech, for none is intended. And thus, I hope, ends this subject. A. B. G.

SHALL WE JUDGE BY THE FRUIT?

The testimony which we receive from so many of our subscribers of the usefulness of our paper, is truly flattering, if not encouraging, though, by the way, they have different ways of manifesting their desire for its continued usefulness and prosperity. For example; we occasionally receive a letter couched in something like the following language :—

"Messrs. Editors—I have for some years taken your paper, and must say I am highly pleased with it. Myself and family have derived much pleasure and profit from its perusal, and it has certainly been the means of doing much good in this region. Wishing you abundant prosperity in your attempts to spread the knowledge of God's impartial grace, and impart pleasing and useful instruction to your fellow men, I close by requesting you to discontinue my paper at the close of the present volume.

Your well wisher,

We proceed to comply with the request, wondering how much our friend wishes our prosperity, and with a heavy heart break the seal of another letter, and read as follows :—

“Messrs. EDITORS—I must say you have exceeded my expectations in making your paper both useful and interesting—indeed I feel too sensibly its importance, particularly to the rising generation, to relax my exertions in its favor. I herewith send you the names of eight new subscribers, the gratis copy you may send to Widow —, who is too poor to pay for it, but will receive it with a grateful heart—I will continue to do what I can for you, without interfering with other kindred publications.

Yours as ever,

Query: Which gives us the best evidence of his wishes for the prosperity of our paper? O. H.

The attention of our readers is especially directed to Br. Lewis' article as a brief, yet full and cogent summary of the belief of Universalists, (the first of the kind that has been published by us for some time,) in order that they may present it to the notice of those to whom it is addressed—especially that portion who frequently misrepresent our views. It is time for them to learn what they must oppose, if they would oppose Universalism. It was too long to be published entire in one number.

POETRY.

From the Universalist Union.

TO A FRIEND IN THE FAR WEST.

With the friends who love thee best,
To make thy dwelling 'mid the wilds,
Of the far and lonely West—
Thou hast left a band of sorrowing hearts,
Whose hopes were locked in thee,
To seek in wealth's all-dazzling gifts,
A happier destiny.

We miss thee, oh our sister,
In all our smiling bowers;
We miss thee in our morning walks,
In evening's social hours;
We miss thy heart-enlivening smile,
Thy voice so warm and kind,
And the thoughts which fell like incense flowers,
From thy pure and lamb-like mind.

Lovely thou wert—aye, lovely,
In spirit and in form—
A sunbeam glancing o'er life's tears,
A rainbow through the storm;
A snow drop 'mid earth's darker hues,
Unwarmed by flattery's breath;
A harp-tone flung from cherub hands,
Wringing out joy from death.

Lovely thou wert—aye, lovely,
And sorrow shared with thee,
As if, magician changed, become
A pleasure unto me.

Life's sky, though clothed with tempest clouds,
Grew bright when thou wert nigh,
And tears e'er turned to smiles beneath
Thy angel-gifted eye.

Sister, my soul's loved sister,
A vacant heart is here:
The tide of happiness no more
Through its chrysalis depths glides clear.
Crushed hopes are on each tossing wave,
And broken ties beneath,
And a dark hand binds each sunny thought
With a Winter-woven wreath.

Sister, my soul's loved sister,
I have bidden thee farewell,
As one who seeks in fatal climes,
With the shadowy dead to dwell;
As one who seeks the dazzling mid,
Of the Saviour's white-robed band,
The garden where love hath no shade,
"The far and better land."

THE BETRAYED.

Upon a sunny and unfrequented hillside, grew a solitary rose tree. By it stole a mazy pathway among myrtles and violets, which the stranger's footsteps had never pressed. It was in the strength of its maturity when a single bud burst from its topmost bough. This bud the Summer beam wooed with daily fidelity, and the bee loved to nestle among its petals. The lark stooped his airy wing in passing it by day, and the nightingale sang to it his sweetest serenade, on the nearest bramble, by night. But pride entered not the heart of this queen of flowers. It shed a perfume alike on the fragrant blossoms and the scentless herb. It bowed over a humble violet, and smiled upon the unpretending, modest daisy. Thus the charity and beneficence of a lovely female are diffused alike on the humble and the high, the poor and the rich.

The west wind was blithe to blow around it. But it turned aside from its dalliance, heeding not his whispers or his wooings. Other flowerets listened to his lures, and fluttered to his sighs. They were wafted far from the protecting spray, danced in gayety for an hour, then flung, unsheltered, on the cold earth. Remember, maiden, that the heart of her who holds the flatterer's breath, shall be thus gaily wafted, wrung, withered, and tossed aside!

Proudly the parent stem summoned all its energies to lift the head of its cherished offspring, that it might partake bountifully of the benignant light, and the invigorating air—that it might be seen and admired. The rose repaid this fondness with dutiful affection. Often, at morning, did it distil the fragrant tear of gratitude, and at evening it rested its fair head on the stem, as a prattler's round cheek reposes on a parent's bosom.

The fame of its beauty attracted a son of pleasure. It won his admiration. Regardless of the agony of severance, he snapped it from the stalk. While its beauty lasted, he proudly displayed it to the giddy and the heartless, who envied its possession. But afar from the nourishing stem, its form languished in one fleeting day, and its color faded. Then it was cast like a loathsome weed, beneath the feet of the multitude, to wither and perish there.

Licentious profligate!—that rose was my only beloved Lina! I am the solitary, broken, bleeding stem!—Knickerbocker.

DEAN SWIFT.

This celebrated ecclesiastic was scrupulously exact in the exercise of his function, as well with regard to temporal, as spiritual things. He expended more money to support and adorn his cathedral than had been applied to the same use in any period since it was built. He was extremely exact and conscientious in promoting the members of the choir according to their merit, and never advanced any person to a vicarage, who was not qualified for it in all respects, whatever his interest, or however recommended. He once refused a vicarage to a person for whom Lady Carteret was very importunate; at the same time declaring to her ladyship, that if it had been in his power to have made the gentleman a dean or a bishop, he would have obliged her willingly, because, he said, deaneries and bishoprics were preferments in which no merit had concern; but the merit of a vicar would be brought to the test every day.

He could not bear to have any lies told him, which he never failed to detect; and when the party endeavored to palliate them, his usual expression was, "Come, come, don't attempt to darn your cob-webs." It was a saying of his, that an excuse was worse than a lie, because an excuse was a lie guarded.

MARRIAGES.

On Tuesday, 10th inst., by Rev. W. M. Delong, Mr. HIRAM H. KEELER, to Miss PAMELIA T. DELONG, both of Pittsfield.

In Ogden, on the 1st inst., by Rev. W. Queal, of Parma Corners, Mr. ERASTUS PARKER, to Miss HANNAH GOODRICH, both of the former place.

At the residence of Mr. John Hiscock, in Ogden, on the 5th inst., by the same, Mr. JOHN TOMLINSON, of Le Roy, to Mrs. DOROTHY BUEL, of the former place.

In Mendon, Monroe county, on the 1st inst., by Rev. K. Townsend, Mr. LUCIUS O. HILL, to Miss DELIA GOFF, both of that place.

In Fort Plain, on the 28th ult., by Rev. L. C. Browne, Mr. JAMES ZOLLER, of Minden, to Miss HULDAH GREEN, of Danube.

DEATHS.

In Niles, Berrien county, Michigan, on the 30th ult., JAMES HENRY ALEXANDER, printer, aged about 23, formerly of this city.

In Fulton, December 23d, IRA, only child of Luther and Charlotte Fowler. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners the following day by Br. Eaton from Ps. xix: 75.

In Palermo, 22d September last, very suddenly, MARY J. SELEY, wife of Elisha Seley, and daughter of our esteemed Br. Wilkinson, in the 29th year of her age. The deceased was a kind, affectionate wife, a tender mother, and an amiable member of society. She sweetly fell asleep in Jesus who is "the resurrection and the life." Funeral sermon by Rev. Mr. Leavitt, Presbyterian.—Communicated.

In Ellisburgh, on the 30th of October last, Mr. ARFRED STEARNS, aged 33 years. He lived respected and died lamented by all who knew him. He made no profession of any particular religious sentiment, but was a believer in the fundamentals of Christianity, was comforted and sustained thereby during his last distressing sickness, which he bore with Christian fortitude, and died resigned to the will of the great Disposer of all events.

Thus has another of the heroes of the revolution, fallen to sleep with his fathers. The consolations of the Gospel were administered to the relatives and friends by the writer, from Gal. xiv: 14. A. K.

In Yorkshshire, Cattaraugus county, November 19th, Mr. GEORGE W. HIBBARD, son of Colonel Arunah Hibbard, aged about 23 years. His death was occasioned by a kick from a horse. The animal struck him a full blow on the abdomen, as he stood against a wall. He survived the hurt not quite twenty-four hours. During this period he suffered excruciating pain, almost without intermission, but bore it with remarkable fortitude and patience, and died in the hope of another and a better world, retaining his reason and speech to the last, and conversing upon the subject of his departure with as much composure as if it were but a journey of a few months.

He was an intelligent and worthy young man, whose decease will long be felt by his parents and relatives—but they mourn not as those without hope.

The writer of this (assisted by Br. Thornton, who was present and took part in the services,) attended the funeral on the 21st, and addressed an overwhelmingly large congregation on the all-important subject of the Christian hope, as founded on the universal and immutable promises of Jehovah, and endeavored to administer to the truly afflicted relatives the words of consolation inspired by the Gospel of Jesus Christ. UNIVERSALIST BELIEF.

A friendly Epistle, designed for the perusal of all Clergymen who hold the doctrine of endless misery, but addressed particularly, to those residing in the town and vicinity of Boston, N. Y.

BY EV. JASON LEWIS.

IX. As the divine Being is set forth in the Scriptures to be "the Father of spirits," "the Lord God merciful," whose "tender mercies are over all his works," it is believed by Universalists, for this, and for other reasons, that punishment, as inflicted by the divine Being on transgressors, is a disciplinary and remedial process, in a good degree analogous, in point of character, to that chastisement or correction which, in case of disobedience or vice, a wise and judicious parent would inflict upon a well beloved child, if he deemed it necessary to reduce it to obedience, and secure its reformation and future good. In support of this view of punishment, they adduce many passages of Scripture, a few of which follow. "Though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men." "We have had fathers of our flesh, who corrected us, and we gave them reverence, shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits and live? For they verily for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure; but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness. Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous, nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto those who are exercised thereby." The apostle also says that of this chastisement, "all are partakers."

X. Punishment from the hand of God, being paternal, therefore disciplinary, therefore remedial, the conclusion very naturally follows that, at some time or other, when it shall have accomplished the object for which it was inflicted, it will come to an end. And this consideration, corroborated by the argument drawn from the nature and character of God, the jurisdiction of Christ, the promises of the Gospel, and various other circumstances, and strengthened also by the fact that though in the Scriptures, the words forever, everlasting and eternal, are, in some instances, employed to express the mere duration of punishment, (which from this circumstance is supposed to be endless,) yet that in very many more instances, they are so employed as plainly to teach its termination, leads the Universalist to reject the doctrine of endless punishment, and to adopt the belief that punishment is limited in duration, and of course, that forever, and its kindred terms, when employed in the Scriptures to express the positive duration of punishment, are to be understood in a limited sense.

In proof of the fact, that forever, etc., are applied in more instances, in the Scriptures, to the limitation of punishment, than to its duration, even in a limited sense, take the following:

In Ps. lxxvii: 7-9, the Psalmist presents a number of inquiries, which appear to have, "troubled" his mind for a considerable time, and respecting which he tells us he came to the following conclusion, "And I said, this is my infirmity." "Will the Lord cast off forever? and will he be favorable no more? Is his mercy clean gone forever? Doth his promise fail for evermore? Hath God forgotten to be gracious? Hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies?" These inquiries are all directed to two points—will the Lord cast off forever? and do those circumstances exist which would lead him thus to do? And it is certainly intimated in this passage, that in order for the Lord to cast off forever, his "mercy" must be "clean gone forever," and his "tender mercies" be "shut up in anger." Consequently, as long as his mercy continues, and as long as his anger is not continual, so long it can not be true that he will cast off forever. But it is declared in the Scriptures more than forty times, that "his mercy endureth forever," and quite a number of times, (in substance,) that "he will not keep his anger forever." Here then, to go no further, are about fifty passages of Scripture containing the expression, "forever," in which, to the understanding of the Universalist, the doctrine of endless punishment is negatived in the most pointed manner. It is also declared in the Scriptures, "The Lord will not cast off forever; but though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion." Again, (in the first person,) "I will not contend forever, neither will I be always wroth: for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made."

XI. It is a distinguishing article of the Universalist faith, that in pursuance of the grace of God, and through the mediation of Jesus Christ, all the human family will at length be saved, that is, will become holy and happy in a state of immortality. The following are some of their reasons for thus believing:

1. The Creator being good, not bad—benignant, not malevolent—would naturally, in the act of creation, be disposed to bring his creatures into existence under such circumstances, that the existence of each individual, taken as a whole, would be to such individual, a good gift, not a bad one—a blessing, not a curse—and especially so, since man had never petitioned to become "a living soul," nor had he even been consulted on the subject. But existence, in order to be a good gift, must be, to its recipient, productive of more good than evil—to be a blessing, must bring to him on the whole, more blessings than curses; therefore in the creation of mankind, Jehovah must have desired and designed, (so to speak,) not their ultimate misery, but their ultimate happiness. And if his goodness was sufficient to move him to design man's happiness, his wisdom must have been sufficient to qualify him to devise the best possible plan for the accomplishment of such design; and his power is certainly sufficient to enable him to carry into effect his own wise and benevolent purposes; therefore the ultimate happiness of mankind is certain. Not happiness in sin, however, for aside from the impossibility of such a state, the Creator is a perfectly holy being, and must therefore have desired and designed the perpetuation and final triumph, not of unholiness, but of holiness. And the present existence of sin and misery may be perfectly reconciled with the holiness and love of God, by supposing (what indeed the Universalist undoubtedly believes) that they are permitted, or appointed, to exist for a limited time, in order to bring about a greater amount of good than could otherwise have been produced.

Another form of the argument is the following: If but a part of mankind shall be finally saved, the reason must be, that the divine Being either could save all, but will not; or he would save all, but can not; or he could and would save all, but knows not how. But as no one will admit that the Deity he worships, lacks either the disposition, or the ability, or the skill, to effect man's salvation, seeing that this would be to impeach either His goodness, power, or wisdom, it follows that God knows how to save all, can and will do it.

It is equally an impeachment of the Divine character, to say that ultimate universal salvation is inconsistent with the penalty of God's law, with his established method of salvation, with man's agency, or the like. For when God affixed the penalty to his law, established his method of salvation, gave man his agency, etc., he either did, or did not know that some of mankind would be ruined thereby. If he did not know, (admitting their future ruin to be a fact,) where, let it be asked, was his omniscience? If he did know, then where were his benevolence and justice, while he was thus contriving the ruin of thousands of his weak and wayward, though yet unoffending and innocent offspring? If, to save his wisdom and goodness, we adopt the conclusion that he was obliged to establish such a state of things as would insure the endless ruin of a great portion of his creatures, where could have been his almighty power? And where is it now, that it does not interpose, and by means of its omnipotent energies, change, or at least control those circumstances which are calculated to work results so repugnant to his goodness?

2. Jesus Christ, in order to encourage his hearers to attend to the duty, and avail themselves of the privilege of prayer, uses the following argument: "What man is there of you, who if his son ask bread, will give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will give him a serpent? If ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father who is in heaven give good things to those that ask him?" This argument is manifestly based upon the principle that God loves mankind with a love analogous to, though far exceeding the love of parents for their children. And this principle being established, (for surely, the authority of Jesus is sufficient to establish any particular point of doctrine,) it follows, that as earthly parents desire, and, to the extent of their ability, endeavor to secure and promote the welfare and happiness of their offspring, so God our heavenly Father, as he is the "Father of all," will certainly provide for the well-being and felicity of "his offspring," even all mankind.

3. Jesus Christ loved mankind. His love was not merely "strong as death"—it was incalculably stronger than death. Hence we read that he "hath loved us, and given himself for us." His love was not produced by our good works; for he "died for the ungodly." His love will forever exist; for he is declared to be "the same yesterday, and to-day, and forever." Moreover his love is the love of God; for says Paul, "God commendeth his love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." As God loves mankind, and declares by the prophet, "I change not," hence the propriety and sure grounds of Paul's confident persuasion, "that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

All are objects of Christ's love; for he "gave himself a ransom for all." Says John to the early Christians, "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." Again, "And he is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world."

Our Saviour holds the destinies of all mankind in his hands; for, says he, addressing his Father, and speaking of himself in the third person, "Thou hast given him power over all flesh;" and says an apostle, "He is Lord of all."

Now, then, seeing that Jesus loves all the human family with an unfeigned love, even the love of God—seeing also that he is "Lord both of the dead and living," endowed, as he assures us, with "all power in heaven and in earth," and possessed of "the keys of hell and of death," what can be a more reasonable conclusion, than that he will prove to be, what in fact the Father sent him to be, the Saviour of the world? Not in, but from their sins; not by physical force but "according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself." "I, if I be lifted up from the earth," said he, "will draw all men unto me;" not drag, or drive, but draw them; that is influence them to come.

4. There are many passages of Scripture which are viewed by the Universalist as teaching, in express terms, that particular article of his faith which he believes St. Peter intended to inculcate in the use of the expression, "restitution of all things," and St. Paul, when he declared that God "will have all men to be saved." A brief glance at only a few texts, out of the very many that might be cited, must now suffice.

It is worthy of note that many terms which are now in very common use, are not to be found in the sacred writings. Thus the word mankind is not in the Bible; though the idea expressed by it, is often to be met with, as in the expression "all men," where no one supposes that adult males only are intended, but men, women, and children—the race of man—all mankind. In like manner, the neuter is sometimes used to signify intelligent beings, as in the expression, "all things," which frequently signifies all mankind, though it sometimes has a more extended signification, being synonymous with universe, another term not found in the Scriptures. But almost every variety of expression proper for the communication of the doctrine of ultimate universal salvation, and which can be formed out of the words contained in Scripture, the inspired penmen have employed. Thus,

We have the promise of Almighty God, confirmed by a solemn asseveration or oath, that "all the nations of the earth," and again, "all the families of the earth" and again, "all the kindreds of the earth," shall be "blessed" in the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, which seed, or posterity, an apostle declares to be "Christ," and assures us that when this promise was made to Abraham, it was the preaching of "the Gospel" to him; hence he elsewhere speaks of "the fulness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ." And the nature as well as the fulness of this blessing, may be learned from the apostle Peter, who says to the Jews, "ye are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant which God made with our fathers, saying unto Abraham, And in thy seed shall all the kindreds of the earth be blessed. Unto you first, God, having raised up his Son Jesus, sent him to bless you, in turning away every one of you from his iniquities." It is believed by Universalists, that when this blessing comes to be conferred in its fulness all mankind will be saved from sin.

Says Jehovah, by the mouth of the prophet, "I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear." Says Paul respecting Jesus, "God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father." Says the Psalmist, "All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord; and shall glorify thy name." Again, "All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord; and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee." Let these passages explain and illustrate one another.

The prophet assures us that "all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God;" and again, as quoted in the New Testament, that "all flesh shall see the salvation of God." Jesus assures us that he came "to save the world;" and John testifies "that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world." Paul speaks of all things being subdued to Christ; of all things or the world, being reconciled to God by Christ; of all things being gathered together in one in Christ; of all being made alive in Christ; of God becoming all in all; etc., etc., etc.

XII. It is believed by Universalists, that there is a present salvation, (also denominated everlasting or eternal life,) which it is our duty to seek and cherish, and our privilege to receive and enjoy, and which consists in exemption from the miseries of fear, unbelief, unreconciliation, enmity, sin, and guilt, and in the enjoyment of that peace and happiness which arise from the exercise of faith, hope and confidence, love to God and to our fellow creatures, the practice of good works, the possession of a conscience void of offence. The following scriptures illustrate this point: "We who have believed, do enter into rest;" "In whom believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory; receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls;" "He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life."

XIII. It is believed by Universalists, that in the absence of the above described salvation, men are in condemnation, damnation, or death, a situation exactly the opposite of the former. "He that believeth not, is condemned already;" "Having damnation, because they have cast off their first faith;" "He that loveth not his brother abideth in death;" "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

XIV. Universalists believe that although salvation in this world is evidently conditional, that is to say, is enjoyed only by means of faith, good works, etc., yet that salvation in a state of immortality, is by no means suspended upon any exercises or acts of the creature while in this state of being. "Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fullness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ.....in whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will."

XV. Universalists believe, that as Jesus came to "bear witness unto the truth," not to originate it; as he hath "brought life and immortality to light," not created them; as the salvation of the future world is wholly "the gift of God," therefore the object of pure religion, as possessed and practised in this life, is not to purchase or secure the blessings of an hereafter state of being, but to benefit mankind here, by rendering them better and happier.

XVI. Without pretending to infallibility, Universalists believe that the system of doctrine held by them, approximates far more nearly to the perfection of primitive Christianity, than any other system of Christian doctrine extant. In proof of this, they appeal to the Scriptures generally.

I have thus placed before you the principal items in the religious belief of Universalists, and have given a few specimens of the proofs brought in support of the same. Though somewhat lengthy, I have been as brief as the nature and importance of the subject would possibly admit. The communication would have appeared some months ago, had I not been prevented from finishing it by the sickness of myself and family, a consequent accumulation of business, and some other circumstances beyond my control. I have used a plain simple style, because I wish to be clearly and fully understood by all whom this epistle may come. You will perceive that, except in a few instances, the sentences and expressions marked with double commas, are quotations from the Scriptures; and that I follow the common version, even in its supplied words, except in a few passages where grammatical propriety requires a slight emendation, as for example, the changing of which into who, where the relative relates to persons. I have not given chapter and verse, because you are supposed to know what the Bible contains, and to possess the means of readily finding every text therein. It will be expected that hereafter, should you still be opposed to Universalism, you will not employ misrepresentation in your endeavors to put it down. The use of this weapon cannot subserve the interests of your cause any great while longer. The abandonment of its use will be the best evidence you can give of your sincerity in time past, to say nothing of the future.

In closing, I entreat you to investigate the subject of religious truth candidly, carefully, prayerfully and thoroughly; and I pray God that both you and he who now addresses you, may be found in possession of that truth which maketh free.

FAITH AS A GRAIN OF MUSTARD SEED.

BY REV. A. C. BARRAY.

When Christ entered this world of sin and sorrow, mankind despised and rejected him; bigotry, intolerance, superstition and prejudice, were arrayed against him and his cause, and persecution approached him in every shape that "malice could grasp or cunning invent." His disciples became intimidated, and began to consider his mission as a fruitless undertaking. It was a work in which all the powers of man must be brought into exercise—there were obstacles to surmount, and difficulties to overcome. They seemed to the disciples, like a huge, rocky barrier, uprising before them; its summit resting amid clouds and storms, and its base reaching far beyond the scope of human vision. They shuddered as they viewed it, and looked upon it as something which they could not go round nor pass over. It was to banish such ideas from their minds—to encourage them onward in the glorious cause they had espoused, and to reprove them for shrinking back in the work of emancipating a world from darkness and ruin; that our Saviour declared unto them, that if they had faith as a grain of mustard seed, they should say unto this mountain, remove hence to yonder place, and it should remove. "There is a lesson inculcated, and a principle disclosed in these words, which are of vast importance to the world of man; and the one should be learned, and the other practiced in every department of life"—especially in some of our religious compacts.

There is much at the present day which seems to hinder our advancement as a denomination. The days of excitement are over and gone, and in our societies are found many cold and heartless believers—many false professors; hence Universalists, as a religious body, in many sections of country, are on the retrograde. There is a mountain in their path, which impedes the march of their prosperity, and discouragement has reached the hearts of those most firm and unwavering in the faith. They look upon the obstacles which rise before them, and feel that they are getting too mighty to be overcome.

But this is a wrong state of feeling. It produces lukewarmness, and listless and inactive emotions in the heart, and will pave the way for our downfall and ruin! Let the truly good, and faithful members of our societies, have faith as a grain of mustard seed, and they should say unto this mountain, remove hence to yonder place, and it should remove. Faith is the confidence of things hoped for; and we hope for better things, let us add to it confidence—a confidence that every obstacle or hindrance in the way of our prosperity, can and shall be surmounted or overcome—no matter how broad its base, or how high its summit!

DIALOGUE BETWEEN TWO NEIGHBORS.

Messrs. EDITORS—Some things have actually taken place within the circle of my acquaintance, out of which I have formed a kind of dialogue embracing considerable of the original, which I submit to your disposal.

E. Brother R, you have not attended one of our meetings for three months!

R. I know it.

E. Well I suppose you know it, of course; but I am astonished that you can do so. You have not only neglected our meetings, entirely; but I am informed you embrace every opportunity to hear Universalist preaching! How you can possibly leave our blessed meetings, where the truth is taught "as it is in Jesus," and listen to that "damnable heresy," Universalism, is more than I can conceive!

R. I acknowledge that "after the way which ye call heresy, so worship I the God of my Fathers; believing all things that are written in the law, and in the prophets; and have hope towards God, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust." And I am at a loss to know how you can call your meetings "blessed meetings," in which the greater part of mankind are endlessly damned! Blessings showered down in this manner, would be very partial blessings; and unworthy of a God who "created all"—who "is the Father of all"—who "is good unto all"—and of whom it is said "His tender mercies are over all his works;" and that he "is without partiality." St. Paul has taught us, in more than one place, that all shall be raised from the dead; and our Saviour says that those who obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead—are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God.

E. I have no doubt but the Devil assists you in thinking of, and arranging Scripture to answer your present purpose!

R. I think you must have changed your mind of late. Not many months ago I heard you declare, when in conversation with a certain sister, respecting the Sunday school, that the "Devil would not, on any account, have any thing to do with Scripture"! That he "would not enter a house, when by looking through the key-hole he could discover the Bible lying on the shelf over the fire, unless he could smell dust on the cover"! That "he would never go in sight or hearing of a child who attended the Sunday-school, and was in the habit of repeating Scripture every day."

E. I shall not attempt to argue with you, for I already perceive there would be no use in that; but I should suppose that after sorrow, sickness, and death had visited your family; you would be apt to mingle with your Methodist brethren for sympathy and consolation.

R. I will tell you a story. My child was sick, for some time like five weeks. The last three weeks, very sick. You will not dispute me, when I tell you I am poor, and that my family depends on my daily labor for support. These things you, and my other Methodist brethren know, and cannot suppose I had much store laid up beforehand. The last three weeks of its sickness, myself and wife were continually engaged, day and night, in taking care of it. I had neither time nor inclination for any thing else. We did not go to bed during that time; and what little we slept, was in our chairs, with our loved sick one in our arms. To add to our troubles—to make our sorrows still harder to be borne—we were hungry ourselves, and our children were crying with hunger around us. The nights were then, indeed, "long and dreary." The "days moved tardily away." Did the tears of "sympathy and consolation" flow like rivers from the eyes of my Methodist brethren and sisters at that time? We were "sick," but did they "visit us"? We were "hungry," but did they "feed us"? No; they came not near us! We saw not one of them! There were two Universalist ladies in the neighborhood, who found out we were "sick," and they "visited us"—they found us "hungry," and they "fed us!"

Forgive my tears, brother—they flow spontaneously—they are the tears of gratitude, and when I think of these things, I cannot prevent them!

But to return to my story—my child died.—When the day of burial came, did my Methodist brethren turn out to assist me in performing the last melancholy rites? Oh, no!—A Universalist in the neighborhood came with his carriage—took the corpse of my little child, and my pale and weeping wife, with her little ones, and conveyed them to the grave-yard, nearly two miles, waited till the dust was returned to dust, and conveyed my wife and children home again. By these, and some other circumstances, I have learned that, as far as I am acquainted with the two denominations, the Limitarians profess great goodness, but the Universalists practice it. These things set me to thinking, and searching—and I believe have been the means of opening my eyes to the light, and to the truth! And now, brother, if you can explain—

UNIVERSAL PRAYER.

Eternal Essence! Cause of causes! Intelligence! Life! Light! God, or by what name best known! Power by which I was created, exist and am sustained! Thee I address in my ignorance of all things proper to be thought or acted by man! Thou Cause and Author of all things, whatsoever thou art, or wheresoever thy abode, hear me and pardon my ignorance and errors!

If thou hast ever desired prayer from mortals, if thou hast ever answered the fervid desire of man for aid, O vouchsafe to hear me, and grant my earnest petition. Direct me in all things as I should go; guide me through life in safety; save me from pain and disease, from crime, suffering, and danger; implant in me an agreeable and benevolent temper, may it be my desire to do good to my fellow creatures, and may that desire be gratified; and O grant what I ask for myself, to my friends, to my kindred, and to the family of man; give me wisdom to discern truth from error; to seek the one and flee the other; and finally grant, if the affairs of this world, of this life and the things of time, are to influence the state of another world, of a life hereafter, or the things of eternity, that this life may be so conducted as shall, in all things, result for the best.

If I have asked any thing amiss, withhold it; or left any thing right unasked, still give it. Do thy will with me in all things, and I am satisfied. AMEN.

The author of the above prayer was from childhood, taught the Methodist doctrine, forced strictly to hear weekly their itinerants hold forth what they firmly (no doubt) believe to be the Gospel, and till the age of fifteen, as firmly believed as they freely preached the doctrine.

About that time, accident threw in his way a mutilated volume of a paper published at Little Falls, (name of paper and Editor now forgotten,) which taught and advocated the doctrine of Universal salvation. The work was read with all the insatiable ardor of that period of life, (added to an unbounded love of reading, which had already been largely gratified with historical books,) and begot a spirit of doubt and inquiry which resulted in the determination to pursue the investigation, and if possible know more of the matter.

To believe at this time, with the weight of early prejudice, and the shackles of paternal authority still in force, was out of the question; and to seek farther, the only resource.

A few months only elapsed, before the agency of a friend procured him a perusal of Winchester's Dialogues, and the work was done. Every thing was plain—all so different from the gloomy system he had been years in learning—love unbounded in every line—the character of the Deity was love—all was bright and beautiful, and before eighteen, he was a confirmed Universalist, and vain enough to think he could defend the doctrine in argument.

Time passed thus a few years, till in the study of his profession, (medicine,) the sciences began to unfold themselves—till anatomy unveiled its mysteries, and doubt came again to disturb his belief; and this time levelled its shafts not against any particular creed of the system, but against the system itself.

The search now became more strict; and with the advantage of increased years and experience, he perused some of the most popular facts adduced by authors in proof of Christianity, as also the evidences against it—endeavored to compare its internal evidences—but the more he sought, the less plain every thing appeared—the more he groped, the greater the darkness. Christianity he could not, would not and does not reject; but still there were many difficulties—its mysteries (for all its teachers and most ardent believers agreed in one thing, its mysteriousness) were a stumbling block; for if a revelation, why a mystery? or if for the good of all men, why left unintelligible to some, and to all so that their pretended knowledge only involved them in continual disputes and persecutions? If divine, why not so unequivocal that no mistakes could obtain, no difference of opinion exist amongst its votaries?

Such were some (and these only a very few) of the thoughts that agitated his mind, and were the cause of the production of the annexed prayer, and such are still his difficulties.

His attendance is still upon the preaching of Universalism, and he still thinks if any doctrine upon earth will stand the test, it is this—but feels uncertain, unestablished, wandering in darkness and ignorance. M. D.

ORGANIZATION.

There is one particular to which I beg leave to call the attention of our friends—I mean organization. In every place where there are five believers, a society should be immediately organized. The advantages of this measure are probably obvious to all. Unless we are sufficiently interested to form societies, and to preserve them in existence as such, we cannot suppose that we shall be permanently prosperous as a denomination. In the formation of societies, prudence and caution are necessary. Universalist societies should consist of believers in the doctrine who regulate their lives by its requirements; and the Constitution of each society should admit of females as well as males for members. There are many places in this vicinity where such societies should be formed.

For the encouragements of friends in places where no societies exist, I would refer to Watertown, Wilna, South Champion and other places, where societies are already established and their advantages realized.

Some parts of this county answer very well to the description, given by Br. M. Ballou, at the United States Convention, of Cheshire county, N. H., "they very much resemble a field where the timber has been felled and the fire run over it—neither cleared nor yet a forest."

In the process of clearing and improving land, the process is only partly accomplished by felling the trees and burning it over; it is necessary that it be cleared, subdued and fenced. And for the production of a crop, the seed must be sown and cultivated. The case is similar in the moral field. In this region, the pioneers have done well in penetrating the dark places, and demolishing the strong holds of error, and preparing for the reception of the seeds of truth. The field should now be cultivated and enlarged as circumstances demand. Believers should be gathered into societies for their own improvement, and that we may know who are for us, and who are for our enemies.

Brethren, may this matter meet with due attention, and at the next meeting of our Association, may we be permitted to hear of the success of your efforts and well directed zeal. J. B. Jr.

FAME.

It is natural for man to aspire to honor and distinction, and to seek renown by a course of virtuous conduct, is undoubtedly commendable. This passion is to be condemned only when it becomes the great spring of action, and its gratification is sought by the sacrifice of every thing ennobling and lovely. This may be regarded as one of the greatest of the various causes, which in former times, contributed to infuse into the youthful mind wrong principles and motives, and to scatter among mankind the seeds of wretchedness and vice.—Under the ancient systems of education, it could not be otherwise. As a leading feature of those systems, was inculcated the principle, that the attainment of glory and renown was the sole, and ultimate object of life—and to indulge in a course of licentiousness and crime, was regarded a proper preliminary step for its attainment. Their ideas of honor and fame comprehended whatever was base, unnatural, cruel and inhuman. The manner in which their historians embellished with all the charms of language, even the greatest crimes, and in which their poets recorded deeds at which humanity shudders, can not be sufficiently despised and deprecated. Even we of modern times, can not arise from the perusal of their works without being in some degree inspired by the brilliant display of their enthusiastic zeal and heroic exploits, with a desire to attain, by the same means, a like immortal renown. Such, briefly, is the character of the ancient authors, whose writings placed in the hands of youth as their sole guide through life, could not fail of inspiring them with schemes of cruelty, revenge and unbounded ambition. Under their influence, the youth was compelled not only to stifle the generous sensibilities of his nature, and discard from his bosom every feeling of kindness, humanity, and God-like benevolence, but also to regard with scorn and contempt, every individual actuated by their heavenly principles. An insatiate thirst for fame became his ruling, his all-absorbing passion, and in its pursuit he was obliged to forego every consideration, which could obstruct his onward course. He consequently determined that the sufferings of his fellows groaning under the yoke of oppression, which he hoped to place upon their necks, should be by him unheeded—that the expiring agonies of the myriads, who in defence of their rights should fall by the hands of the slaughtering armies, whom he should lead forth to battle, should be disregarded—that the shrieks and lamentations of the widowed mother and her babes, by his blood-stained hands made orphans, should be wafted on the winds from one end to the other of a continent, the current of whose rivers, by his demoniac troops, he fondly hoped should be crimsoned with blood, and whose broad and fertile plains should be whitened by the bones of his brethren, bleaching in the noon-day sun.

But this darkness has forever passed, and a glorious day has dawned. Now education is a process—not of sowing the seeds of revenge and cruelty—but those of forbearance and humanity. Its efforts are directed to the improvement of mind and heart—to the elevation of affections, and the diffusion of virtuous principles. True, some of the ancient authors are still in use. But the pernicious influence of their baneful principles is counteracted by modern works of a higher order. But is the influence of a desire for fame upon us necessarily lost? Is there no honorable course by which to render our names illustrious? Can not the passion for fame so congenial to the youthful feelings, so natural to the human mind, be innocently indulged? Must this glorious incentive no longer prompt to noble and illustrious deeds? To these interrogatories we are happy to answer—the prize is before us, and we have only to press forward in its pursuit, and it becomes our own. The innovations of education have not deprived us of this glorious boon. On our course we need not oppress our fellows—listen to agonizing shrieks of dying sufferers, nor wade through the blood of slaughtered myriads, but may scatter blessings among mankind and become their benefactor and friend. As literary men—as philanthropists and Christians, we have before us the brightest of prospects. For us, spread out in all their beauty and loveliness, are the manifestations of the awful majesty of the Creator. For the poet, the same glorious firmament on which the Grecian and Italian bards once gazed, is extended above our heads. We may gaze in untiring admiration upon the lofty mountains, which from our extended and fertile plains, rear their majestic summits above the clouds—upon the heaving ocean as its swelling waves lash the rocky shore—on the majestic cataract, whose rising spray is lighted up by the matchless colorings of the rainbow, and from these majestic displays of beauty and sublimity catch the spirit of inspiration. Nor are we wanting in materials for eventful history. Our early struggles for liberty—the gallant exploits of our heroes—the wisdom of our counsellors—sister republics in fair perspective—their conflicts for existence against the arm of despotism—their successes and reverses, are subjects well calculated to arouse the slumbering energies of the historian, and kindle the hidden fires of genius. The field for scientific investigation is becoming more and more extended—new discoveries in philosophical science are constantly being made, and in all probability the work is but just commenced. In addition to these, a wide range is given for the exercise of benevolent exertions and Christian sympathy.

In view of these, what can hinder us from putting forth every exertion of our immortal minds for acquiring fame as poets, celebrity as historians, or renown as the benefactors of mankind? What mighty inducements are presented for seeking, by a course of honorable and upright conduct, the honor of man and the blessing of the Creator.

THE YEAR BEFORE US.

When I look back on the transactions of the few past years—when I reflect that but a comparatively short time since, not only myself, but numerous others that could be mentioned, were bowing down before the dagon of Partialism, feeding on husks, and endeavoring to satisfy ourselves with the “transitory things of time and sense,” I am led to exclaim, “it is the Lord’s doings, and is marvellous in our eyes.” Brethren, a new year has just commenced, and with it new cares, and new responsibilities. Now, what say you? shall we not, one and all, resolve that from this time forth, we will endeavor to walk more worthy of our “heavenly calling”? I do not know how it may be with you, but for myself I can truly say, that I have made many “crooked paths,” I have often deviated from “wisdom’s ways” during the past year. But, with God’s assistance, I am determined to return “unto the Lord, who will have mercy; and unto our God who will abundantly pardon.” “Create me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me.” Psalm li: 10.

COMBE ON THE CONSTITUTION OF MAN.

I have just finished a perusal of this work, and must acknowledge that my expectations have been more than realized. I fully agree with Br. Thomas, in saying that “it is the best work that I have ever read excepting the Bible.” It should be read by every man, woman and child, capable of understanding it, and possessed by every family in Christendom. I have heard many remark that they should like to obtain the work, but that poverty would prevent it at present. If such individuals will purchase it, read it, and endeavour to follow its instructions, by obeying the physical, organic, and moral laws, I will guarantee that the time they will save, in twelve months, (saying nothing about the expenses of medical aid, and the extreme suffering usually attendant upon disease,) will more than compensate them for the expenses. Indeed, the pleasures of reading it will be a sufficient compensation for its cost to those who have a moderate thirst for information.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 3.—Mr. Montgomery to Mr. Campbell.

DEAR SIR—My attention was forcibly attracted by a letter from Mr. Spencer, on the scriptural meaning of the words gehenna, hades, olem, and aton, and your reply thereunto, contained in No. 10, Vol. 6, of the Millennial Harbinger. With the major portion of Mr. Spencer’s letter I am much pleased, for his remarks bring many facts to light. It gave me much satisfaction to perceive that you also was much pleased with it because you admit the truth of his quotations and remarks, simply excepting his inferences. You indeed observe, “I might, perhaps, make some exceptions to the extent and applications of your criticisms, and to the style of your reasonings upon these words; but to save time and labor (with me always a desideratum) I will concede the whole, and show that your inferences are necessarily and unavoidably to be rejected by every man who believes the apostles’ doctrine;” but, dear Sir, your time and labor are professedly devoted to the elucidation of Scripture, and consequently, if you could prove that the extent and application of his criticisms and reasonings were incorrect, it appears to me it should have been done, maugre time and labor.

My object in addressing you at the present time, is to consider some portions of your answer to Mr. Spencer, which, in my judgment, contains positions directly calculated to mislead the minds of your readers. It appears to me that the passage by you brought to prove endless misery, and your remarks on some of Mr. Spencer’s inferences, do not sustain your conclusions. I therefore write to present my views on this subject, praying you to point out wherein you deem me to be in error on the momentous question of scriptural knowledge.

After having remarked that unfigurative delineations of things form a key by which to unlock the true interpretation of metaphor, parable, and allegory, you say—“Hence, when without figure, and with all the clearness and authority of supreme law, it is promulgated by the Christian Lawgiver, ‘He that shall believe and shall have been immersed shall be saved: and he that will not believe shall be damned, or condemned’—no allusion to ancient customs—no figurative representations through the imagery of nature, or costume of society, can have authority to make it read or mean, ‘He that shall believe, and shall have been immersed, shall be saved; and he that will not believe shall also be saved.’ Saved and condemned are opposites, and no reasoning upon any figure, custom, or form of speech can make them identical. If saved is temporal, so is condemned; if saved is spiritual, so is condemned; if saved is corporeal, so is condemned; but saved and condemned are two states, fates, or fortunes, that are perfect contrasts.”

I have here quoted a sufficiency from your reply, to present your precise meaning, at the same time urging the reader to again peruse the whole paragraph from which it is selected. That saved and condemned are direct opposites, no person can deny, for one is exemption from any evil or evils, while the other is to endure them—but does it therefore follow that the opposite state of the unbeliever will always continue?—does it present any obstacle to the final return of the condemned, to stand in the condition of the saved? Saul of Tarsus was a noted unbeliever, and of course condemned; but he afterwards, as Paul of the Gospel, became saved. You seem to base your whole reasoning on the assumed position, that the passage entirely alludes to a future state, and hence the inconsistency of affirming that saved and damned mean the same thing. But, Sir, would it not be well to establish premises before proceeding to reason from them? If the passage does not refer to a future state, you will at once discover, that a person through life may experience the miseries of unbelief, and still, by the chastising hand of God, become like the reformed prodigal.

Let the inquiry then be made, What part of the passage by you quoted, proves that it refers to a future state? Is it the word "saved"? If this is affirmed, is it true that the word "saved" has such a distinct meaning, that when used, it means salvation from endless misery? We certainly read, that Noah and those with him in the ark, were saved by water, 2 Peter iii: 20; but it was salvation, not from endless misery, but from destruction by the deluge. The term "saved" in Mark xvi: 16, may also have a temporal signification. It is well known to you that the apostles, even to the very last moment previous to the ascension of Jesus, were inclined to unbelief—so much so, that when, after the resurrection of Jesus, they met him by appointment at a mountain in Galilee, some doubted. Matt. xxvii: 17. Had the apostles continued in unbelief, would they not have experienced condemnation in the signal overthrow and terrible calamities which fell upon their nation like a storm? But their unbelief was removed, and as a consequence, they were saved from the horrid evils which Titus flung upon the Israelites. In this sense, at least, it means temporal salvation.

Again; is it clear that the word dammēd fixes the reference of the passage to a future world? If this is asserted, I inquire of you if the term dammēd means endless misery in its original signification? Dr. George Campbell affirms that dammēd is not a just version of the Greek word. "The term dammēd, with us, relates solely to the doom that shall be pronounced upon the wicked at the last day. This cannot be affirmed with truth, of the Greek katakainō, which corresponds exactly to the English verb condemn. It may relate to that future sentence and it may not." Note on Mark xvi: 16. In imitation of this learned author, in your translation, you give us the word condemned instead of dammēd. Will it not be well, instead of assuming, to prove that this condemnation is in a future world, especially as Jesus expressly declares, "He that believeth not, is condemned already"? John iii: 18. It will be remembered that the Jews rejected the Messiah, not from want of evidence, but from perverse prejudice. They were obliged to admit that he performed miracles, but they denied that those miracles established his pretensions. For this practical unbelief they were condemned, and the sentence was executed when the King "sent forth his armies, and destroyed those murderers and burned up their city;" Matt. xxi: 7, in which destructive operation their temple and nation were rooted up. Here is palpable evidence of their condemnation, but it by no means proves that all Israel will not be saved, when the fulness of the Gentiles shall be come in.

It appears to me, that the passage has no reference beyond the apostolic age—for proof of which the context is confidently cited—"And these signs shall follow them that believe: in my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents with safety; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover;" verses 17, 18. These signs were as expressly to follow the believers, as condemnation was the unbelievers. Admit that the application of the passage by you quoted, is correct, where can you find a true believer now? Is there a person in the present age who can cast out demons, speak with new tongues, or drink poison without injury? Certainly not! How is the conclusion to be avoided then, that of all who profess to believe in Christ, not one will be saved? Your penetration will readily perceive the power of this difficulty. Limit the passage, however, to the apostolic age, and all difficulty vanishes. These signs were performed during that time, and I may add, that the Jewish unbelievers experienced certain condemnation also at that time.

I now leave this point, to consider a few of your remarks on Mr. Spencer's inferences. After stating that every believer in the apostolic doctrine must reject those inferences, you give as a reason—"Because your reasonings, by one fatal sweep, destroy the eternity of God and the immortality of man; for if the words olem, aiōnion, aeuvum, everlasting, eternal, applied to the destruction of the wicked, mean not duration without end—then have we no words in human speech that certify us that God, angels, or saints shall have duration without end.—There is no word in human language that expresses duration without end, which is not applied to the future punishment of the wicked." Dear Sir, I am much surprised at this statement, for certainly there are expressions, independent of those you mention, which prove unceasing duration. Do we not read of the "incorruptible God"? Rom. i: 23.—are we not assured that Christ was made a Priest "after the power of an endless life"? Heb. vii: 16.—are we not certified that "this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality"? 1 Cor. xv: 53. Most certainly we are—and yet are these expressions applied to the punishment of the wicked. Besides this; even if we admit that the term everlasting means duration without end, in its primitive signification, have you shown, that when it is applied to the punishment of the wicked, it is not among those instances where it is taken in part of its signification? for you admit that it is sometimes so taken in the Scriptures.

Again; you quote from Mr. Spencer this expression, "There is no certainty whether olem or aiōnion punishment mean one minute or a thousand years," and from it you draw the inference, "and so of eternal life and the eternal God."—And you presently add, "But if God be eternal, then are life and death, happiness and misery eternal realities." If a Jew could read this statement, he might finish your argument, by affirming, that, "if God be eternal," the "everlasting priesthood" is an eternal reality, and consequently Christ is an impostor and his system a fable, because he endeavored to remove that covenant which God had permanently established. Your conclusion, that if everlasting and forever are indefinite in their meaning, the existence of God is also indefinite, is unwarrantable. It appears evident to me, that the meaning of these terms is determined by the various subjects to which they are applied. There are many words in the English language, which are used in this very manner. We say, a tall man, tall tree, tall tower—wise boy, wise man, wise God—great man, great mountain, great God. In these instances, the adjectives tall, wise, and great, take their peculiar meaning from the subjects to which they are applied. It is the same with the words everlasting and forever, as used in the Scriptures. In Exodus xxi: 6, we read of a servant, that he should serve his master forever—in 2 Kings v: 27, we read that the leprosy of Naaman should cleave to Gehazi forever, meaning his life-time—in Jeremiah xxiii: 40, we read of an "everlasting reproach" which was applied to the captivity of the Jews in Babylon, which lasted seventy years—in Genesis xvii: 7, we read that the land of Canaan was given to the Jews for an "everlasting possession," which they retained a number of centuries—in Matt. xxv: 46, we read of "everlasting punishment," which the Jews have already endured longer than they retained their "everlasting possession"—in Genesis xlix: 26, we read of "everlasting hills," which means as long as the hills shall last—in Hab. iii: 6, we read of the "everlasting ways of God," which means the infinitude of the Almighty, because we know that he must be "without beginning of days or ending of years." In all these cases, the meaning of these terms everlasting and forever, is determined by their application. Consequently, it does not follow, that if these words possess an indefinite meaning, the existence of God himself is doubtful.

Besides, as has been remarked, if we admit that these terms mean duration without end, your conclusions are not even then established. For, you must concede the fact, that they are sometimes used in a limited sense, and hence, when they are applied to the punishment of the wicked, it can be shown that they belong to that class of instances, for the nature of punishment in connexion with express passages of Scripture, show that chastise-ment will end in obedience, and consequently can not be endless. Even "eternal life" is enjoyed on the earth, as any person may perceive who will consult John xvii: 3. And if a person should ask me for evidence of life hereafter, I should not direct him solely to these terms, but to the account of the resurrection, to the fact that we shall become equal unto the angels of God, and to the truth that we must put on immortality.

In the light of these remarks, it is unnecessary for me to consider your concluding paragraph, for it is obviously fallacious as well as null in its reasoning. And though I know of no person who preaches that any man will be saved in unbelief, or that the wicked as such will be as happy as the righteous, yet if to preach, that in the fulness of time, mankind shall be saved from sin and adopted into the liberty of the truth, constitutes a person an enemy to Jesus, you may look upon me as one—for it is my hope, my joy, and my faith, to believe that Christ is the Saviour of the world. These remarks are offered in the expectation that they will receive a portion of your attention, for the purpose of casting more light upon the page of Scripture. Yours, in love and good will,

GEO. W. MONTGOMERY.

1 SAMUEL XXVIII.—THE WITCH OF EN-DOR.

A correspondent requests some information respecting this chapter, and the little-understood personage named in it. Could he procure Balfour's Three "Essays," in that "On the intermediate state of the dead," (pp. 59 to 66,) he would find the subject discussed at length. But as it is probable that he can not procure that work where he is, I offer a brief explanation of the subject, derived principally from other sources, so as not to burden the readers of Br. Balfour's work with a second edition of what they have already perused.

Nearly all Partialist authors suppose that it was really Samuel who was raised (not by the woman, however, but contrary to her expectations, and before her jugglery could deceive Saul) by the power of God, for the warning and punishment of Saul. To this generality we are furnished with one exception—the late Dr. Osgood, of Medford, Mass., who, in a posthumous work, after examining the hypotheses of various commentators on this subject, says—"I therefore ask your attention to the history itself, that we may see whether upon a critical examination, it states any facts or circumstances, which may not easily and naturally be resolved into the arts and management of imposture." He then proceeds to show that the phrase "a woman that hath a familiar spirit," if literally rendered from the Hebrew, would read the "mistress of the power of the cavity"—belly—or bottle—Aub being rendered by both these last terms. Josephus calls such, "women that could speak out of their bellies"—or stomachs, viz., VENTRILOQUISTS.—They pretended to the power of raising the spirits of the dead—of communing with the gods, or infernal deities, and of thus foretelling future events; and though these pretences were recognized as realities by the Heathen, the Jews were ever required to treat them as falsities, and to punish those who practiced them as impostors. This is evident from every passage of the Old Testament where they are named. Their punishment was also increased, because their pretences tended to seduce people into idolatry, and their practices often abounded in dangerous and demoralizing abominations. With these prefatory remarks, I proceed to the explanation of the particulars of the case now under consideration—premising that the reader had better read the chapter, and follow my remarks book in hand, if he feels any special desire fully to understand the subject.

Though Saul disguised himself in dress, yet as he was "higher than any of the people from the shoulders and upward," (i. e., nearly two heads taller than any man in Israel—see 1 Sam. x: 23, 24,) he was known at first sight even by those who had only heard of him, as this Ventriloquist undoubtedly had. And though outwardly disguised, he did not disguise his speech, but gave a promise, (see verse 10) that none but the king could fulfil—"As the Lord liveth, there shall no punishment happen thee for this thing." But the woman pretends not to recognize him—for she is the best practiced in deception—as she designs to make that recognition subservient to her reputation in her art. Hence, when she commences her incantations, she cries out in surprise, (verse 12,) as if some figure she had raised informed her who Saul was. This confirms Saul in his superstitions, blind confidence in her, and he eagerly asks what she saw—for he sees nothing. Her reply is in accordance with her Heathen notions and pretences, verse 13—"I saw gods [infernal deities, which are not recognized in the Scriptures as realities] ascending out of the earth." But Saul, intent only on Samuel's appearing, asks respecting one, only—"What form is he of?" He sees nothing yet. The woman answered by describing Samuel as he appeared when living—"an old man covered with a mantle"—and Saul, by her description, not by his own sight, "perceived that it was Samuel," and prostrated himself accordingly. Now, even admitting that Samuel had a ghost, and that it could be thus raised up, surely I may be permitted to doubt whether his "mantle" had one! And if mantles have no ghosts, and Samuel's was not buried with him, and carried thence with him, how could it be made to appear upon him?

But, to proceed. From the pretended appearance of Samuel, to the close of this remarkable interview, Dr. Osgood's remarks will probably be more conclusive than any I can offer. I therefore transcribe them for the reader's perusal.

"At this stage of the process, the woman disappears in her own person; and through the remainder of the scene, by her art of ventriloquism, supports the character of Samuel, whom she had made Saul to believe to be now present, come up out of the ground. But before she could venture to make her ghost utter oracles, it was necessary to draw out of Saul the object of his inquiry. Accordingly she puts this interrogatory into the mouth of her pretended Samuel: "Why hast thou disquieted me, to bring me up?" Are not these words precisely in the style of pagan witchcraft? Do they not explicitly recognize its powers to evoke the dead? Had the true Samuel been present, sent by God, as so many learned commentators have taught; would he have thus attributed his coming to Saul, or to the witch at Saul's instigation? Would he have thus complained of the disturbance given him, or of the force put upon his inclinations? For the words, "disquieted me," in the original Hebrew signify, "moved and disturbed by violence," and are similar to the boast of the Thessalonian witch in Lucan's Pharsalia, that she could in actus invitos præpere deos,—"constrain the unwilling gods." Would the true Samuel, sent by God, have appeared ignorant of the purpose of his mission, and humbly asked of Saul, why he had been sent for? On the contrary, would he not have opened upon the delinquent with a sharp rebuke of his recourse to a witch, and at once thundered in his ears the impending judgments of Heaven? But the artful woman assumes no more of the character of Samuel, than might be consistent with the reputation of her profession; and suffers not a word to escape him tending to its disparagement—no rebuke upon herself, nor upon Saul for applying to her.

"The pretended Samuel having put Saul upon stating his case, it is thus described: "I am sore distressed, for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me, and answereth me no more, neither by prophets, nor by dreams; therefore I have called thee, that thou mayest make known unto me what I shall do." This information was amply sufficient to serve as a clue in directing the woman what response should be given by her feigned Samuel. Nothing could be more obvious and natural, than this reply: "Wherefore, then dost thou ask of me, seeing the Lord is departed from thee, and is become thine enemy?" What follows in the two next verses, is but a repetition of the things which all Israel knew Samuel had long since said to Saul: "And the Lord hath done to thee, as he spake by me; for the Lord hath rent the kingdom out of thine hand, and given it to thy neighbor, even to David: because thou obeyedst not the voice of the Lord, nor executedst his fierce wrath upon Amalek, therefore the Lord hath done this thing unto thee this day." The witch knew that she was upon safe ground, while she thus confined her ghost to the very words before spoken by the prophet.

"The remainder of the response has, indeed, the air of prophecy; but was, in fact, conjecture founded upon the highest probability. She knew that David, with his brave band of heroes, by whose aid Saul's former victories had been generally obtained, was now in the camp of the Philistines;—that their army, in other respects, was more numerous and powerful than it had ever been before; while that of the Israelites was disheartened and in a state of dismay, partaking in the terrors of their king and commander. From these circumstances, she was led to conclude that the time was at hand when God would fulfil to David his promise of giving him the kingdom. In order to his accession to it, the death of Saul and his sons seemed necessary. She had heard Saul confessing that God had forsaken him. In this case, she well knew that his defeat and destruction were inevitable. These considerations might inspire her with the confidence to make her pretended Samuel add, "Moreover, the Lord will also deliver Israel, with thee, into the hand of the Philistines; and to-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me." Undoubtedly the death of him and his sons was the more willingly foretold, on account of his former persecution of the witches. The Hebrew word rendered, to-morrow, is indefinite and ambiguous; as it may mean the next day, or some future time. It is elsewhere rendered, "in time to come." Had Saul survived the approaching battle, this latitude with respect to the predicted time of his death, would have admitted of an interpretation consistent with the truth of the oracle."

In conclusion, I would remark that the historian has nothing to say either on the philosophy or morality of the account he records. He neither comments on Saul's weak and wicked compliance with Heathen notions and pretences, nor exposes the falsehood of the Ventriloquist's declarations, or explains the means by which she effects her impositions. He merely records what is said and done—what is transacted as it appeared to the witnesses, and what they said according to those appearances.

As to the prophecy (as it is commonly called) of the woman, it could not have been of God, if confined strictly to the events of the literal "to-morrow;" for it was not fulfilled as respected all the sons of Saul. Ishbosheth, the son of Saul, lived for more than two years after this event. See 2 Sam. ii: 10. For further explanations and remarks, the reader is referred to the work of Br. Balfour, already named. MATTHEW III: 12.

"Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner: but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire."

The brother who requests an explanation of this passage, can be gratified with an exposition of my views of it generally, by consulting Ballou or Whittemore on the Parables, or Paige's Selections from Eminent Commentators. The latter quotes Pearce, Hammond, Cappe, Clarke and Kenrick to show that the land of Judea is here represented as the threshing floor of the Lord—by his fan is meant the Roman army, the instrument he used in punishing the Jews, and in causing the Christians to be separated from them—by wheat, the Christians preserved in Pella, in Cælo Syria—by chaff, the persecuting Jews—by unquenchable fire, a temporal judgment that could not be extinguished by man, or while materials remained for it to consume; as was the destruction of Jerusalem and the punishment yet resting on the Jewish people—by burning up, the utter extinction of the Jews as a nation, and even of their earthly lives as individuals. He also quotes Lightfoot, and shows that that theological giant only applied this passage in part to the unseen world, and because he supposed some similar parable should be thus applied; but in all other respects he agreed with the above quoted authorities. This parable is supposed to accord fully with the parable of the Axe, verse 10, and with the denunciations of verse 7, of the same chapter—only that it speaks of rewards as well as of punishment. With these references and brief remarks the subject is submitted for further consideration. A. B. G.

THE TRINITY IN UNITY.

In the Methodist articles of faith, we have the following curious statement, viz.—"There is one living and true God, everlasting, without body or parts, of infinite power, wisdom and goodness," etc. "In unity of this Godhead there are three persons, of one substance, power and eternity; the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost."

Reader, look at the above, and then compare it with Scripture testimony and acknowledged facts. This article says God is "without body or parts." Jesus Christ, the Son, had a body when on earth—he has a body now in heaven, and we expect to be "fashioned like unto his glorious body." Now let us use a syllogism or two for illustration.

God is without body or parts: Jesus Christ had on earth, and has in heaven, both body and parts: Ergo, Jesus Christ is not God. Again. The one true God, whom our Trinitarian brethren worship, is without body or parts: our Trinitarian brethren worship Jesus Christ who hath both body and parts, as the true God: Ergo, there are two true Gods, or else Trinitarians worship what is not the true God. DR. ELY.

Will Br. J. B. W. please inform the public when or where Dr. Ely declared openly and boldly, that "THE ORTHODOX ARE ENDEAVORING TO UNITE CHURCH AND STATE IN THIS REPUBLIC"? I well know that Dr. Ely has laid down directions for conduct, in his memorable Sunday School Union Report, and in his 4th of July sermon, which would lead to such a result—but I also know that the Doctor has openly and boldly declared, that a union of Church and State would not be the result, and was not the object of his recommendations. But J. B. W. quotes the language he has given above, as Dr. Ely's very words. If the Doctor has uttered these precise words, it should be known—if not, they should not be attributed to him, and J. B. W. is in duty bound to explain his conduct.

As the article here alluded to was published in the Star of December 31, I ask room in that paper for this call for information. "Let justice be done, though the heavens fall." A. B. G.

CHRISTMAS EVE.

We have received one or two communications giving an account of celebrations in their respective places, for which we have not yet found room, and propose therefore at this late hour, making an editorial summary of their contents, with notice of ours in this city. Respecting the latter, some curiosity, I find, needs gratification.

IN UTICA.—Notices of the celebration and concert, and of the object to which the proceeds were to be applied, (viz., the liquidation of the meeting-house debt,) were handed to the clergy of the city, with requests that they would read them to their respective congregations on the preceding Sunday. Every clergyman courteously complied with the request, except Elder Kingsford, Baptist, and Rev. Mr. Proal, Episcopalian. Rev. Mr. Mitchell, the Episcopal Methodist clergyman, added a few words calculated slightly to discountenance an at tendance; and Rev. Mr. Shaw, one of the Presbyterian clergymen added a few calculated to encourage an attendance. I mention these things merely to show where courteous and liberal feelings do exist—names of sects are no guides in these matters—facts are the best proofs.

The house was comfortably filled at an early hour, with persons belonging probably to every denomination in the city, and some friends from the country. The house was beautifully decorated—light, neat, tasteful. The choir, composed of singers from several of the other churches and our own, aided by a few instruments, and led by Mr. Lyon, filled the ear and stirred the heart with enrapturing music. Of the sermon, our first number renders it unnecessary to speak—as our readers have all seen it—save that Br. Skinner's indisposition did not mar its delivery. All present were, I believe, highly gratified with the celebration. After deducting all expenses, one hundred and thirty dollars remained towards the liquidation of the debts of the society.

NORTH BLOOMFIELD.—The spacious meeting-house was completely filled with attentive hearers, who listened with delight to an introductory address from Br. N. Brown, and an appropriate discourse from Br. O. Roberts, of Lakeville, who preaches here steadily. The house was illuminated and tastefully decorated with evergreen, for the occasion. The singing was excellent and appropriate, and joy and delight appeared to pervade every bosom.

PARMA.—The Universalist meeting-house was splendidly illuminated and decorated for the occasion, and it is supposed that more than one thousand persons united in the celebration. Every countenance beamed with joy and gratitude to God, during the interesting and appropriate exercises. The sermon was by Br. Queal.

WOLCOTT.—Here also was an interesting celebration of the great event of a Saviour's birth. The Universalist meeting-house was brilliantly illuminated, tastefully decorated, and completely filled with a happy and attentive auditory. Sermon by the pastor, Br. T. D. Cook.

Want of room obliges us to omit the remarks on the appropriateness of these celebrations, and the happy effects resulting from them. They need no apology—for they do honor to the hearts of those devising them, and form a bright spot in each year, over the remembrance of which piety, joy and religion delight to linger.

THE HERALD OF TRUTH.

Twice has a notice of this able co-worker in the cause of impartial grace, been crowded out by a press of other matters. It commenced its fourth volume on the 6th inst.—so that, of course, three numbers have already been received. It is well filled and well printed. The terms and size are the same as our own sheet. Br. Sanderson, proprietor—Brs. Sanderson, Chase and Hammond, Editors; Montgomery and Barry, Corresponding Editors. Published simultaneously in Rochester and Auburn, N. Y.

Br. J. F. Owen, of Peru, Ohio, requests us to say—
"Br. Sanderson—Send the Herald to Thomas Hews, Huron, Huron county, Ohio, with a prospectus. He will act as your agent."

THE KNICKERBOCKER.

This excellent monthly, containing 100 pages in each number, has commenced a new volume with the year. The first, or January number has an article for nearly every imaginable taste—and an Editor will certainly be pleased with the whole banquet. The first article, intended to disprove the too common and erroneous opinion that Republics are less favorable to the encouragement of the Arts and Sciences than Monarchies, is deserving of a general perusal by every freeman. It carries the war into the camp, and proves exactly the reverse of that opinion to be true, by an appeal to facts. Nor is this the only article worth notice—there are many others equally good and interesting. Ollapod is there, also. The Editor's Table is well filled with a very agreeable variety, among which the pepper, vinegar and mustard may be found, dealt out to Dr. Reese for his unblushing mendacity and misquotations of Brigham on Religion, in a review of the Reply of the latter to Dr. Reese's "Fruits of Phrenology." Any person wishing to procure a large, cheap, and original monthly, cannot do better than to subscribe for this. I. Tiffany, Esq., (at H. and E. Plimney's Bookstore,) of this city, is the agent. Terms—for one year, (two volumes,) five dollars—for six months, (one volume of 600 pages,) three dollars.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The last number of this elegant weekly was a plate number—a fine engraving of the landing of Columbus—and entirely filled with original articles. Nothing can be neater than the paper and typography of the Mirror—its pictorial embellishments are usually of the best—and its contributors rank very high in the literature of this country and England. In our humble opinion, his readers will thank him for omitting, at least, its "Sunday Evening Readings." It would have been to the credit of the Mirror, had they been omitted earlier, or filled with something less Heathenish, absurd and unscriptural than the dogmas of the trinity, total depravity, and some others. A piece of poor poetry or nonsensical prose can better be endured, than treatises of false theology in a literary journal.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

This is the season when we receive numerous letters from our friends, containing various interesting items which we deem worthy of being communicated to our readers. Our limits compel us to be more select and brief in our extracts, than we could wish. The first selections will tend to show what a very little exertion on the part of each subscriber might do to hold up and strengthen the hands of our publishers in these times, when the price of our periodicals is not much more than half their worth, if compared with the present high prices of all other articles in the markets. We hope and pray these extracts may have some effect on the minds of our patrons every where, and would add to such as intend to follow these and other good examples that might be named, "What thou doest, do quickly."

"Peru, Huron county, O., January 8, 1837.

"Br. Grosh—Being struck with the propriety of some remarks by a correspondent of yours, urging each one of your subscribers to procure another subscriber, I resolved to set about the work, when the question arose, 'for what paper shall I get the new subscriber?' I esteem both the Magazine and Advocate, and the Herald of Truth, as very valuable periodicals. I therefore resolved to get a new subscriber for each of them, and then set about the work. With a very little exertion I got a good and lasting subscriber for each. And I think that every subscriber to your paper, however remote, can get another one. You have eighteen subscribers to your paper in this place, and there is not one of them but what can get a new subscriber, if he will but use a little exertion. All have some friends living in the adjoining towns, or some old acquaintances whom they can influence to take the paper with but a few words. I wish, Br. Grosh, there could be a simultaneous movement to this effect—only calculate what good might be done—where there are now, fifty readers of your paper, there would be, then, one hundred! Let every one set about the work, and the advancement of the cause, so far as it depends upon the spread of knowledge by our periodicals, will be double in 1837, to what it was in 1836.

"Yours in the spirit of the Gospel,

J. F. OWEN."

"Hamilton, December 30, 1836.

"Brs. Grosh and Hutchinson—Look here—right in the very seat of Partialism I have obtained nine responsible subscribers for your excellent and valuable paper—all, save one, to be mailed to this village. I am persuaded, from the little trouble I have had in procuring these names, that if one-fourth of your subscribers would spend even a portion of the time they now probably waste in some useless employment, each one might obtain from four to six or eight good subscribers to your paper. Thus would they not only enable the publishers to meet their engagements easily, throughout the hard times, but be instruments, under God, in spreading the benign and happy influences of Gospel truth, until fanaticism and error would cease to have a place in an enlightened community.

"Awake, ye sleeping brethren—arouse from your drowsy slumbers—try your strength in doing good; for no man can tell his strength until he has tried it. Remember, 'I can not' never accomplished any thing—but 'I can' and 'I will' have performed wonders. Try it. M. C."

But we must stop—nor have we room for the per contra letters containing one, three, six, eight, ten, fifteen or twenty discontinuances each—enough to chill one's blood these cold mornings in these hard times. Truly, a subscription list is a fluctuating and variable barometer by which to foretell future pecuniary prospects! A. B. G.

NEW AGENTS.

Hiram McHuron, Clay—S. Boothe, Cente White Creek—L. Bancroft, Springfield, O.—Stephen Averil, Northeast, Pa.—M. R. Coon, Vermillionville, Ills.—Richard Brownson, Lapeer, Mich.—Selleck Seymour, our former agent at Tecumseh, Mich., has removed to Cold Water where he will hereafter act as our agent, and Sylvanus Lannard will be our future agent at Tecumseh—R. POETRY.

The following lines, cut from an old newspaper, I consider beautiful, and should be glad to see them in a corner of your useful paper. If you are of the same opinion, you will, when convenient, let them appear. Respectfully Yours, A. S.

THE ALPINE HORN.

"This instrument is constructed of the bark of the cherry tree, and conveys sound to a great distance. The shepherd who dwells highest on the Alps, the moment the last sun-beam is on the summit, takes his horn and calls aloud 'Praised be the Lord.' Every echo catches it; every voice on the hills repeats the name of God, and every knee is bent in prayer. After their pure worship in the open air, the simple shepherds with their families retire to the rest of innocence."

Day fades apace; its broad red glow
Went up from all the vales below,
And like a flash of lightning sprung
From Alp to hoary Alp, and flung
A momentary crimson streak
On every snow-wreathed mountain peak.
Dark are the clouds that late were roll'd
In red and purple, green and gold;
Even Jura takes a deeper blue,
And all the hills their cold gray hue;
All save Mont Blanc—the king of day
Still lingers on his icy rills,
And throws his last and brightest ray
In farewell to the king of hills.

Hush! 'tis a sweet and solemn sound
Floats downward on the clear cold air;
And happy voices wait it round
And grateful hearts are framed to prayer—
"Praised be the Lord!" thine are the days
When storms the mountain cottage blanch;
Thine, vintage-time, thy hand upstays
The snow-wreath and the avalanche.
"Praised be the Lord!" it echoes round—
Nor one eternal Alp is mute!
And distant cities catch the sound,
Like the low breathing of a flute.
"Praised be the Lord!" fear not to sleep—
His eye shall see—his hand shall keep.

CONTINUATION OF THE OFFERS.
PREMIUMS FOR PRIZE TALES AND ESSAYS.

The publishers of the Magazine and Advocate offer premiums to the amount of SIXTY-SIX DOLLARS, as follows:—

1. For the best essay, on the best practicable means of promoting the knowledge and practice of Universalism—Twenty dollars.
2. For the second best essay on the same subject—Ten dollars.
3. For the third best essay on the same subject—two free subscriptions to the Magazine and Advocate for one year—or one, for two years.

[It is designed that the essay shall embrace the best means for teaching the principles of the Gospel not only to the adult, by the preacher, but to the young, by the parent.]

1. For the best religious tale, embracing an illustration of the principles of Universalism—Twenty dollars.
2. For the second best tale of the same character—Ten dollars.
3. For the third best tale of the same character—two free subscriptions to the Magazine and Advocate for one, or one for two years.

[The especial object or aim of each tale is left to the writer—but there must be one stated, worthy the principles embraced in it.]

Each essay and each tale to exceed three columns of this paper; in the largest type now used for matter in it; and not to exceed fifteen columns of the same.

The articles to be sent to the undersigned, free of postage, on or before the 6th day of April next, for submission to the decision of an impartial committee, and the after disposal of the proprietors of this paper. To do this properly, each essay or tale should be designated by one or more marks or mottos, and those marks or mottos should be enclosed in a separate paper, sealed, with the author's name within—this enclosure will not be opened until after the decision of the committee has been made.

In deciding on the claims of the various articles that may be submitted for premiums, the committee will be instructed to proceed in the following order with each.

1. Its adaptation to the object for which it is written.
2. The Christian feeling and spirit it breathes.
3. Its literary merit and finish.
4. Its grammatical accuracy and plain expression.
5. Its preparation for the press.
6. Its legibility in the manuscript. The article having the greatest number of these requisites, in the highest perfection, and in the order here named, (if coming under the conditions previously laid down,) will be preferred to all others. Those greatly deficient in them will be rejected altogether, even if they are the only articles of the kind that are offered.

If but one or two essays or tales deserving a premium, are received, the committee may award it any one, or to the two, any two of the premiums here offered. If more than three essays or tales deserving premiums are received, the committee may award to each over that number, a free subscription to this paper for not more than one year, as they deem proper—the objects of our offer being encouragement to authors, as well as the improvement of our paper, and the advancement of the cause.

The award of the committee, names of the successful authors, and one of the essays or tales to which is awarded the highest premium, will be published in this paper, on or before the close of April next.

January 6, 1837.

MARRIAGES.

In Portlandville, 10th inst., by Rev. Mr. Crandall.
Mr. LEVI M. MASON, of New-Hartford, to Miss SUSAN
C. BARTLET, of the former place.

In Leyden, 8th inst., by Rev. J. A. Aspinwall, Mr. JAMES
M. MURRAY, of Martinsburg, to Miss ANGELINE K.
WETMORE, of the former place.

In Hume, 8th inst., by Hammond Webster, Esq., Mr.
OLIVER M. RUSSELL, to Miss SARAH ANN BRONSON, all of that place.

In Geneseo, 11th inst., by Rev. O. Roberts, Mr. SHU-KEY S. RAYMOND, of Avon, to Miss HARRIET PERKINS, of Geneva.

DEATHS.

In Holland, Erie county, December 14th, 1836, Mrs.
SARAH DAVIS, wife of Nathaniel P. Davis, aged 25 years. I was informed by her friends, that Mrs. Davis made no pretensions to religion until a few days previous to her decease, when she embraced Jesus Christ as the "Son of God and the Saviour of the world;" in which faith she died resigned and happy.

The funeral services were performed on the 16th by the writer, and a discourse delivered to a numerous concourse of people who assembled upon the occasion.

L. PAINE.

In Marshall, 13th inst., Mr. JEREMIAH SAWYER, aged 39 years. He has left a wife and three small children to lament the loss of a kind husband and an affectionate parent. May they be consoled by the promises of that Gospel which proclaims salvation for all the kindreds of the earth in Christ Jesus, the promised seed of Abrahham. The funeral was attended by Elder Beach, Methodist, and a sermon delivered from 1 Cor. xv: 21, 22.

B.

In Boston, N. Y., December 26, SOPHRONIA, infant daughter of William and Azubah Andre, aged 9 months.

In the city of New-York, about October 1st, 1836, Mrs. JULIANA GOODRICH, consort of Mr. John Goodrich, of Springfield, Bradford county, Pa., aged 22 years.
She was on a visit in that city with her husband. On her way thither, she complained of her side, injured about three years since, by a fall from a horse. The journeying increased it, and in defiance of the best medical aid, she fell asleep in Jesus. Amiable, discreet and pious, she was beloved and confided in by all who knew her—the hope and joy of her husband, and the ornament of society.

Her remains were taken to her late place of residence, and on the 29th of October, the consolations of the Gospel which cheered her in life and supported her in death, were tendered to an exceedingly large congregation, by Br. G. S. Ames, from 1 Cor. xx: 57.

In Sheshequin, Bradford county, Pa., December 20,
Mr. MOSES WOODBURN, aged 72 years. In his decease, his family have lost a supporting father—community, a penetrating observer and successful adviser—and the State, a respected and devoted citizen. He died as he had lived, a firm believer in the Abrahamic Gospel, and selected, in his last moments, Heb. xi: 9, as the subject of his funeral discourse, and the writer as the feeble instrument to deliver it—which was attended to, on the 2d inst., by a large concourse of sympathising neighbors and friends of all denominations.

G. S. AMES.

In Columbia, Bradford county, Pa., about November 11th, 1836, Mr. DUNBAR SMITH, aged 37 years, leaving an affectionate wife and a large family of children to lament his departure. The funeral discourse from Romans viii: 38, by Br. Ames.

Drowned in the Susquehanna, November 7th, 1836,
Mr. JOHN MOORE, of Litchfield, Bradford county, Pa., aged about 30 years, leaving a wife and a number of small children to deplore the death of their chief support in life. The hopes of the Gospel were tendered for the consolation of the numerous mourning relatives and sympathising friends, by Br. Ames, of Athens, Pa.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER III.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

FORMATION OF CHARACTER.

That a good character is to be prized above all other earthly considerations, is a position which few will controvert. To a young man, it is the foundation—and the only sure one—upon which he can rationally base any expectation of future respectability and prosperity. Youth should not believe they can arise to eminence in any calling or profession—in any situation or condition in life—without possessing a good character. Whoever cherishes such anticipation, is most certainly doomed to bitter disappointment. As reasonably can they expect to "gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles."

The young man who is studiously intent on establishing a good character, may be considered rich, although destitute of property. He is rich in the esteem of community—rich in the confidence and trust reposed in him, by all to whom he is known—rich in possessing the good wishes, and in receiving the kind offices of those around him—rich in the assistance cheerfully granted him in the hour of misfortune, the most readily by those who best know his worth. But without a good character, and without a desire to obtain one, a young man is in reality, poor, though possessing the wealth of the Indies. He is poor in every consideration wherein the other is rich. Poor in the respect, trust and confidence of others—poor in every thing that can render life happy or desirable, to an intellectual being. The consciousness which he carries about with him, that he is despised by the virtuous and respectable, is a sting that will embitter his days.

In meditating plans for his future prosperity, the young man should consider a good character, as the first important acquisition to be secured. If he makes a mistake here—if he views character as an indifferent consideration—a matter of no consequence, worthy of no thought or exertion—his condition is extremely precarious. He has turned his face toward the downward path of dishonor and wretchedness—he has already taken one long step therein—and unless he speedily changes his course, and rectifies this primary error, his career will be one of disappointment and ruin. Reflect, for one moment. Suppose a young man is known to be a spendthrift—known to be ignorant, indolent, dishonest, intemperate and vicious—what are his prospects? Who will repose confidence in him, or trust him, or encourage him, or stand by him in the hour of misfortune, or aid him in times of trial? On the other hand, let it be known that a youth is well informed, industrious, economical, strictly temperate and moral, and the whole community are his friends—all are ready to employ him, and assist him to rise to circumstances of competency.—Between these two conditions, every wise young man will rightly choose the latter in preference to that of the former; and must, therefore, perceive the immense importance of a good character, and the great necessity of striving to obtain it.

Fair reader, need I speak of the vast importance of a good character to the young lady? Need I say, it is her all—that with it, she is every thing, and without it, nothing—yea, worse than nothing? These positions are so plain, that, it would seem, all young ladies must be aware of their propriety! If not, one moment's reflection must satisfy them of their truth. Let it be known that a young lady is idle and uninformed—that she is fond of gossiping and "spinning street yarn," rather than of engaging in some laudable means of industry—that she is better acquainted with the heroes and heroines of silly novels, than the rules of housewifery and domestic economy—that her virtue, honesty and veracity are suspected—and who does not perceive that, with such a name, her prospects of forming an eligible connexion, and of prospering in life, are entirely destroyed? But one whose character is the reverse of this—who is intelligent, prudent, industrious and virtuous, has every advantage of which the other is deprived.

The necessity, therefore, of a good character, both to young ladies and gentlemen, must be perfectly obvious. And how is such a character to be obtained? Can you inherit it, as you do your name? Can you purchase it with gold, or obtain possession of it by theft? No—no. A good character must be formed—it must be made—it must be built up, by your own individual exertions! If you are negligent or indifferent in regard to this subject—if you leave the character to form itself, as chance may direct—"if, instead of exerting reflection for this valuable purpose, you deliver yourselves up at so critical a time, to sloth and pleasure—if you refuse to listen to any counsellor but humor, or attend to any pursuit except that of amusement—if you allow yourselves to float loose and careless on the tide of life, ready to receive any direction which the current of fashion, or of licentiousness, may chance to give you—what can you expect to follow from such beginnings? While so many around you are undergoing the sad consequences of a like indiscretion, for what reason shall not those consequences extend to you? Can you attain success without that preparation, and escape dangers without that precaution, which are required of others? Will prosperity and happiness grow up to you of its own accord, and solicit your acceptance, when to the rest of mankind, it is the fruit of long cultivation, and the acquisition of labor and care? Deceive not yourselves with such hopes."* I repeat, the character must be made—it must be a work—and a work, too, of meditation and forethought.

The characteristics by which you desire to be distinguished through life, should be selected by your own well exercised judgment, and established by your industry and perseverance. Ask yourselves what character you would like to possess before the world?—whether you would be respected or despised, by the good and virtuous?—and act in accordance to your decision. And remember, all the excellence of character you obtain, must be the fruit of your own labor—the result of your own exertions. Friends may cheer and encourage you, but they can not do this work for you. They can not be industrious, or virtuous, or well informed, or honest, in your place. These characteristics, if you possess them at all, you must obtain by the diligent exercise of your own faculties and advantages.

To arrive at excellence of character, it is well to adopt models for imitation. Think of some individuals, the excellencies of whose characters you would be pleased to possess. And let not these standards be low ones. They should be high—they had far better be too high, than too low. It is an old proverb, that although he who aims at the sun, will not reach it, yet his arrow will fly much higher, than if aimed at an object on a level with himself. So in the formation of character. Let your models be exalted ones; and although you may possibly fail of reaching their elevation, yet, undoubtedly you will ascend much higher, than had you selected some inferior patterns. Let your models be frequently before your mind—imitate the conduct and disposition which characterized those you would copy after—mark the course which they took to obtain their good names, and do thou likewise.

I can not better close this subject, than in the words of the lamented Wirt. "Take it for granted that there is no excellence without great labor. No mere aspirations for eminence, however ardent, will do the business. Wishing and sighing, and imagining and dreaming of greatness, will never make you great or respectable. If you would get to the mountain's top on which the temple of fame stands, it will not do to stand still, looking, and admiring, and wishing you were there. You must gird up your loins, and go to work with all the indomitable energy of Hannibal scaling the Alps. We can not all be Franklin's, it is true; but by imitating his mental habits and unwearied industry, we may reach an eminence we should never otherwise obtain. Nor would he have been the Franklin he was, if he had permitted himself to be discouraged by the reflection that we can not all be Newtons! It is our business to make the most of our own talents and opportunities; and instead of discouraging ourselves by comparisons and impossibilities, to believe all things imaginary, possible; as, indeed, almost all things are, to a spirit bravely and firmly resolved."

RELIGION.

BY MRS. E. L. WHISTON.

People are too apt to associate the idea of religion, with gloom and sadness. Piety and melancholy are with many, synonymous terms. To the young, in particular, she appears clothed in the habiliments of mourning, with a stern aspect, and hollow voice, prohibiting all enjoyment as sinful and displeasing to God—with one hand pointing to a steep and rugged path, which she calls the only road to Heaven, while with the other she directs their eyes to the broad road of iniquity, which she warns them to avoid, but at the same time represents it as strewn with flowers. But, my young reader, this is not true religion. It is only called so by those who have never experienced that love which "purifies the heart," and renders all its requirements easy and delightful—her real name is superstition. "Pure religion and undefiled, is this, to visit the widow and fatherless in their affliction and keep oneself unspotted from the world"—to "love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself," and manifest this love by "doing unto others as ye would that they should do unto you." Is there any thing in all this calculated to inspire feelings of melancholy and sadness? No; religion will never deprive you of any pleasure worthy the name. I would not be understood to say that Christianity imposes no restraints, far from it, but its restrictions are such as will remove envy, pride, malice, uncharitableness and every thing calculated to mar our pleasures. It does not lessen, but adds to our enjoyment—excess, in any thing, is not enjoyment. It does not forbid our drinking of the waters, but cleanses the stream from the impurities which cause it to overflow, and renders it wholesome and refreshing to those who partake with moderation. Look at the man who is conscientious in the discharge of every duty to his neighbor and to his God, who indulges in amusement as a relaxation from business; and then at him who makes pleasure a business, regardless of the calls of charity, of sympathy with the afflicted, and of duty to his fellows; and ask your own conscience, which enjoys the greatest amount of happiness? I am now making a comparison while in the possession of health, friends, and in the uninterrupted tide of prosperity. Here the comparison ceases; for in the day of adversity—stretched upon the bed of sickness—when called to part with friends dear to us as our own existence, and in the last and trying hours of death, what can console us if we are deprived of the consolations of the Gospel?

If any doubt that there is more pleasure in following the ways of her, whose ways, the Bible tells us, are those of "pleasantness," and whose "paths are paths of peace," let him study diligently and faithfully, the precepts of that holy Book, and fulfil, as far as he is capable the commands therein enjoined; (from love to their great Author;) and his doubts will be removed, his joys increased an hundred fold, and he will be ready to exclaim with the Psalmist, "make me to go in paths of thy commandments; for therein do I delight."

TRUTH IS GOOD.

BY REV. W. S. BALCH.

"There be many that say, who will show us any good?" Ps. iv. 6.

Man is a progressive being. His physical, moral and intellectual powers are developed by degrees. In infancy his capabilities are limited, and little is required. As his capacities increase, the field of knowledge and usefulness widens, till earth can no longer limit his aspirations or set bounds to his "bold imaginings," he quits this vale of tears, and ranges through the immensity of the Creator's works, beholding, and wondering, adoring and praising as long as "life, or thought, or being last." No subject is too high for his contemplation, no truth too low to deserve his notice. In every thing that fixes his attention, he discovers traces of the wisdom and power of the great parent Mind, and is led into that train of action and peaceful thinking which constitutes the boon of man's highest enjoyment.

To a mind thus chastened and well directed no truth is unimportant. Whatever tends to develop the physical, intellectual and moral laws of Deity, be it ever so minute, excites in him a train of reflection at once agreeable and profitable.—There is no science which he regards as unimportant, be it new or old, for truth is immutable.—He will never repudiate a sentiment because it is ancient, nor refuse to examine a new proposition because it is an innovation. His well balanced mind appreciates every thing according to its inherent and relative value, in the exhibition of truth and production of human happiness. Wherever the light of truth leads him, thither he goes, and with willing feet.

Human character and happiness, and the means of promoting them in the highest degree, are among the leading subjects that claim his attention. And this he finds it possible to do, alone by the enlargement and purity of the moral and intellectual faculties, and in their free and vigorous action. He finds his duty to exist, not in the mere avoidance of guilt, but in the faithful employment of his mental and physical powers, to enlarge the sphere of human thought, and ameliorate the condition of his race.

In the active discharge of duty he finds a reward amply sufficient to compensate him for all his labors. By promoting the happiness of others, he finds his own increased. And in the peaceful consciousness of having been the humble instrument in reflecting upon others the truth and joy which has been shed upon his own mind, and thereby preserving them from the miseries of ignorance and guilt, he finds a harvest more than sufficient to remunerate his toils. He demands not the beatitudes of the immortal state as the price of his labor; but is satisfied to feel that heaven has approved his work. "Well done, good and faithful servant," is the joyous reflection produced by every act of duty and love.

Low and grovelling, indeed, must be that mind which would inquire, "Who will show any good" to such a person? Those who would do so, have no means of determining the quality of true enjoyment. They measure every thing by their own limited and beggarly views. The lower propensities have gained the ascendancy in such minds, and they behold and estimate every thing as seen through their own perverted or jaundiced visions. Happiness to them consists in the gratification of the lowest faculties—mere sensual pleasure, and isolated and selfish enjoyment.—They talk of heaven, as a condition in which the most selfish of all faculties will be indulged without restraint. In addressing the unconverted, they appeal to this passion only—the fear of hell, and how to escape it—the hope of heaven, and how to secure it. Such persons may well wonder what inducement the true Universalist can have for serving God and doing his duty. The fact is, their minds are not properly cultivated. They do not appreciate things according to their real value. And until their moral and intellectual powers shall be enlightened and invigorated, they are not fitted for the reception of the light and truth of the Gospel of the blessed God.

The very manner in which the Psalmist puts this question, authorizes the conclusion that none but the ignorant or skeptical would employ such language. Experience had doubtless taught him, as it does all others who will be taught by it, that good, alone, is to be found in the performance of duty—a strict observance of the laws of God as instituted for the regulation of moral beings; and that there is no good to be found in any other condition. Let the reader, then, who desires to secure his own happiness, qualify himself for its bestowment, by a willing obedience to the divine law, and then he will find that "great peace have they that love thy law, and nothing shall offend them."

SALVATION OF JUDAS.

Brs. EDITORS.—While I am communicating, I believe I must take our friend Pomeroy in hand. In a discourse last Sabbath, he abused poor Judas in the "old beaten way." He sent him off to that terrible place—there to endure "endless sufferings." He had not the least doubt but that Judas was in hell, and would there remain and be endlessly miserable! But why should the poor man endure so much? The amount of it is this—he was born for this purpose.

The text which our friend selected, and his comments thereon, were designed to show that Judas was born for this and no other purpose. He was avaricious. He was born to be avaricious, and this avarice was the cause, says our friend, of his miserable destiny. "The Son of man goeth as it is written of him, (this is the text) but woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed; good were it for that man if he had not been born." But so it must be. He was born, and the prophets had written concerning him—they had prophesied that he should betray Christ, and it was impossible to be otherwise. Nay, this was all done by the "determined counsel and fore-knowledge of God." So says the Scripture—so says our friend Pomeroy. Well, we have no objections. But when we hear our Partialist neighbors denouncing Judas as the worst being in the universe, and exclaiming that he ought to be damned—that endless misery in hell is good enough for him—that he might have behaved himself, and not betrayed the Saviour, etc., etc., it seems they have lost sight of, not only, pity for poor Judas, but their creed, and the "determined counsel and fore-knowledge of God." They seem to forget that if Judas had been a much better man, and had not betrayed Christ, Christ would have told an untruth, when he said "verily I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me." They seem to forget also that the Scriptures would have been broken, which testified of him—now if it was necessary for Judas to betray Christ, it was just as necessary for him to have the disposition to do so, as it was to have the Scripture true. It seems to me hard, certainly, if not unjust, to send Judas to an endless hell for doing what he could not possibly avoid! It will not do to say, Judas might have done better and escaped this awful destiny. The only reply that can be made is, "It is none of your business—Judas was born to betray Christ and to endure endless suffering in hell for so doing, and it's none of your business."

But to return. Our friend P. observed, in substance, that he would not maintain that Judas was sent to an endless hell on account of his being a great sinner merely, but because Christ had said "Good were it for that man if he had not been born." Now I do not see a word in this saying, even intimating that Judas had gone to an endless hell. No, not a word. But our friend argues, that if Judas had endured ever so much misery in this life, or in the future, in any limited period of time, be it ever so long, and then be received into heaven to partake of its joys forever, it could not then in truth be said, "it were better for him not to have been born." His existence would, on the whole, be a blessing rather than a curse. The conclusion our friend then draws is, that the existence of Judas must be a miserable one throughout eternity, in order to make the declaration of the Saviour true, that it were better for Judas never to have existed at all.

But there are one or two things which our friend ought to notice. And first, that Jesus did not say it were better for Judas that he had never had an existence. No—but he says, "Good were it for that man if he had not been born." There happens to be a difference between not being born and not having an existence. A person may have an existence and not be born. The prophet Job seemed to have this view of the subject. See Job iii. 16; also Jer. xx. 17, 18. Had Judas never been born, as Job wished he never had been on account of temporal calamities, then he would have been where (Job says) "the wicked cease from troubling and the weary be at rest." Had this been the case with Judas—the Saviour could say with propriety, "Good were it for that man if he had not been born."

But with what propriety, or even with what sense could he say, good were it for that man if he never had had an existence? What kind of being is that, that never had an existence? It is a solecism—a saying destitute of sense, and wholly unworthy the saying of him who spake as never man spake. Besides this, it seems a little derogatory to the character of the Father of spirits to give existence to an apostle—ordain him to the work of the ministry, and afterwards render that existence, an endless curse!

But there is another passage of Scripture which our friend introduces to support the idea that Judas has gone to an endless hell. It is recorded in Acts i. 25—"That he may take part of this ministry and apostleship, from which Judas by transgression fell, that he might go to his own place." The place assigned for Judas, our friend Pomeroy says, is hell—but with what authority this is asserted, we are not informed. Good Commentators inform us that the place, in this passage, relates to the place which Matthias was to occupy in the apostleship, and not to the place which Judas was to occupy after his decease. Thus, "That he (that is, the one chosen, Joseph, or Matthias,) may take part of this ministry and apostleship, from which Judas by transgression fell, that he (the one chosen) may go to his (Judas's) own place. As it is written in the Scriptures, 'His bishoprick let another take.'" But if it be insisted on, that the place means the place of Judas after his decease, I see no evidence that an endless hell was to be that place. His place I should be apt to suppose would be where Christ said it should be. Addressing himself to his twelve disciples, Judas with the rest, he says, "When the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." If Jesus spoke the truth, Judas has not gone to an endless hell, unless one of those twelve thrones be the endless hell.

Much more might be offered against the common notion concerning this apostle, but want of room forbids.

THE SKEPTIC.

Extract of a letter from a skeptic to a young female Christian.

An inspired writer has observed, and justly too; "He hath made every thing beautiful in his time." Yes, the works of creation, of nature, of Providence and especially the productions of earth, are all beautiful, and even the blinded skeptic can gaze upon the starry heavens with seeming rapture, and contemplate the movements of the solar system with delight; but his mind is mostly engrossed with the lovely scenes of earth, although the most fading and transitory. The shooting grass, the springing corn, the prophetic buds and fragrant blossoms of the peach, the apple, the cherry and the grape, seem to feast his soul and for some moments "sing his tedious hours away," and transports of pleasure carry him briskly onward until his soul is aroused to reflection upon the ripening of his earthly gods, and bring to his mind a sense of the approaching Autumn of human life, and the dreary and much dreaded Winter of Death.

Then it is, that the soul pants for the healthful and life-giving waters that flow with unmingled felicity, proceeding from the throne of God and the Lamb; and he looks around for the cooling spring, the low murmuring fountain of durable pleasure, desiring to obtain some light to enlighten his pathway to the end of his short career, the journey of human life, and shed a halo upon the dark prospects of an eternal sleep to which he is fast approaching: but alas! what light shines upon his way? His light is turned to darkness, and his hopes are driven "upon the wings of the wind" to "the land of oblivion!"

He looks upon his fields—he must soon leave them! Upon the ripening fruits—he cannot carry them to the shades of unending darkness and gloom: looks around upon his friends, his neighbors, the companion of his bosom and his lovely and tender offspring, with whom he has tasted the sweets of life, which have caused him to long for immortality—and lo! he soon must bid them an eternal farewell. He looks at religion! There the Hindoo is seen prostrating himself before the car of Juggernaut, to be crushed under its massy wheels! Or, again—another is plunging himself into the Ganges to secure his own happiness, or to appease the wrath of the gods, or another is striking a dart through the body of an invalid, to ease himself of the burden of providing for his wants—or another is placed upon the funeral pile and burned to death with the dead body of her companion! and his soul is vexed with the inconsistency and barbarity of those who profess and practice the religion of their Fathers. He beholds the devotees of Popery submissively bowing before the priest at the altar, waiting for that remission which they buy "with a price"—he sees the iniquity, intrigues, and debauchery of even the priests; those who set themselves up as teachers of the "ignorant and those who are out of the way," the tyranny and usurpation practiced by those whose talents and fortunes have gained an ascendancy over the more ignorant and unenlightened of their fellows—he is disgusted with their abominations, and cries, "Away with this fellow, we will not have him to rule over us!"

At another view he beholds Servetus roasting upon a pile of green wood to appease the wrath of John Calvin, whose religion had taught him that the God of heaven would burn the sinner in an endless hell—and being a follower of God, as a dear child he attempted to imitate the God he worshipped; and brought the heretic to the painful and lingering death of "burning by a slow fire!" He attends the "house of prayer" to listen to the "preaching of the Gospel," and he hears thundered from "the sacred desk," in awful peals, the soul-chilling doctrine of "eternal death," unending wo and excruciating agony to be endured by those who doubt the truth of the "doctrines of the church," or perhaps he is singled out to the gaze of the congregation, and the vengeance of an angry God is invoked upon his defenceless head; he is told that "God is angry with the wicked every day"—and that he will soon "come in the clouds of heaven" and "take vengeance upon them that know not God and obey not the Gospel" etc. He hears them warn sinners to "flee from the wrath to come," and denounce them in the most bitter terms; while he is credibly informed, (and the records of our courts of justice testify,) that those same priests, or some of the most zealous of them, are often indulging in crimes of the blackest dye. From his very soul he abhors their conduct, and says, "If this is religion, away with it! I desire not that religion which makes men worse."

He attends a "protracted meeting"—the wrath and vengeance of an angry God are portrayed to his bewildered senses, he is told the day of grace with him is almost past, and the door of mercy is almost closed upon him forever—he hears the shrieks of mothers who have been made to believe their offspring is now weltering in the liquid lava of an endless hell, and the hollow sounding groans of those who have been brought to believe that their "eternal damnation is sealed," and in a few days they fall victims to suicide, or are lodged in an insane hospital. His heart recoils within him, and he is ready to exclaim in the bitterness of his soul, "Religion is a farce—the Bible is a fable, and Christianity is an unpleasant dream."

He takes into consideration the whole sum of Partialism, and finds it to be nothing but a mixture of truth and falsehood, joy and sorrow, as well as hope and fear, love, hatred and despair alternately; condemning reason the richest and best gift of God to our natures; and branding all others with the opprobrious epithets of heretic, infidel and blasphemer! And who that sees nothing but this confused mass of contradictory ideas, and such diversity of character and conduct in the devotees of religion, would not from his heart disdain the very thought of being religious, or even entertaining the most distant thought of embracing a system thus abounding with absurdity and contradiction?

And yet another system of religion is offered for his consideration, which is called by its advocates "The faith of Abraham—the doctrine of the Restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began."

He examines it and finds it faultless with a few exceptions; he wishes it true, for it embraces so noble an object. It discards and condemns the doctrine of endless suffering, and teaches, in opposition to the doctrine of the "Trinity," that a man is not his own son, neither is a child its own father, and announces that Jesus Christ is the Son of God and the Saviour of the world, by whom all the wayward sons of fallen man will be brought from their wanderings to their "Father's house," and from the error of their way to the knowledge of the truth; to meet around our heavenly Father's throne and chant pæans to his praise, world without end.

He fain would embrace this system were it not for a few particular objections which seemingly appear in his way. He has been driven by the stormy winds of Partialism, and tossed upon the rolling billows of life's tempestuous sea, and finally wrecked upon the rocky shoals of skepticism. He has lost all regard for the Scriptures of divine truth, and this religion being founded upon the doctrine of the Bible which he has been taught is fraught with the doctrine of endless suffering; and from which all the various religionists with whom he has been so much disgusted, have attempted to prove their contradictory creeds, he is ready to conclude that this is one of the many, and belongs to the same family; he says "caution is the parent of safety"—and he can depend upon nothing but what he sees and hears, for he knows nothing else. However, finding no fault with the maxim "By their fruits ye shall know them," he looks for the fruits of this religion.

He sees here and there a zealous advocate for the cause, proclaiming the love, the goodness, the benevolence and mercy of our Father in heaven, who is impartial in all his ways, and whose tender mercies are over all his works. Their words and works agree, and many of their disciples are honest and upright in all their dealings, and adorn the doctrine they profess with well ordered lives and godly conversation—but many who are called by their name, are almost lost to a sense of their duty, regardless of religion or even morality—take the name of God in vain, and even bring a reproach upon the whole denomination by dealing unjustly, and indulging in crime while they are called by that name to take away their reproach.

Taking the whole into consideration, and judging by external appearances, he rejects this religion also, and says "it must soon die and be buried in the dust of oblivion, and be numbered with the things which have been and are not."

NORTH BLOOMFIELD.

This is the place where the late Wm. I. Reese labored as a faithful minister of the Gospel, and where he was instrumental in building up a society of believers in the Abrahamic faith. Here, as in every place where he was known, he had many warm and faithful friends. And while memory lingers upon his piety, meekness and Christian deportment, his name will be ever embalmed in their affections. The Society worshipping here, and which enjoyed his labors for a considerable length of time, has a large and pleasantly located brick meeting-house. I have preached here during the last six months, and found the society true and faithful. Though it is not as large as some in the vicinity, yet its members both male and female, render it strong and respectable by their steady, undeviating course of moral rectitude. This is what alone will make a society strong and enduring. Numbers do not always constitute strength.

ANECDOTE.

"The Auburn Banner" of the 12th inst., contains an article under this head, the circumstances of which are said to have taken place at the village of M—. The writer is correct as to the place, but wonderfully mistaken as to the preacher. According to the best of my recollection, the facts of the circumstance are these: Mr. P., a Methodist (alias Partialist), preaching at the village of M—, spent much time in endeavoring to convince his hearers that a believer in Partialism had two chances to a Universalist's one—admitted that Universalism was preferable to live by—said that if he were a Universalist, he would rob the first man he met in the dark!—told his hearers that if Universalism were true, they ought to go home and murder their families and send them all home to heaven at once! At the close of his discourse, he notified his hearers that, if they wished he would leave an appointment to preach again in two weeks, "when Mr. C., a respectable merchant, arose and replied, 'Sir, if your doctrine is true, we do not need you; and if it is false, we do not want you.'" THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 4.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Montgomery.

January 26, 1836.

DEAR SIR—As I am wont, in all matters of much concern, to let my readers hear, if they choose, both sides, I have laid your ingenious epistle of the 16th ult. before them. Having in my former volumes, as I conceive, fully established all my premises and conclusions on the subject of Universalism, I shall, with great brevity, notice the chief points of difficulty in your letter now before me.

1. All that you allege on Mark xvi: 16, concerning "he that believes and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be condemned, or damned," will be disposed of in a remark or two. You accord with me in understandings saved and damned as perfect contrasts—as designating two states essentially opposite. Well—but I ought to have proved that a person once an unbeliever, once condemned, must always remain an unbeliever—always condemned! No need of this my good Sir, because I neither believe, teach nor affirm any such proposition. What then? In accordance with all the rules of interpretation I must regard the passage as meaning that he who hears the Gospel, and rejects or disbelieves it when heard, is not saved, but condemned; and so continuing, or, if you please, so dying, shall always be unsaved, or condemned; and he who, when hearing the Gospel, believes and obeys it, is saved from sin; and so continuing, and so dying, shall be saved from all its consequences.

But from this you dissent, and interpret as follows:—He that hears and believes the Gospel, and is baptized, is saved; and so continuing, will always be saved—living, dying, and forever. But he that on hearing it, disbelieves it, and rejects it, and so continues all his life, is now condemned, or damned; but shall hereafter be eternally saved. This is your interpretation, if you dissent from mine. It is not now material what meaning you annex to the words saved and condemned. They are opposites. You will, however, have the believer and the unbeliever during this life in opposite states, but in the same state hereafter!—presuming, no doubt, that during death, or after death, unbelievers will all become believers and obedient good Christians! This being out of the Record, is to me a new revelation, which, because of a defect in the evidence, I cannot believe. I would not choose Pharaoh, Nero, Caligula, Heliogabalus, Judas, Voltaire, and such spirits for my companions for ever; unless in some unknown purgatory in another world they should hear some Gospel and be saved from those hateful characters in which they passed over Jordan. It is judicious and kind on your part to promise us their future conversion.

But it appears to you that "this passage has no reference beyond the apostolic age; for proof of which the context is confidently cited." No; nor has it reference even to the apostolic age, if your mode of reasoning be correct. What is your syllogism? "These signs shall follow them that believe: in my name they shall cast out devils, they shall speak with new tongues," etc. But after the apostolic age this promise failed; therefore, this promise was only for the apostolic age. But, from these premises the following conclusion is more natural and more logical; therefore, there were no believers after the apostolic age.

But I have said you prove that this passage has no reference to the apostolic age; for your syllogism is, "These signs shall follow them that believe: in my name they shall work miracles," etc. But those signs did not in the apostolic age accompany believers; for multitudes believed that could work no miracles: therefore, this promise respected not the apostolic age.

Now, without either thinking or intending it perhaps, you have in this mode of reasoning hit upon the true meaning of the passage: for it was, in truth, uttered with reference to no age, but in reference to certain apostolic persons, who were then, as you say, doubting; for some of the commissioners doubted and "were slow to believe all that the prophets had spoken;" and, therefore, after giving them a commission to all the world, he very graciously added, "These signs shall follow them [of the persons addressed] who shall believe." In demonstration that such is the meaning of the passage, I appeal to the next verses; for, says John Mark, "They went out and proclaimed the tidings every where, the Lord co-operating with them and confirming their doctrine by miracles accompanying."

Thus we dispose of the second great difficulty in your way, and this leaves the promise of salvation and condemnation on the same conditions—as perpetual as time, and as extensive as all the nations and generations of men.

The third point is an exception taken to the correctness of my remark, viz. that "if the words rendered everlasting, eternal, applied to the destruction of the wicked, mean not destruction without end, then have we no words in human speech that certify us that God, angels, or saints shall have duration without end."

You proceed to adduce other terms that "prove unceasing duration; such as incorruptible applied to God, Rom. i: 23; endless life, Heb. vii: 16; this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality; 1 Cor. xv: 53. You ask, "Are these words applied to the punishment of the wicked?" I answer, No, nor to the happiness of the righteous; nor to simple duration at all. Two of them are substantives, and therefore can not be used as epithets—namely, immortality and incorruption; and the other three apply to beings or to material substances, in reference to simple indissolubility; not one of them could properly be applied to a simple state of being, or to happiness or misery: for although the word "endless" might seem to be an exception, when the original word is considered, it is not. It only figuratively signifies endless, as any one may see who will examine either the etymological import or the common use of akatalutos in Greek writers. It literally signifies indissoluble, incapable of dissolution. Hence it figuratively may be rendered endless, as it is once only in the New Testament.

But you append to this exception a remark that deserves notice—viz. If everlasting means duration without end, in its primitive signification, you ask, "When it is applied to the punishment of the wicked, is it not in those instances where it is taken in a part of its signification: for you admit that it is sometimes so taken in the Scriptures?" For two reasons we must answer, No. 1st. Because it is taken in a part of its signification; or, rather, it is used figuratively only when applied to subjects in which there is a physical impossibility that it can be taken in its full and literal import. But more especially as Montesquieu says somewhere, "In all laws, enactments, and statutes, words are taken and to be interpreted in their most common and literal acceptance." I quote from memory: but, at all events, this is an oracle of reason: for if words are used figuratively or taken only in a part of their meaning in charters, grants, statutes, and laws, there is an end to all certainty in human affairs. Orators and poets for figurative language; but lawgivers and the founders of states and institutions for perspicuity, precision, and the literal and current acceptance of words.

But as I study brevity, I hasten to your fortification in the fastnesses of the alleged ambiguity of the words everlasting, eternal. To this you again and again recur as the Gibraltar of universal salvation, or rather of your scrupulosity touching the ultimate destiny of ungodly men.

You very pertinently, and rationally, and logically assert that "adjectives sometimes (and especially some adjectives sometimes) take their peculiar meaning from the subjects to which they are applied." This, I agree with you, is strictly true of the words under consideration. This single fact sufficiently explains all those applications of the word everlasting in a limited sense; because the subjects to which it is applied physically preclude the proper sense of the word. It is therefore used figuratively (for I do contend that this is what is grammatically and rhetorically called the figurative meaning of the word) when applied to all things that necessarily must have an end. It is never used figuratively when the subject to which it is applied does not necessarily require a limited sense; or, to express the same idea in other terms, it is only used figuratively, or in a part of its signification, when the substantive to which it belongs absolutely demands it. Now all this only puts it upon you to show, that, in reference to things beyond this life, there is such a necessity existing as to preclude the possibility of its being used literally, or in its proper signification. And this, give me leave to say, with all emphasis, no living man can do. I feel myself logically, grammatically, as well as theologically and religiously, compelled to affirm this proposition—that in reference to things mundane, or to things of this life, the words everlasting, eternal, and their representatives, in all languages, are used figuratively—from the aforesaid law, or necessity of language, which you affirm—viz. that adjectives must sometimes take the extent of their meaning from the substantives to which they belong: also, that in reference to things not mundane or belonging to this life—(that necessity of yours and mine being removed)—that is, in things beyond time, these words must be used literally, or in their full and proper meaning, if such meaning they have. From all of which facts and reasonings it would follow, that if the words eternal, everlasting, ever mean what they comprehend, it must be in reference to the future state of men and angels, good and bad, or to spirits that live beyond the landmarks of time: for as they can not be taken in their full and literal import in reference to earthly things; if they are ever so taken, it must be in their application to things beyond the confines of time and sense.

To this you may make (logically, perhaps,) one, and only one exception, in your own relief; and that is, that these words have no literal and proper meaning. But then this will undecify our Creator, and annihilate the universe! I trust, then, that it is by a happy necessity you are constrained to admit, that, in reference to life and death, happiness and misery, as well as in reference to God and all spiritual existences, these words necessarily must have their literal and proper signification.

To this your own good sense had almost constrained you in the close of your epistle: for your last effort is to assume that there is a physical or moral impossibility in the way of its applying to future punishment; because, indeed! all punishment is mere chastisement, and that all chastisement will necessarily eventuate in reformation. So that when the Judge shall say, "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting punishment prepared for the devil and his angels"—it means, Depart, ye blessed, into everlasting chastisement prepared to bring the devil and his angels and all wicked men to true repentance and to everlasting glory. Pardon me, my good Sir, if, while I have the canons of logic and philosophy in my eye, I must regard this as somewhat visionary and romantic—too romantic for grave consideration and logical reply.

I would not have alluded to this pleasing dream of everlasting chastisement, had it not been to show yourself, especially, and all my readers, that unless you could find some pavilion of this sort to shield you from the conclusion to which I am always constrained to come on this subject, you can not possibly escape from the logical and scriptural conclusion of this whole matter—viz. that by a necessity as insuperable as death, the words everlasting, eternal, when applied to substantives, beyond the confines of time and sense, must be taken in their full, proper, and unfigurative import; that it is only when applied to substantives within the coats of time, they are, or ought to be, taken in a limited and figurative sense. Beyond these shores, they are to be interpreted in their unfigurative and unrestricted signification.—In reading the works of Thomas Paine, perhaps his "Age of Reason," (it should have been his Age of Folly.) I was amused with a sort of left hand compliment he bestowed on the society of Friends, sometimes called Quakers. "My father," says he, (I quote from memory,) "was a Quaker; and it must be confessed that of all the sects of Christians, that which makes the highest approach to true deism, is that of the Quaker." I would propose to amend the bill by substituting the word Universalist in place of the word Quaker.

Take away from the new covenant, or Christian institution, the views which it gives of sin, its nature, and consequences, and the punishment without mercy which awaits those who now despise and trample upon the blood of the everlasting institution; and make our views of God's perfection derived from the works of nature, the interpreter of his word, and a religion so compounded and so manufactured is worth nothing more than the pure deism of the Jew or of the philosopher. It is not Christianity. Hence the easy and frequent, nay, almost general transition of Universalists into the ranks of infidelity. Be on your guard, my dear Sir, against this delusion; and pardon my freedom if I have mistaken the strong leanings in your letter to that side of the question. All of which is most respectfully submitted.

REMARKS ON THE STATE OF THE CONTROVERSY.

Soon after the above was published, Br. Montgomery's health became much impaired, so that he thought of quitting the ministry entirely, and was for the time being compelled to suspend all close application to study and labors in critical writing.* He addressed me a brief note, asking if, on account of the state of his health, I was willing to take the controversy off his hands and continue it with Mr. C. I replied that I regretted the necessity of the controversy on the part of the Universalist going out of his hands, where it appeared so perfectly safe, and so ably conducted, but that I would consent to take it for so important a reason as he assigned, if he would send me the numbers of the Harbinger containing what had been published on the subject. After this I heard nothing till the following letter came to hand.

Auburn, June 29, 1836.

Br. SKINNER—Your letter was received in due time, and would long since have been answered, were it not for reasons given below.

Mr. Campbell is now here. It was to see him, that I delayed writing to you. I called upon him this morning, to know whether he would publish my letters, if I continued them. I did not at first allude to a substitute. He objected to me on account of my youth—stating that if he overcame me, it would be said, that I was nothing, and that he ought to have selected a man of note and influence. I admitted the validity of the objection, provided he would permit me to choose another. This he agreed to, on the following grounds, perfectly understood by us both:

He is going to Boston, and will be there in August. He says that the subject is an important one, and that he has fully made up his mind to canvass it. Therefore, as he shall spend more time in Boston than in any other place, he chooses to arrange either an oral or a written debate there, if he can get any one to engage with him. I told him that he could have his choice out of fifty—and accordingly gave him the addresses of Brs. H. Ballou, 1st, and 2d, Balfour, King, Whittemore, and S. Streeter. He is full of war, and is confident that he can win laurels of glory in such debate—he boasts of having met a preacher in Lockport, and of stating things, which he, the Universalist preacher could not answer. This transpired one week from last Sabbath.

Let him come—the conqueror of Owen must in his turn sit at the feet of the truth. If he will debate, and said debate can be published, it will do our cause much good—for if he, with his skilfulness cannot succeed, others may well despair. If he does not succeed in starting a debate in Boston, then the letters in the Harbinger are to be continued by you, provided they are also published in one of our papers. He declines to have me continue them on account of my youth.

So stands the matter at present. I have written to Boston and informed the brethren of what is coming. Yours affectionately,

G. W. MONTGOMERY.

Nothing further was heard from any source on the subject of the controversy, till the following note came to hand, accompanied by the two numbers of the Harbinger containing what has been published on the subject.

Auburn, October 27, 1836.

Br. SKINNER—I perceive that Rev. Alexander Campbell has returned home without having a debate in Boston. His promise of receiving some person in my place, to continue the letters which I commenced, now holds good. Will you therefore take this matter in hand? I send you the numbers of the Harbinger containing the articles which gave rise to my letter and his reply. The only reason necessary to be given why this matter is changed from my hands to yours, is found in my letter to you of the 29th of June last; viz. that Mr. C. objected to me on account of my youth, supposing I was not of sufficient influence in the order to make it worth his while to consider the subject with me: but he suffered me to choose another in my place. I therefore commit the whole to you, to do with it as seemeth best in your sight.

In haste, I am affectionately yours,

G. W. MONTGOMERY.

We can not but regret that any circumstances should have required or led to the taking of the controversy on the part of Universalism out of the hands of Br. Montgomery. For we are satisfied it could not well be in better hands. We shall indeed rejoice if it suffers no serious loss from the change. Mr. C. need not have objected to Br. M. on account of his youth or want of notoriety. He would have found that the youthful arm of a David, with his sling and smooth stone was sufficient to lay low any Goliath that might assail the citadel of truth; and that if he should have triumphed over Br. M., it would indeed have been no mean or inglorious victory, but a victory over a well informed, influential and able opponent. However, his objection shows that he aims at accomplishing great things—and indeed if he does succeed in putting down Universalism, at which he aims, he will accomplish a great thing—a thing, by the by, which no other man has ever yet succeeded in accomplishing. Humble and feeble, though our talents acknowledgedly are, yet they will be enlisted in defence of the truth; and though great talents may be arrayed against us, we believe that truth is so much more easily defended than error, that it will and must in the end triumph, and that we are therefore safe in the stand we take. In our next, I shall attempt to answer Mr. C.'s reply to Br. Montgomery's letter of December 16, 1836, published in the Harbinger of February last.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1837.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Messrs. EDITORS—Can you not, without disabliging any of your numerous and respectable readers, now and then, say something more upon the science of Phrenology, or morals, or tell us a good story to relieve us of the tediousness of religious disputes, or if you please, discussions. For myself, while I declare that I am sick—down sick of these, I am ready to acknowledge, that as far as my acquaintance extends, your paper is as well conducted as any other of this character. Yet to afford me (and I presume I speak the minds of a majority of your readers) much pleasing and rational amusement, or useful instruction, there must be in your paper fewer of maybes, perhapses, surmises, less of vituperation and recrimination, with an occasional word or two upon subjects concerning us as moral men, and as citizens. Tell us not to lie, nor swear, nor steal, nor slander, nor to do a thousand other wrong things, which one would think by their prevalence, to be common enough, and which by way of correction, ought to be mentioned hourly. It is however, not exactly my province to tell you what to do, or what to omit doing, neither to condemn nor to criticise, yet throwing myself upon your indulgence, I beg to observe, that in your very last paper I discovered an expression in relation to Mr. Robert Owen, which I apprehend some of your readers, will consider tinged with contempt, and at variance with that politeness, candor, and gentlemanly conduct for which the writer of it has been peculiarly distinguished.

I am not aware that the name of Mr. Robert Owen ought ever to be mentioned, only in terms of respect and commendation. His differing with others upon the dogmas of religion, ought not to subject him to any contempt, however small, from any person. With a thousand others, he believes that a creative God is a being of incomprehensibility, yet he does not deny his existence.

In speaking in behalf of an absent friend of mankind, and a philanthropist, I beg further to remark, that a majority of a congregation, animated by an esprit de corps, rising on that occasion in favor of Mr. Campbell, never was, and never can be accepted as an unquestionable evidence of his triumph over Mr. Owen, either in strength of argument, or in superior demonstrations of the positions respectively assumed by them.

One word in relation to Mr. Campbell. When I discovered it announced that a discussion had commenced, and was to be continued, on one part by Mr. Campbell, a gentleman of profound learning, and deep research, a biblical scholar and critic, I flattered myself much gratification in paying attention to it, as it progressed. Judge ye, then, my disappointment, when I learned by his answer to "Spencer," that he had renounced the use of his reason. Judge then also of my surprise, in learning that a gentleman of Mr. Skinner's talents and character, should condescend to enter the arena of discussion with a man who substitutes faith for reason! With as much propriety might he preach an eloquent sermon to a barn full of owls, as to enter the list of grave discussion with a man who had repudiated his reason. H*

REMARKS.

We give place to the above, (altering its signature by the addition of an asterisk, to distinguish it from another correspondent's, in our last volume,) because the friendly feelings of the writer for Mr. Owen seem to require it, after what I have said. In relation to the religious views of both Robert Owen and Robert Dale Owen, I have always understood, from the readers of their writings and the admirers of their characters and sentiments, that they were skeptics—unbelievers (not disbelievers, perhaps, but,) doubters of the existence of an intelligent First Cause—of a self-existent creative being. From what I have read of their writings, and heard of the men from those who have heard them speak on the subject, I think I did not misrepresent them. But I wish in justice to myself, to say, that whatever contempt I may feel for their opinions, or however I may reprobate their labors to spread their cheerless views in society, I did not mean to treat them with discourtesy or disrespect. Both may be amiable men, and both have done much to promote the education of the poor in connexion with their system, and for the good they mean, as well as for that they do, I am as grateful, as I am grieved at the little evil I believe they have done.—I will not say they have intended evil, as evil.

As to the merits of the controversy between Mr. Robert Owen and Mr. Campbell, it is before the public, in book form, and that public must judge for itself. I consider Mr. Owen's defeat to consist in the fact, that he would not, and did not come to the point they had met to discuss—nor attempt to refute Mr. Campbell's arguments when he, at last, dared to advance them.

* I am happy to state that Br. M.'s health is now so far restored that he might pursue the controversy himself, had he not modestly assented to Mr. C.'s objections to him on another account, and transferred the matter into my hands.

In conclusion, we thank H* for his advice—we supposed we were following it, so far at least as to meet the tastes of our numerous readers—we think so still—but should there be a deficiency in variety, we must rely for the remedy on our correspondents. In relation to Phrenology, some of our readers think we have given too much of it! When our advisers disagree, we have a rule of our own—we do what we think is right. A. B. G.

PUNISHMENT AND FORGIVENESS.

Br. SKINNER—SIR—My object in writing to you is information. The Bible teaches that God "will by no means clear the guilty." "He that doeth wrong shall receive for the wrong which he hath done; and there is no respect of persons." "Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished." "He shall reward every man according to his works." All these, and many other texts I might quote, go to prove the certainty of punishment for sin. But now I find a good many texts that speak of the forgiveness and remission of sins. Christ on a certain occasion said to his disciples, "Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them." And Peter on another occasion said, "Whosoever believeth in Christ shall receive remission of sins." "Jesus said unto the sick of the palsy, Son be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee." I might quote more passages but I shall deem those sufficient for my purpose. Now Walker defines forgive, in his Dictionary, "to pardon not to punish; to pardon a crime; to remit, not to exact debt or penalty." If the sinner under all circumstances is to suffer the full punishment due for sin, how are any ever to be forgiven? And now, Sir, if you will answer the above inquiries and show from Scripture and reason how the sinner can be punished to the extent of his crimes, and yet be forgiven, you will confer a lasting favor on a believer in "the restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Yours Respectfully, A SISTER.

Honesdale, Pa., December 26, 1836.

ANSWER.

The authority quoted above by "A Sister," to prove that all sin shall be most certainly and inevitably punished according to its merit, and that God "will by no means clear the guilty," is ample and incontrovertible. And when she quotes other passages from the Bible to prove the remission and forgiveness of sins, the testimony is equally authoritative and conclusive with us. But we do not see any inconsistency or contradiction in the two classes of texts. Had the passages last quoted, instead of speaking of the remission and forgiveness of sin, spoken of the remission and forgiveness of the punishment of sin, then indeed there would have been an inconsistency—a contradiction. If there is any difference between sin and the punishment of sin, then is there also an equal difference between the forgiveness of sin, and the forgiveness of the punishment of sin. As we read in the Bible of the forgiveness of sin, and also of the punishment of sin; but nowhere of the forgiveness of the punishment of sin; we conclude the two former are Bible doctrines, but the latter is not a Bible doctrine.

As the definitions quoted from Walker were founded rather on popular tradition and modern opinion, than on the Bible, and given long after the Bible was written, we conceive wherever they conflict we must bow to the authority of the Divine instead of human testimony.

The Greek word aphiemi, to forgive, is compounded of apo, (from,) and iemi, (to send,) and signifies, according to the best lexicographers, to send away, dismiss; to emit, send forth; to yield or give up; to put away, divorce; to forsake or leave. It is never applied to punishment in Scripture, but is often to sin. And then it signifies the taking away, sending away, removing or putting away of sin. That is, the removal of sin or the cure of sinful habits and propensities. Of Jesus it is said, "he shall save his people from their sins," (not from the punishment of their sins.) "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world."—"When I shall take away their sins."—"Shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob."—"By turning away every one of you from his iniquities."

Sin is a moral disease; and Jesus takes it away, or removes it, just as the physician removes or takes away the disease of his patients. The pain, inconvenience, mortification and distress, must continue as long as the disease continues. Sin brings along with it a multitudinous train of evil companions denominated punishments—these punishments can never be removed, or forgiven, while sin, the disease and the cause, remains. Cure the disease, remove the cause, and the effects will, in process of time, cease also.

Again, punishment is both retrospective and prospective. In its retrospective application the administrator considers what the sinner has done—what the temper and disposition of his mind have been, to induce such acts of wickedness as he has perpetrated—and what kind and degree of severity of punishment may be adapted to the character, desert and condition of the sinner. In its prospective application, he considers what the effect of the punishment may be in reforming and correcting the life and habits of the sinner, and also what influence the example may have on others.

In the sincere penitence and reformation of the offender, justice is satisfied, and can neither ask nor receive further punishment either retrospective or prospective. The sinner has been punished according to the full demerit of the crime, (in his case at least,) and all good objects that could be obtained by punishment are already attained. Thus justice and mercy meet together; righteousness and peace embrace each other. The prodigal returns after all his wanderings, privations and sufferings, and is received, welcomed and forgiven by the father. See Luke xv. Joseph's brethren long stung by remorse, and wandering in guilt and misery, bow before him in penitence and are forgiven. (See Gen. xlii: 21, xlv: 3-5, and indeed the whole story.) Thus punishment and forgiveness of sin are seen to be compatible with each other, and both rest on the clearest testimony of Holy Writ. D. S.

REPLY TO M. D.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER—My feelings were sensibly touched with the fervid yet melancholy piety of your Universal Prayer, published in our last, and my sympathy awakened at the relation of your difficulties and doubts, which followed it. (If wrong, in ascribing the case related to the relator, you will pardon the error—but I intend my remarks for him whose case you have related, whoever he may be.) But when I reflect that there are many who, after rejecting a system which filled every faculty of the mind from youth to manhood, naturally acquire a spirit and habit of doubting and questioning by so doing, and yet afterwards become again grounded and settled in a more extensive and consistent faith, I can not resign the hope that you, also, may be ranked among that happy number. You must desire it—the spirit of your prayer, your adherence to Christianity in despite of doubts and difficulties, and your appreciation of its beauties and utility when it is pure and uncorrupted, all prove to me that you can not desire otherwise. And though what feeble remarks I have to offer, may have no permanent weight upon your mind, yet I hope that sooner or later, they may suggest to you some clue, by taking hold of which, and following it up, you may be led out of the labyrinth in which you now are lost and bewildered.

Let us endeavor to analyze the causes of your present wavering, indecision and doubt. I think it the necessary consequence of a change of belief, and the enlargement of the mental view to which such change gives rise. These effects are not confined to the subject of religion. Let some one become convinced, after having long been of the contrary opinion, that the Newtonian system is more correct than his former faith in astronomy, and the spirit of inquiry that will be aroused, will lead him to doubt almost every subject connected with that science. Indeed, without such doubts, there would be but little investigation—without investigation, no rational, well-grounded faith. It is only where those doubts usurp all the powers of the mind, and grow up into a settled habit, that they can be said to be injurious. Then doubt leads to cavilling, instead of inquiry—and cavilling to skepticism, (not decided disbelief perhaps,) or general incertitude. This, I fear—I say it with compassion and respect—is your case—it was at one time, very nearly my own. It was Gibbon's, or he would not have attributed the decline and fall of the Roman Empire, as he has done, mainly to the vacillation and unfixedness of affairs produced by the State changing one system of religion for another. For however great the influence of religious change in unsettling the mind of an individual, or unfixing the affairs of a State, the conversion of thousands from one system to another, without becoming skeptics, and the change of hundreds of States, without their downfall and ruin, and the reformation, all prove that other causes, and not this one, had the effects described by this luminous, but coldly sneering historian.

But, not to spin out these remarks to too great a length, I will only say, that if I have hit the cause of your incertitude, I think you may discover some remedy for the effects. Some things in religion, as in every thing else, must necessarily be true—and may be ascertained. By them, other things may be ascertained as most probably true. By them, still others may be ascertained as nearly probably true—and so on, from one degree of certainty, and one degree of faith, to another—for all things believed, are not equally firmly believed. You believe in the existence of nerves, more firmly than you do in their separate offices—and in their several offices, more firmly than you do in the nervous fluid. And so of other matters in anatomy. Can you not pursue a similar process of reasoning, and arrangement of faith, in religion? Why make this greatest of all sciences an exception, merely because it has also the greatest difficulties? Other sciences also have their knowledge, faith, probability and possibility—much that may, and much that may not yet be known—revelation and mystery—and why not allow religion to have the same? In theology, as in every thing else, much must remain forever unknown to mortals—but much that is unknown may yet be discovered.

But the principal object of my remarks, is to essay answering the questions contained in your observations on what you deem deficient in revelation. Excuse, I pray you, my volunteering replies—if you do not wish for them, some one of our readers may. But I cannot but hope, you will read them with pleasure at the good will which causes them, even if they should not satisfy your doubts.

1. "If a revelation, why a mystery?" If a revelation, it can not be a mystery—if a mystery, it can not be a revelation—for mystery, means, simply, a secret—that which is unknown, or not revealed. You therefore find in me one exception to your remark concerning Christianity, that "all its teachers and most ardent believers agreed in one thing, its mysteriousness." And, if I mistake not, I stand not alone—nor do Universalists stand alone in the Christian world, in this respect. That there are many passages in the Bible which I do not know the meaning of, I readily grant; but the first principles of that book teach me what they do not, can not mean. And I am persuaded, also, that they can be understood, if their meaning was but conveyed in different terms. The fault is not in the subject taught, but in the manner, or in the person to whom it is revealed.

2. "If for the good of all men, why left unintelligible to some, and to all, so that their pretended knowledge only involved them in continual disputes and persecutions?" I candidly confess that I can not answer this question fully unless I can pry into and learn the counsels of the Eternal Mind. But it does not stagger my faith in the least, in Christianity. If the sciences of natural philosophy, chemistry, geology, mineralogy, etc., including your own profession of medicine, are for the good of all men, why left for so many thousand years unintelligible to some, and to all, so that their pretended knowledge only involved them in continual disputes and persecutions? Yet, because you can not tell me what God's reasons were for his conduct in regard to these sciences, I will not doubt either their truth or utility—nor what can be known of them, and what is established as truth in them, because there are some other things in them which I can not know, and which are not yet established. That cruel and wicked persecutions and disputes have existed among the votaries of every science—and do now exist—you know too well to render it necessary for me to repeat more than the names of the ridiculed and traduced Anaxagoras, Socrates, Aristotle, Galileo, Gall, Spurzheim, Priestly, etc.

3. "If divine, why not so unequivocal that no mistakes could obtain, no difference of opinion exist among its votaries?" This objection is against man, not against Christianity—for if all minds were constituted alike—trained alike—and acted under like circumstances, it could not be asked—nor indeed would any mistakes then obtain, or differences of opinion exist among doctors, lawyers, geologists, chemists, phrenologists, moral philosophers, etc., etc. For as great and as many differences exist in these things, as in regard to Christianity. And were it not so, my dear brother, what an unhappy, idiotic race would mankind soon be! Inquiry, collision of sentiment, teaching and learning—in short every species of mental exercise, recreation and improvement, would be deprived of its stimulus, and inducing causes—the mind would degenerate into idiocy and slavery, and man would be—what?

Just look around in all nature—you will find that every thing—every science—all knowledge necessary for man—is arranged by our Creator on the same great principles on which he has arranged Christianity. The different genus, and orders, and species, are not arranged as in a cabinet. Neither are the doctrines of Christianity arranged as in a creed or confession of faith—or its precepts as in a system of moral philosophy. And why? Most probably, to exercise man's mental and moral powers, in discovering, classifying and arranging them—and thus advancing the happiness of the very being whose powers are thus called in requisition and developed. In discoveries and investigations in every science, there is room for the same diversities of opinion, variety of systemizing the generally believed, and contradictory statements in regard to the unestablished, that exist among professors of Christianity—and yet the man who should consider all uncertainty, darkness and doubt in every science, on these accounts, would be no less in error than (with respect and affection) I consider you to be on the subject of the Christian religion.

In conclusion, I would recommend a careful reconsideration of the subject—fixing upon some established principles, and proceeding from them to the less known and worse understood—and a continued careful perusal of the best writers on the evidences of revealed religion—but, above all, a careful and deliberate exercise of your own judgment, not in the way of cavil but of decision. If I am not mistaken, the forth coming articles on the evidences of Christianity, by Rev. S. R. Smith, (which will probably very soon begin to make their appearance in our columns,) will aid you much in some of your difficulties on the subject. My heart's desire and prayer is, that your distracting perplexities may speedily be ended by such a measure of knowledge and faith, as will give you peace and joy in believing, with the whole heart and mind, in the glorious and ever blessed Gospel of our salvation. Amen. A. B. G.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Beta, BRS. A. C. B., J. H. S., M. S., of N. H., and E. R. C., of Va., will please write when they can. W. S. B. is quite welcome—he had better "try"—phrenology not excluded from the paper. I would respectfully hint, that it is possible some errors may occur in these articles, by reason of the abbreviation of some words in his manuscript which I was puzzled to decypher. T. F. is received and will be attended to soon. Where are BRS. Spear, Moore, Chase, S. W. Fuller, Hammond, and others—and sisters Scott, Rounseville, Stephens, "A Sister," and others, especially several new correspondents, from whom we are anxiously waiting to hear? Really, we feel quite deserted and given over to oblivious neglect!

N. B. A few original sermons, especially some of from six to eight columns long, will be quite acceptable. Come, brethren and sisters, "one and all," do write, SPEEDILY and frequently. A. B. G.

AGENTS.

Dr. Walker, P. M., Grass Lake, Mich., and B. S. Keeler, Newport, N. Y., were omitted by oversight in our published lists.

OHIO.—James Birdsall, Portage—Erving Taintor, Harford—and Charles Rickerson, Rutland. NEW-YORK.—Daniel Gorton, Painted Post—Roswell Starr, Medina—E. Leonard, Parishville—Reuben Peake, Canajoharie—Daniel Grover, Deansville. VIRGINIA.—Rev. E. R. Crocker, Elizabethtown. ILLINOIS.—Col. Benjamin Barney, Augusta—Francis Darrell, Sangamon.

REQUEST.—Is any of our readers, correspondents, or friends, in possession of the minutes of the proceedings of the "Universalist Convention of the State of New-York" for the year 1826? If so, they will confer a signal favor by forwarding a copy thereof to me. I find the minutes of all other years in my possession, but can not obtain them for that year. D. SKINNER, Clerk of Convention.

* * We are requested to state that our brethren in Newville, Herkimer county, have the use of the Union house in that place, for one-half of the time, commencing with the first Sunday inst. Br. J. D. Hicks preaches with this society one sermon on each of the above Sundays. A. B. G.

EXCHANGE PAPERS.

Many of the secular papers with which we exchange, are of no use to us in conducting our paper, and a prudent economy would require their discontinuance. But to gratify them, we will continue the exchange if they will give the following brief prospectus of our sheet a few insertions in their columns.

Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate.

REVS. S. R. SMITH, D. SKINNER AND A. B. GROSH, EDITORS.

This periodical is published in Utica, N. Y., every Friday, on a royal sheet, (making 8 quarto pages a week, or 416 in a year,) at $1.50 per annum, if paid within three months—$2.00, after three months, but within the year—and $2.50, if not paid within the year.

A NEW VOLUME COMMENCED ON JANUARY 6, 1837.

Though principally devoted to teaching and defending the doctrine of God's universal benevolence, man's fraternity, and the final triumph of Jesus in the destruction of the devil and all his works, and the salvation of all men from sin and consequent misery, yet the other great doctrines of Holy Writ, the principles of religious liberty, morality, science and literature are by no means neglected. More than ONE HUNDRED able correspondents contribute yearly to its pages—premiums for six or more prize essays and tales are offered—series of essays on especially important and interesting subjects, have been commenced for it, by able writers, and a friendly discussion of Universalism, by Rev. D. Skinner, of Utica, (one of its Editors,) and Rev. Alexander Campbell, of Bethany, Va., has been commenced in its columns. Other particulars might be named, but the limits of this notice do not admit it.

Specimens of the work will be furnished gratuitously, on application, free of postage, to its proprietors, GROSH AND HUTCHINSON, Utica, N. Y.

N. B. Back numbers of this or former volumes, can be furnished at subscription price, G. and H.

REQUESTS.

Will JESSE FRENCH, of Stafford, Genesee county, who, between two and three years since, embezzled funds belonging to me to the amount of from $30 to $50, and has been repeatedly called on to refund them, regard this public call, and make me restitution, or abide the issue of a severer ordeal?

Will E. M. ELDRIDGE, Postmaster of Bellville, Jefferson county, who has also embezzled an unknown amount of money belonging to me, (probably from $20 to $50,) during three or four years past, and has utterly neglected urgent and repeated calls to refund it, please immediately to attend to the business, "lest a worse evil come upon him?"

Will several others somewhat similarly circumstanced, having funds in their hands belonging to me, "take the hint" from the above calls, send me my dues, and spare me the painful necessity of mentioning their names in public? D. SKINNER.

Br. Tompkins—Send current volume of the Repository to Mrs. Diantha Jones, Ann Arbor, Mich., and charge A. B. G.

Also, credit John Dodge, Harbor Creek, Erie county, Pa., and charge me with two dollars, and discontinue when his account comes to that sum. A. B. G.

POETRY.

From the Gospel Inquirer.

"If I believed that all men would be saved, I would not hesitate to commit all manner of iniquity." "As death leaves us, judgment will find us; there is no change after death."—ORRHO DOXY.

Some men confess that nought prevents Their practicing all evil,
Save that they fear 'tis Heaven's intent
To give them to the devil.

The love of God they freely state,
Withholds them not from sinning;
Nought but the fear of torment great—
Ne'er ending—o'er beginning.

They also hold that when God's power
Shall burst death's bands which bind them,
As they were in their mortal hour
So will the judgment find them.

If, when the archangel's trump shall sound
They find their sins forgiven—
If then they find that grace abounds,
And makes them heirs of heaven—

If then they find their bliss secure,
It surely will content them;
No more distress will they endure—
No fear of hell torment them.

Then, fearing neither wrath nor curse,
They will use each endeavor
To take their fill of joy—and thus Go on, and sin forever.

Oh, their's must be a blessed state,
Affording rich enjoyment:
Their portion—bliss in heaven's gate—
And sinning, their employment.

FEMALE IMPROVEMENT.

Read before the Utica Berean Institute, in December, 1836.

[Though sent in anonymously, it is known (as it professes) to be written by a female member. A. B. G.]

Much is now said about the march of intellect and the diffusion of knowledge. Man exults in the progress he has made, and moves on with a rapidly increasing momentum towards the light of truth, hoping soon to emerge from the night of ignorance and the twilight of doubt, into its bright and tranquil day. I, too, would rejoice in their advance in the path of wisdom. For to each and all should the mental or moral improvement of any one of our race, be a source of real pleasure; as virtue and intelligence do much to ameliorate the ills and heighten the pleasures of society. Let man, then, raise to their highest, noblest power, those faculties God has given him; and remember, that when employed to make the world happier, then, and only then, do they truly ennoble their possessor. But why can not—why should not woman, also, commence the soul-renewing career, and seek for instruction and knowledge? I do not wish her to take those stations which seem peculiarly appropriate to man. I would not see her teaching from the pulpit, declaiming in the lecture room, or legislating in the capital. Her sphere, though different, is not less noble; nor does it give less opportunity for the exercise of all the power and culture of which mind is capable. Many suppose that it would be unavailing for females to attempt to thread the mazes of science, or penetrate the arcana of nature, not being capable of great mental effort, or high intellectual attainments. But, certainly, all who have the ability to think, can make some progress in knowledge. And only when females have awakened to the duties and capabilities of their nature, can we tell how far she may rise above those soulless, mindless beings into which barbarism would degrade our sex. Many females have been and are now distinguished in the literary and scientific world; thus showing that nature has not hedged in the Pierian spring with a barrier which woman can not pass.

Others will assert that the improvement of the mind would unfit them for a proper discharge of the duties assigned them; or, at least, that is neither necessary nor useful. But as by improvement of the mind I would understand not merely the knowledge of a few facts in relation to the phenomena of nature, or the events of past time, or the acquisition of those accomplishments so easily obtained, and, alone, of so little benefit; but that discipline which induces the healthy, vigorous and equal action of the intellectual faculties, I know not how this can disqualify for aught that can properly be required of woman, nor do I know any station, in which it would not be a benefit. Will she be less kind, or less conscientious in the discharge of her duties, who sees benevolence and emendatory justice in all the dispensations of her God, than she who sees in the storms which rouse the ocean from his bed, and spread desolation over the land, nought but dreaded power, or ill boding disorder? who sees the wicked in authority, but knows not that misery reigns in the palaces of vice? Is she less lovely, who knows the laws which bring to us the ever pleasing change of seasons, and clothe earth with ever varied beauty—who can trace the vapors from the ocean through soaked earth and porous plant, to their expansion in the perfumed flower, or juicy fruit; than though her thoughts were confined to the mere routine of dress and amusement? "It will take too much time," is the objection of many. Time from what?—labor? Where is there a class of mechanics or laborers, who can not spend a portion of their time in study? And ought woman to labor more hours than her more robust companion? Might not every one devote an hour or more, every day to study? Could not much of the time spent in conversation, be so ordered as to gratify and improve our mental, moral and social powers? Would such an occasional variation materially lessen the pleasure of social meetings—and would not much more benefit be derived from books, if less time were spent in learning what had been imagined by genius, and more in acquiring a knowledge of what had transpired in life—what had, indeed, been the result of a certain train of thought or action? If we have a capacity for acquiring knowledge, ought we not to endeavor to obtain it? Is it not the duty of every one to add as much as possible to the talents God has bestowed? Ought not each member of society to promote, to the utmost ability, the happiness of the whole? And does not knowledge give to any individual a power of benefiting the world, which he or she would not possess without an influence in society that ignorance can not have? And next to that Gospel proclaimed by our Lord and witnessed by his resurrection, what is better calculated to give strength and firmness to the mind—to raise us above the petty ills of life, or enable us to bear them with calmness, confiding in the wisdom of our divine Ruler, than a knowledge of those truths unfolded by science—a view of that order, beauty and fitness beheld by those who have entered the mighty laboratory of matter? God is declared by all that he has made. And the more we learn of his works, the better will we know Him who made the sun a keystone that binds illumined worlds in unity, and clothed the flowers with beauty—who armed the elephant with strength, but placed the poisonous reptile in the dust—and consequently, the more shall we in truth revere him as our God, and trust in and love him as our Father—and be enabled to benefit his offspring, as our brothers and sisters.

A FRAGMENT.

I have seen much—much I would not see again. I am an old man. My course has been of this and other countries. I have seen man in his infancy—in his prime—in old age. I have found him all things by turns.

I have been an optimist. In the morning of life, in the sunny season of youth, ere a cloud arose to shade the bright heaven under which I lived, I deemed all was fair, open, generous, good as were the breathings of my own soul. I gazed on nature. There was a charm in every object, a magic spell came over me as I marked its beauties. There was sunshine in every face. Bright eyes were around me, and I could not believe the tale of woe I heard.

Years have passed. The dreams of my youth have fled. I have looked on life with other eyes. I have judged with other senses, and the bright visions, the sunny bowers of the optimist have disappeared, and the cold reality become my dwelling. The days of romance passed, the airy world of imagination dissolved, evil found its way, and the withering truth was felt, man is subject to vanity.

I have been a skeptic. Nature came I knew not how, man would end I knew not where. And the dream, the cold dream of nonentity, came to blast what little bliss was left me.

I looked on the grave. I saw all that was dear to my heart hastening to its dark enclosures. She I had chosen a companion of my bosom, snatched on the bridal eve from my warm embrace, was lodged there. I looked on beauty, it must moulder there—upon my own flesh, it must lie there, be food for worms, an object loathsome to all my race. All my sympathies—all the fond aspirations of hope, all that could remind me of existence, all end there—lie in the tomb dead! It was too much.

There was a harshness of feature came over the face of things. I wandered to other climes, no change could hide the vision that haunted me. The grave was there. It opened its hideous mouth. The heart-rending words sounded with thunder, "that is thy home, all of thee ends there, and all thou lovest, there ceases to be." I turned—I felt my sympathy for man die—all around was vacuity, all within was vacuity; I was a lone withered thing.

"And is there no God?" said I. "There must be, else whence this solitude of soul produced by denying his being?" The cloud disappeared. I felt myself in the embrace of my God.

Religion can soften the ills of life. Young stranger, take religion with thee in thy troubles. Thou wilt not be an optimist nor a skeptic, but thou wilt find the heavenly companion capable of affording thee good.

Rev. Dr. Barnes, formerly minister of Scituate and a native of Marlborough, in this State, was probably one of the most worthy, as well as eccentric clergymen in this part of the country. He gave the charge to his colleague, the late Rev. Mr. Deane, which it is said was full of pointed sayings like the following: "In attempting to instruct your people be careful not to preach what they will not understand, and especially careful not to preach what you don't understand yourself!" He was a great admirer of Dr. Gay, of Hingham, who was a congenial spirit with himself in pithy sayings. He attended the funeral of Dr. Gay's wife, where he said there was much touching eloquence displayed, but that one sentence of Dr. G.'s at the grave was worth more than all the rest, viz: "I thank you my friends, for burying the poor remains of my wife out of my sight!"

Dr. B. was particularly distinguished for giving characters at their funerals—and was equally remarkable for leaning to the charitable side. At the funeral of an old lady of his parish, being somewhat at a loss for commendable qualities in her character, and not being willing to dismiss her without saying some good thing, he remarked that she was an "excellent spinner of worsted!"—Barre (Mass.) Gazette.

MARRIAGES.

In Rome, on the 19th ult., by Rev. Mr. Coryell, Mr. CHAUNCEY JOHNSON, to Miss ELIZABETH ROOD, all of that place.

In Hartford, Cortland county, January 1st, by Rev. C. S. BROWN, Mr. ALBERT NORWOOD, to Miss ELIZABETH BRIGGS, both of Caroline.—By the same, Mr. JOSIAH BOSWORTH, of Pharsalia, to Miss ANELIA ARNOLD, of Lisle.—Also, by the same, Mr. HENRY DAY, to Miss HARRIET HINMAN, both of Lisle.

In New-Hartford, January 8th, by Rev. S. R. Smith, Mr. WILLIAM HENRY LATHAM, of Seneca Falls, to Miss MARGARET BUSHNELL, daughter of Stephen Bushnell, Esq., of New-Hartford.

DEATHS.

In Marshall, January 13, Mr. SHERMAN HEWET, aged 63 years. He was formerly a member of the Baptist church in Waterville, but became a believer in the doctrine of universal salvation some fifteen years since, and lived and died a worthy man and sincere Christian. A discourse adapted to the occasion, was delivered before a large congregation at his funeral, in Waterville, from Psalm xxxiii: 4.—Communicated.

In Newark village, Monroe county, January 13, Mr. HENRY B. SMITH, in the 24th year of his age. He was beloved and esteemed by all who knew him—was resigned to the dispensations of God, in life and in death—and departed life in the full hope of immortality. The funeral was attended in the Presbyterian meeting-house, and the consolations of the Gospel tendered to his parents, brethren and sisters, and a large and sympathetic concourse, by Br. Miles.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 5.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.*

DEAR SIR—This controversy on the part of the Universalist, having by mutual agreement between you and Mr. Montgomery, and his choice of a substitute, devolved upon me, I am happy in finding the subject fairly open for discussion, and an opponent to contend with of acknowledged talents and high reputation as a controversialist, and I can not but hope that if our investigations are conducted with honesty and candor, good will result and the truth be promoted thereby.

You say that in former volumes you have fully established all your premises and conclusions on the subject of Universalism: but as you do not inform us what those "premises and conclusions" are, we are left in the dark concerning them.—Nevertheless, as this doctrine continues to move on in its majesty, and is constantly accumulating strength in our land, I console myself with the conviction that those "premises and conclusions" were not such as to annihilate the doctrine.

You next say you shall dispose of what Mr. M. says on Mark xvi: 16, in a remark or two. After stating that he requires you to prove, in order to maintain your ground, "that a person once an unbeliever, once condemned, must always remain an unbeliever, always condemned," you deny that you are required to prove this; for you say, "I neither believe, teach nor affirm any such proposition." Now, Sir, this appears to me very singular: for it is certain that, if you "neither believe, teach nor affirm any such proposition," you can neither believe, teach nor affirm any thing from the text in opposition to Universalism: and you therefore, introduced the text in your reply to "Spencer" for no other purpose but to throw dust in the eyes of your readers and make them believe, while you did not believe it yourself, that this text was a formidable argument against the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all men. No Universalist believes that any individual of the human family will be saved while he remains in unbelief and condemnation: and if you do not maintain that unbelief and condemnation will endlessly remain, you can not maintain that the text stands opposed to the doctrine of final universal salvation.

But what seems not a little remarkable is, that, after indignantly disavowing your faith in the proposition which Mr. M. required you to prove, you should proceed, as you do, in an indirect, round about and equivocal manner to try to establish that, or what you intend your readers shall understand as tantamount with that very proposition—i. e. you meant they should so understand you if you had any definite meaning in that curious construction which you give the text. After giving the text this equivocal construction you add: "But from this you dissent and interpret as follows: He that hears and believes the Gospel, and is baptized, is saved; and so continuing, will always be saved—living, dying and forever. But he that on hearing it disbelieves it, and rejects it, and so continues all his life, is now condemned or damned; but shall hereafter be eternally saved. This is your interpretation if you dissent from mine." The above, Sir, is entirely unworthy the head that edited or the pen that wrote it: and I seriously regret to see a man of your talents and standing, attempt to fix upon your opponent a charge of which you certainly knew or ought to have known, he was not guilty. Neither Mr. Montgomery, nor any other Universalist ever adduced this text as proof of the doctrine of universal salvation. All he contended for was that the text did not prove endless misery, and therefore was not at all to your purpose. Nor have you in the least invalidated his argument. But you were doubtless aware that unless you could force him into an interpretation that would make him appear ridiculous, your point was lost and your argument completely nullified. But in attempting to evade the strength of his argument and to father an interpretation upon him which he never thought of, you appear to me to have stooped below the dignity of your station.

Further on, you say, "You will, however, have the believer and the unbeliever, during this life in opposite states, but in the same state hereafter;—presuming no doubt, that during death, or after death, unbelievers will all become believers and obedient and good Christians. This being out of the Record, is to me a new revelation, which because of a defect in the evidence, I can not believe." Now my good friend, as I am fully satisfied that the defect is not in the evidence, but in the manner of your examining it, I will endeavor to correct your misapprehension by calling up a few witnesses from the Record, which you have evidently overlooked. The Record positively declares that God has promised with an oath, that all nations, families and kindreds of the earth shall be blessed in Christ, the promised seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. See Gen. xii: 3; xviii: 18; xxvi: 3, 4; xxviii: 14. Acts iii: 25. Gal. iii: 8, 16. Heb. vi: 13, 14. The Record declares that God's will, pleasure, and purpose, are, that all men should be saved, come to the knowledge of the truth, and be gathered together or re-headed in Christ; and that he worketh all things after the counsel of his own will. 1 Tim. ii: 4. Eph. i: 9, 10, 11. The Record declares that "God hath spoken of the restitution of all things, by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began," Acts iii: 21. The Record declares that the Father loveth the Son and hath given all things into his hands—the Heavens for his inheritance and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession—and that all that the Father giveth him shall so come to him as not to be cast out. Psal. ii: 8. John iii: 35; vi: 37-39; xvii: 2. The Record declares that all the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before him—that all nations whom God has made shall come and worship before him and glorify his name. Psal. xxii: 27; lxxxvi: 9. The Record also declares that Christ gave himself a ransom for all to be testified in due time—tasted death for every man—is a propitiation for the sins of the whole world—is the Saviour of the world, the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world—that he shall not fail nor be discouraged—the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand—he shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied—shall reign till he hath subdued all things unto himself, and deliver up the kingdom to God the Father that God may be all in all—that Christ hath the keys of death and hell—is Lord both of the dead and living—that neither death, nor life, nor any other creature can separate us from the love of God in him—that death shall be swallowed up in victory—tears wiped from off all faces, and every knee bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father.

1 Tim. i: 6. Heb. ii: 9. 1 John ii: 2; iv: 14. John i: 29; iv: 42. Isa. xxv: 8; xlii: 1; liii: 10, 11. Rom. viii: 28, 29; xiv: 8, 9. 1 Cor. xv: 22, 28. Philip. ii: 10, 11. Rev. i: 18; xxi: 4.

Now, Sir, as these promises and hundreds of other similar ones in the Record clearly and unequivocally assert the final subjection, obedience and happiness of all men, and the annihilation of death and misery of every kind, the clear and irresistible conclusion is, that, if the Record be true, and these promises are not fulfilled with regard to all men before death, they must be after death—if not during this life, they must be in a future. See Heb. ii: 8. 1 Pet. iii: 18, 19, 20; iv: 6. And if these promises are all fulfilled in reference to the character and moral condition of all men, I am inclined to the opinion that you will not then be possessed of the spirit of the elder son in the parable, (Luke xv: 28,) and refuse to associate with even Pharaoh, Nero, Caligula, Heliogabalus, Judas, Voltaire, and their companions, any more than Ananias refused to associate with Saul of Tarsus, when it was told him, "Behold he prayeth."

In the two or three succeeding paragraphs of your reply to Mr. M. you make some attempts at argument and some at witticism, which in two or three instances might with effect be retorted upon yourself: but as they do not in my opinion at all affect the great leading questions at issue between us, I let them pass without remark.

I am glad that in your reply to Mr. Spencer, you so frankly conceded all that he contended for in reference to the meaning of the words Sheol, Hades, and Gehenna, and gave them up, as being in themselves insufficient to teach the doctrine of endless misery. You have finally fixed upon the word aion and its derivatives as the strong hold, the last resort, or citadel to defend that dreadful doctrine. And I now come to consider what you say about this word and the other words adduced by Mr. Montgomery as being much stronger, clearer, and more unequivocal in defining endless duration than the word aion and its derivatives.

But I must here in common with Mr. M. and I think with every well informed biblical and literary critic, express my utter surprise at the declarations you made in your reply to "Spencer." (See Harbinger for October, 1835,) that "if the words oleon, aionion," etc., "applied to the destruction of the wicked, mean not duration without end, then have we no words in human speech that certify us that God, angels or saints shall have duration without end;" and that "there is no word in human language that expresses duration without end, which is not applied to the future punishment of the wicked." Had these assertions, so entirely devoid of proof, proceeded from some rash, hair-brained youth, some theological tyro. I should not have been so much surprised. But they are from one who has the reputation of being a grave divine, a great biblical critic, and the theological champion of the West!

After quoting Mr. M.'s language concerning Rom. i: 23. Heb. vii: 6; and 1 Cor. xv: 53; where the phrases, incorruptible, endless life, incorruption, and immortality occur, and his question, "are these words applied to the punishment of the wicked?" you say, "I answer No, nor to the happiness of the righteous; nor to simple duration at all. Two of them are substantives and therefore can not be used as epithets, viz: immortality and incorruption; and the other three apply to beings or material substances in reference to simple indissolubility; not one of them could properly be applied to a simple state of being, or to happiness or misery: for although the word "endless" might seem to be an exception, when the original word is considered it is not. It only figuratively signifies endless, as any one may see who will examine either the etymological import or the common use of akatalutos in Greek writers."

The above, Sir, very clearly evinces the fact; that when one false position is taken it requires several more to sustain it; and after all, its foundation is but sand. I do marvel that you should have made such assertions, entirely unaccompanied by any attempt at proof. The word akatalutos is thus defined by Donnegan: "not loosened or destroyed, indissoluble, indestructible." Grove defines it thus: "fr. a neg. and kataluo to dissolve, indissoluble, firm, stable, binding." Now, Sir, will you have the goodness to inform us, if the word akatalutos signifies firm, stable, indissoluble, and indestructible, according to lexicographers, to what else it can allude but to duration when applied to life, as in Heb. vii: 16? Evidently it can allude to nothing else, or at all events, the idea of permanent durability is inseparable from it. This is the only text where the word occurs in the New Testament, and yet you say "it is not applicable either to happiness, or to simple duration at all!"

Aphtharsia, which occurs 1 Cor. xv: 42, 50, 53, 54, and in several other passages in the New Testament, is defined by Donnegan thus:—imperishableness, immortality. Grove defines it thus:—aphtharsia, from a, negative, and thiro to destroy, incorruptibility, incorruption, immortality. Loveland, who for the most part follows Schleusner and Hedericus, thus defines it:—incorruptibility, immortality, "corpus interitus expers." The latter also defines aphthartos which occurs Rom. i: 23. 1 Cor. ix: 25; xv: 52. 1 Tim. i: 17. 1 Pet. i: 4, 23; and iii: 4, thus, incorruptible, undying, "corruptionis, et interitus, expers." Donnegan thus:—aphthartos, incorruptible, immortal. Grove thus, incorruptible, immortal, eternal. Loveland defines athanasia, which occurs 1 Cor. xv: 53, 54; and 1 Tim. vi: 16, thus:—exemption from death or dissolution, immortality.

Here we have eternal, your favorite term for endless, obviously in its most full and unlimited extent of meaning, given as one of the definitions of aphthartos by a celebrated and standard lexicographer. Akatalutos in the only place where it occurs in the New Testament, is translated endless, and can obviously signify nothing less than that; and yet you affirm of all the foregoing Greek words that neither of them is applied, or applicable, "to the happiness of the righteous or to simple duration at all!" One of your reasons for that opinion is singular enough, indeed. Forsooth, "two of them are substantives, and therefore can not be used as epithets!" Suppose, Sir, the apostle had used the word eternity. By parity of reasoning, that could not be applicable to duration at all, because it is a "substantive, and therefore can not be used as an epithet!" Suppose (to illustrate the use of substantives without adjectives or epithets) I were to say to my friend, I am in a state of complete felicity. My friend states my declaration to you, and undertakes to show that I am very happy: but you laugh at him for entertaining such a thought; for you tell him that as felicity is a "substantive, it can not therefore be used as an epithet," and for this reason, is not at all applicable to happiness! Now, Sir, to me your reasoning in reply to Mr. M., appears precisely of this character. For the denial that felicity is applicable to express happiness, because it is a substantive and not an epithet, is no more illogical or ridiculous than is your denial that aphtharsia and athanasia are applicable to duration, because they are substantives and can not be used as epithets, when it is clearly proved that the idea of perpetual duration is necessarily included in the meaning of the words.

Can any enlightened person acquainted with the meaning of the terms employed, read in 1 Cor. xv: St. Paul's description of the resurrection of the dead, to a state of glory, honor, power, incorruption, immortality, imperishableness, indissolubility, indestructibility, etc., and then honestly say he believes these terms have no applicability whatever, either to the happiness of the righteous, or to duration? The thing is impossible: What else could the apostle have had in view in the use of all these terms, but the complete happiness of the resurrection state and the endless perpetuity thereof? Evidently these were the two most prominent points at which he aimed. If the idea of happiness was not embraced in this description, why does Paul exult in the prospect that this event would swallow up death in victory? Is not the kingdom of God (which the apostle defines to be righteousness, peace, and joy in the holy spirit) a kingdom of happiness? He says, verse 50, "flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit (aphtharsian) incorruption," a perfect parallelism in which he uses aphtharsian as synonymous with the kingdom of God; and yet according to you, the term is inapplicable to happiness! What was Peter speaking of, 1st Epis. i: 4, but happiness, perfect in its nature and endless in duration, when he speaks of "an inheritance incorruptible, (aphtharton,) undefiled, (amanton,) and unfading, (amaranton,) reserved in heaven for you?" Is not the inheritance of which Peter speaks, "a state of being?" a state of happiness? and of permanent duration? Most assuredly all three. And yet Mr. Campbell roundly asserts that "not one of them (the three terms including aphthartos) could properly be applied to a simple state of being, or to happiness or misery!" The more I reflect on this declaration, the more I am astonished that it should have ever been made by you. It was evidently made when driven to a most distressing strait.

You evidently saw the impossibility of fairly maintaining your position, and therefore to invalidate the force of the word akatalutos, you state that "it only figuratively signifies endless," and attempt to make your readers believe that it does not legitimately and naturally have this meaning. And what is not a little curious, you immediately proceed to the consideration of aionios, everlasting, your strong hold, and undertake to maintain that this word can only be used in a limited sense when used figuratively, but that when "taken in its fair and literal import" it uniformly signifies endless!

This curious maneuver of yours, touching the literal and figurative meaning of these words, is in my view calculated directly to mislead your readers, instead of enlightening them with the true meaning of the words. For I maintain that the word akatalutos and the other Greek words above defined, are never in the New Testament applied either literally or figuratively, to things and objects of a perishable nature or limited duration; but uniformly to things and subjects of permanent and endless duration. And I furthermore affirm that the Hebrew olem, and Greek aion, aionios, and their parallels, are literally and far more frequently used to signify a limited, or an indefinite period of time, than endless duration; and further, that they never literally and strictly signify endless duration in the Scriptures unless there is something in the nature of the subject to which they are applied, which absolutely requires and necessarily fixes this meaning upon them: and I call on you to disprove either of these assertions. Point me to a single passage in the Bible if you can, where akatalutos, aphthartos, aphtharsia, or athanasia, are applied either to mere things of earth, or to a state or condition of punishment, misery or unhappiness, or to any subject of limited duration. Point me if you can, to a single text where aionios signifies endless, unless the nature of the subject absolutely requires it. So much for your figurative and literal construction of those Greek words. And yet you affirm that "there is no word in human language that expresses duration without end which is not applied to the future punishment of the wicked!" Nevertheless, you can find no stronger term by which to express the endless duration of punishment than the Greek aionios, confessedly one of the most ambiguous words in all the Bible! Nay, to add to your difficulties and embarrassment, you have not been able to adduce a single passage from the Bible, where even this word, ambiguous as it is in meaning, is clearly and obviously applied to punishment in a future state of being! But though as a matter of indulgence, I were to grant that you might find a passage or two that spoke of aionian punishment, even in another state of being, it would devolve on you, before such passages could avail you any thing, to prove that there was something in the nature of punishment that necessarily required it to be endless in duration. But "this, give me leave to say with all emphasis, no living man can do. I feel myself logically, grammatically, as well as theologically and religiously compelled to affirm this proposition—that in reference to things mundane, or to things of this life," and in reference to all punishment, consequent of the aberrations and follies of men in this life, the words aionios, everlasting, etc., are used in their strictly literal and legitimate, but yet in a limited sense, from the very nature of the subjects to which they are applied.

Your constant and overweening, yet fruitless efforts throughout your reply to Mr. M. to make it appear that olem, aionios, everlasting, etc., when used in their unfigurative, common and literal sense, must necessarily signify endless, and whenever used in a limited sense must be used figuratively, clearly evinces how important you thought this point to the successful maintenance of your ground, and yet you are unable to adduce a particle of evidence in favor of this assertion. But you seem over anxious to press Mr. M. into an acknowledgement of the propriety of this construction. And why? Because as you pretend, if this is not conceded, the application of the terms to God, "will undefy our Creator and annihilate the universe!" Do not be alarmed my good Sir, the Creator shall not be undefied, (nor do I intend he shall be demonised;) nor the universe annihilated. I will freely grant you that God is self-existent, and necessarily endless in his being, and that, entirely independent of the application to him of the Greek aionios, or the English everlasting.

Suppose, Sir, I hear a person speak of a great man and the great God; I say to him, Sir, I suppose you use the word great only in a figurative sense when applied to the man, but in a strictly literal sense when applied to God. No, says he, "I use it literally in both cases—I do not use it figuratively in either of these or any similar case. The word when applied to God, signifies infinitely great, not from the original and natural import of the word, but from the necessity of the case, because we know God is infinitely great, and in no sense can he be considered finite or limited. But it is used literally, though in a comparative sense when applied to man, and the word great (which takes its peculiar meaning from the nature of the subject to which it is applied) is much more frequently applied to finite beings and things than to the infinite Creator." I start back in horror and exclaim, Alas! Sir, you have "undefied the Creator," reduced him to a level with a mere man, and thereby, "annihilated the universe!" This Sir, would place me in precisely the condition in which your argument places you.

What, Sir, have we no evidence of the endless perpetuity of God, angels, saints and happiness, but what is derived from the force of this very equivocal and ambiguous word aionios, which is applied to the priesthood of Aaron, to the covenant of circumcision, to the possession of the land of Canaan, to a man's life-time, to the three days during which Jonah was in the whale's belly, to hundreds of things which have had or from their nature must have an end, and which the best of lexicographers say is "used to express a limited time," and "seems to be much more frequently used for an indefinite than for an infinite time"? (See Parkhurst.) Thanks be to God, my hope rests on a firmer and better foundation than this.

For not only have we the Greek words applied to God and the future condition of mankind, which I have before shown are never applied to earthly things or any thing of a perishable nature or limited duration, by which to prove the endless existence of God and happiness; but further we know that as God is self-existent and independent of all other causes and beings, he must necessarily exist ad infinitum, endlessly—no cause can operate to destroy his existence. He is the I AM. In him life and happiness are without beginning and must be without end; therefore, they are strictly eternal and endless in their nature, being original and essential in God. Man is the offspring, the child of God. God is the Father of all spirits. Christ is the Mediator: in him is life; and this life is the light of men. He is the head of every man. Ye are dead and your life is hid with Christ in God. Because he lives ye shall live also. Man's life and happiness will be strictly endless, because founded in and derived from God. Christ says of men in their resurrection and beatified state, "neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection," Luke xx: 36. St. Paul speaks of a "kingdom which can not be moved"—aseleuton, immovable, Heb. xii: 28. St. Peter speaks of "an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven;" and of "a crown of glory that fadeth not away," 1 Pet. i: 4; v: 4. We read Isa. xlv: 17. "Israel shall be saved in the Lord with an everlasting salvation; ye shall not be ashamed nor confounded world without end." But where, Sir, do we read that the punishment of the wicked shall continue world without end? Where do we find any thing tantamount in expressing duration, to those words and phrases that are applied to the happiness of heaven? No where in the Bible. But look, Sir, to the following words of Paul, 2 Cor. iv: 17; where he out-does and goes if possible beyond all which he had before said in regard to the happiness of the saints: "For our present light affliction worketh for us hath hyperbolen eis hyperbolen, aionion baros lozes kateregazetai emin: a glory exceeding aionion to an excess." Here is an hyperbole upon an hyperbole; beyond eternal; a far more (or excessively) exceeding aionion, weight of glory. How entirely prostrated Sir, is your reasoning here shown to be. For if as you say, aionion, when applied to things of another world, or "beyond the confines of time and sense" always and necessarily signifies endless; how could its duration be exceeded, and that by an extraordinary excess, as expressed in the text? It is evident that Paul did not consider it as signifying endless; for what is endless can have nothing beyond it; and furthermore, when he wants to express a greater duration than aionion, and still not express absolute eternity he uses the double plural tous aionous ton aionon, or ages of ages, which neither he, nor any other scripture writer, would have done, had the word aion of itself or any of its derivatives signified strictly endless.

Thus, Sir, it is clearly demonstrated that the words aion, aionios, etc., do not of themselves naturally express endless duration; and it devolves upon you to prove from the nature of punishment itself, that it is and necessarily must be endless in duration, before aionios, when applied to punishment, can be allowed to have the signification of endless. But this, I have said, neither you nor any living man can do. Nay more, I will volunteer, on the other hand, to prove that punishment, from its very nature, must be limited and can not be endless in duration.

What is punishment? Had it a beginning? If so, when, and where? Did it have its root, its fountain, its origin and being in God? Certainly not. It is not co-eternal with God. It has not its fountain and root in him, as have mankind, and as have life and happiness. It is the effect or consequence of the finite actions, of finite beings, in a finite space of time. It is the sad inheritance of the sins and frailties of frail mortals, for their departures from duty and their violation of the revealed will and laws of God. Has God any pleasure in it? No, not the least. See Isa. lv: 1, 2, 3, 7; lvii: 16-18. Lam. iii: 33. Ezek. xviii: 32. 2 Pet. iii: 9. 1 Tim. ii: 4. Then he will not perpetuate it to all eternity. He will finish sin, make an end of transgression, (which, since the creation of man and contrary to his law, have sprung up to mar the happiness of his children,) and reclaim all his alienated family, so that universal holiness and consequent happiness shall at length prevail, which alone accord with the divine will and nature. There is no possible ground on which you can raise even a plausible argument in favor of the endless perpetuity of punishment, unless with Zoroaster and other Heathen philosophers, you maintain that there are two Divinities, co-eval and co-eternal, the one the author of all good and the other the author of all evil; and therefore, that, as evil is of as long standing as good, it will be co-eternal with it. But this you will never attempt.

I may now vary and return your language thus: Were we to force the meaning of endless upon the word aionios as applied to the punishment of the wicked, contrary to the obvious design of God and all the inspired writers, (and endless misery should prove true;) if it did not "undeify our Creator and annihilate the universe," it would transform our Creator into a fiend of infinite cruelty, clothe heaven in sackcloth and mourning, and fill the universe with sighs and tears—which would be a much more deplorable event. But this can never be: for God is God, and not man. Your system of endless sin, and misery, and evil is therefore completely prostrated, nor can its shattered fragments ever be gathered up again; no, not even by your own extraordinary powers. The kingdom of darkness and death shall terminate, and man universally be happy and free. And even you, yourself, will yet join with me in celebrating the happy and glorious event. Amen.

The remark I made about your unfairness and disingenuousness in ascribing to your opponent the ridiculous construction of Mark xvi: 16, which you did ascribe to him, and which neither he nor any other Universalist ever thought of putting on the text, will apply with equal propriety to what you say in your last paragraph but two, about Matt. xxv: 41. If you, Sir, are incapable of conceiving how the protracted punishment of the wicked can be disciplinary and corrective, and therefore ultimate in good, (though we never thought of attempting to reclaim the devil by it, but calculated on his destruction, See Heb. ii: 14,) you might possibly obtain some light on the subject by applying to some reformed convicts from the State penitentiaries.

I thank you for your "left hand compliment" to the Quakers and Universalists from the writings of Thomas Paine, and beg leave still further "to amend the bill, by substituting" Advocate of endless misery in place of Universalist. For full well am I satisfied the doctrine of endless misery has made more deists and infidels than all the writings of Thomas Paine twice told. Robert Owen, your quondam opponent, his son Robert Dale, Paine, Carlisle, and Taylor, and Frances Wright, and nearly all their coadjutors in Europe and America were brought up and nurtured in the faith of endless damnation. And what, Sir, but that horrid doctrine and the erroneous supposition that the Bible taught it, led them to reject the Bible and with it the whole of Christianity. Robert Dale Owen says he was "brought up a Presbyterian of the strictest sect," and that "the doctrine of endless punishment was the first thing that staggered his young credulity!" It is related of Lord Shaftsbury, that on asking Bishop Burnet if the doctrine of endless torment was actually taught in the Bible, and being answered in the affirmative, he immediately replied, "I can not embrace a system which inculcates a doctrine so utterly opposed to all just ideas of the character of the merciful ruler of the universe." And many a good and benevolent mind, permit me to say to you, Sir, has come to the same determination. Taking it for granted from the testimony of their religious teachers that the Bible teaches the horrid doctrine of endless sin and wo, they at once reject the whole as utterly unworthy of a God of benevolence and wisdom. And the transitions from the doctrine of endless misery to deism, are in my opinion as ninety-nine to one when compared with the number of those who go from Universalism to deism; while it is a well known fact that Universalism has reclaimed many an infidel to the faith of the Gospel, when nothing else could have done it but God himself.

Let Christianity be stripped of all heathen dogmas, and all doctrines of human invention, and especially of the God-dishonoring and soul-withering system of endless sin and suffering, which I have shown is no part of revelation, and stands directly opposed to the Bible, and let the Gospel be presented to man in its purity and divinity, as a system of universal love and grace, worthy of a God of infinite wisdom, and power, and goodness, and it will, it must be received: yea, many an infidel will then be reclaimed, and with tears of grateful joy will exclaim,

"Should all the forms that men devise,
Assault my faith with treacherous art,
I'll call them vanity and lies
And bind the Gospel to my heart."

Yours with all due respect, D. SKINNER.

RELIGION.

Messrs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON—The following extract is taken from a very curious manuscript, published some thousand years ago. Should you discover nothing in it of an objectionable character, nothing false, but something true, you will, I know, if you should have a spare corner in your paper, give it an insertion.

"Religion partakes greatly of self, consisting only in the exercise of the mind. It neither confers any lasting benefit to a neighbor, nor adds, in any way to infinitude. It is undoubtedly, a source of comfort to those who feel it. Every man and woman, (small children only excepted) knows what it is, without attempting to define it."

"It is manifested sometimes by attitudes, by a disfiguration of the face, and by silence, to which may be adduced, the folding of the hands, sometimes by praying, thanksgiving, and singing, and sometimes in other ways. It is a feeling of love, thankfulness, and gratitude towards a benefactor, expressed often by way of compensation. It is exercised towards God, for all favors or benefits conferred, which their reason and observation teaches them that he only could confer; such for instance, as the gift of life, with the means of its happy continuance. Towards man, for benefits received of him. Whether from God or man, the feeling is the same, identically, differing only in degree, according to the nature and importance of the benefits conferred. This then and this alone, is religion."

"Every thing else which belongs or relates to man, as a member of social compacts, and as a reasonable being, comes within the cognizance and province of morality. It consists in action, not of the mental faculties, exclusively, but of the corporeal. Does man comply with, and avoid the violation of the Decalogue—does he exercise mercy, charity, compassion, long suffering, and forbearance; does he visit the sick, the unfortunate and imprisoned—does he give to the poor and suffering, clothe the naked, and feed the hungry, pay, promptly, all his honest debts, deal justly and honestly with his neighbor, keeping always within his own rights, and never invading the rights of others: if so he does it from the dictates of his moral faculties, a gift of the Creator, neither expecting any other heaven, as a reward for obeying, nor any other hell, for disobeying them, than those that he will promptly find in his own bosom. What, may be inquired, is the ground work—the primum mobilis of such moral dictates, except, that man knows that an other man feels like him?—hence the great moral rule, 'do as you would be done by.'"

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER IV.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

THE GOOD OPINION OF OTHERS.

There is no emotion more natural, and none more proper, than the desire to be thought well of, by others around us. This wish, cherished by the young, with proper restrictions, and brought consistently to bear on the conduct, will become as a kind of guard to screen them from many improprieties and their accompanying evils. Those young people, who are inspired with the laudable desire so to demean themselves as to obtain the approbation and respect of community, may be considered as walking in a safer path, than those who have no such inclination. It will cause them to become circumspect and watchful in all their conduct—to be careful what they do, and what they say, and what disposition they exhibit in their intercourse with the world; and will induce them to listen seriously to any faults that may be suggested as attached to their conduct. Wise youth are willing to have their failings pointed out. And when a fault is asserted to pertain to them, whether it is detected by a friend or an enemy, they will search, and candidly ask themselves whether it does in reality exist; and if they perceive that it does, they will take energetic measures to free themselves from its contaminations. I have often expressed the opinion, that if enemies are of no other benefit, they are sometimes of great service in detecting and exposing our aberrations from duty. Their watchful eyes are upon us—they are ever upon the alert to blazon our short-comings to the world. And a sense of their scrutiny will influence us to assume a cautiousness in our proceedings, which can not but be highly salutary.

A proper desire to be commended by our fellow-beings, should be cherished by every youth. A want of it produces consequences extremely deleterious. When the young lady or young gentleman, arrive at such a state, as to exclaim, in reference to their moral conduct, "I care not what others think—I care not for the opinions of those around me"—it indicates a dangerous state. It shows their feelings to be so hardened, that they are ripe for the works of sin and degradation—it predicts a condition of moral callousness, which, unless removed speedily, will lead to pollution and its unavoidable wretchedness. "I don't care," is a bad expression for the young of either sex. It is not only immodest and reprehensible in itself, but, if indulged in, and followed in its influences, it will ere long, involve you in those disastrous circumstances, where you will care—and that too, when it perhaps is too late to avoid the painful consequences of your blindness.

In so conducting as to gain the good opinion of others, you should exercise proper discrimination as to whose commendation you would merit. You should not endeavor to obtain in your conduct, the applause of the drunkard; because to do so, you must uphold and imitate his intemperance—or of the gambler, the thief, the spendthrift, or the idler—for they will not approbate you, unless you follow them in their transgressions. Neither should it be your effort to secure the approbation of the proud, the vain, or the scornful. But the good opinion, in all moral respects, of the wise, virtuous and benevolent, it should be your ambition to secure. This, however, should not be the moving cause of living a virtuous life. The main influence to such a life, should be of a higher character, even the value of virtue itself, and the beneficial effects which its faithful practice will confer upon you. But in shaping your conduct, let it be characterized by those principles, that will be approved by the discreet, the upright and experienced of society.

Let not this subject be misunderstood. It is one thing, so to conduct as to acquire the respect of the public—but another and quite different thing, to shape your proceedings for the sole purpose of obtaining public favor or popularity.—While the former is to be approbated, the latter should be decidedly avoided. I know of no individuals whose conduct and example are more to be despised and avoided, than confirmed seekers after popularity—those people who form their opinions and give support to religious or political sentiments and measures, with no other objects in view, but to gain the applause of the multitude, and the smiles of the wealthy and fashionable. Individuals of this character, can not properly be said to possess principles, or to be guided by them. Their only rule and motive of action is policy—their only study the highest effort of their mental powers is, to shape their course, as to float, like the empty bubble or the worthless weed, on the surface of the flowing tide of popularity. Neither is there any dependence to be placed upon them. Having no love of truth and principle to insure their stability, to-day they are with this party or sect, to-morrow with that—now they are warm advocates of these sentiments or measures, and anon, as zealously the friends of those directly the reverse—as they are swayed about by the contradictory winds of fluctuating interest, or public favor! People of this description are to be pitied for their weakness and folly, and their vacillating example is to be avoided by all who would be truly respected—by all who would vindicate the position, that there is such a thing as principle among men, and that the human mind can be governed by it.*

Their example, I repeat, should be shunned, as derogatory to human nature, and detrimental to the best interests of society. In forming your opinions, on any subject, let reason and conscience be your guides. In this respect you should not be swayed by the good or bad opinions, which others will thus be led to entertain of you; but solely by your reason. If a proposition or a sentiment, on a careful and candid examination, appears consistent and reasonable, adopt and support it, whether it is believed by many or few. If, on the contrary, it appears unreasonable, reject it, even though adopted by the whole world beside. This is the only safe rule which you, as reasonable beings, can adopt—it is the only manly, honorable and consistent course you can follow. But in allowing interest, numbers, or popularity, to have an influence in forming or biasing your opinions, you throw down all the safe guard with which your Maker has graciously provided you, and are liable to become the dupe of every error that wears a gilded dress.

Permit me to repeat, that your moral conduct should be of such character as to gain for you the good opinion of the virtuous and upright. But in forming opinions, and in supporting measures, assert the high prerogative of your nature, and judge for yourselves, without respect to others. Be certain that you act from honest and conscientious motives—that your only object is to obtain truth—and trust the result to a righteous Providence. Whether those around you approve or reject, you will possess that which they can never give or take away—

"The soul's calm sunshine, and the heartfelt joy."

* The class to which I refer, is mainly composed of those whose minds are so weak, that they are not capable of forming a definite opinion upon any subject of importance—those who are so bound up in self, as to be indifferent what principles prevail, so that their ends are accomplished—and those who are better pleased to have error and vice spread through community, than truth and virtue, provided their interests are as equally enhanced by the former as the latter.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ XXIX. A FATHER'S SUNDAY EVENINGS WITH HIS FAMILY; OR FAMILIAR ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE GOSPELS.—MATT. CHAP. III.—I have much reason to be gratified with the evidences which your exercises, this week, display both of your having been earnestly desirous to understand this chapter, and of your having made praiseworthy exertions and endeavors to accomplish the object of your desire. This painting, which attempts to portray the appearance of the hill-country of Judea where John commenced his ministry, and the effects of John's preaching upon the minds and countenances of his auditors, together with the peculiar dress and appearance of the Baptist himself, I have to commend very much. From another I have received the description of another scene, not drawn, but so minutely described that a painter would have difficulty in sketching. The picture must have been distinct, I doubt not, in the mind's eye that described it. John is here described as holding in his hand a roll of parchment containing the book of Daniel, and reading therefrom the prophecy of "the kingdom" which the Jews expected, and of which John was the herald. Both of these exercises I commend very much, and beg you frequently to repeat similar attempts, for of this I am certain, my dear children, that those who have formed pictures to themselves of any scene in sacred or profane history in their mind's eye, and much more if they have sketched or represented it, that scene will never be forgotten. Never! Who forgets any of the scenes represented by Raphael, after having seen his Cartoons?—who forgets any of the scenes represented by Hogarth?—who forgets Penn's treaty with the Indian's, or Cromwell's dissolving the long Parliament, after having seen these framed paintings, or good prints taken from them. Be assured that your time is not mis-spent in forming to yourselves representations and pictures of any important historical events, of persons and their expression of countenance, and of the scenery and circumstances connected with it.

Verse 1. I see that all of you have been puzzled by the phrase "in those days." It appears to me quite improbable that this reference or that which is implied in the original Greek conjunction de, is a reference to the first two chapters. Both the conjunction and the phrase of those days refer to something which has gone before; but I can scarcely suppose that to be the contents of these first two chapters.—Were I translating the word rendered preaching in our common or authorized version of the Bible, I should make use of the words "making proclamation"; and for wilderness I should substitute hill or upland country. I presume nothing more is meant than this, that John when he commenced the announcement or proclamation of the long-expected kingdom, made his appearance, not in the city of Jerusalem, but in the country parts of Judea.

Verse 2. From your exercises I perceive that you have been quite puzzled to make out the burden of John's messages to the people. By referring to the 17th verse, of the next chapter, you will find that this same announcement or proclamation was the burden of the addresses which Jesus delivered to his benighted countrymen. The kingdom of heaven is not a phrase invented and introduced by John or Jesus; no, it was a phrase, a current use among the Jews of that age, borrowed, it is generally admitted, from Dan. vii: 13, 14, and ii: 44. The kingdom and the king which the Jews expected, you have often heard me tell you, were of a temporal nature—a literal kingdom and king. They were at the time of the appearance of Jesus in subjection to the Romans, and they desired deliverance; it was natural for them, therefore, in these circumstances readily to believe what they very much desired and thus to interpret the words of their prophets quite literally. Foster has made an interesting and beautiful use of this mistaken notion of the Jews in his admirable Essay on Popular Ignorance. Now, the rectification of this mistake seems to have been the main purpose of the addresses and discourses of John and Jesus. "My kingdom is not of this world" said Jesus, and it seems to have been the chief purpose of himself and his pioneer John, to endeavor to convince their auditors of their mistake and to have them repent of or lay aside their erroneous ideas, and receive the truth as to the promised and expected kingdom. "Repent ye," I consider equivalent to saying, reconsider your opinions, change your minds; ye have thought amiss; think again, and O! think aught.—After the attempts which you yourselves have been making during the week to understand this phrase, the explanation will impress itself on your attention and memory with a force a hundred-fold exceeding that with which it would be passively received by one whose curiosity or desire to understand it had never been aroused or in exercise. This is one advantage of thinking—of inquiring for yourselves.

Verse 4. In one of your exercises I find the inquiry—why did John assume a peculiar dress, and live on a peculiar diet? As to the dress, that assumed by John seems to have been that which was usually worn by the prophets. Compare 2 Kings i: 8; Zech. xiii: 4; Rev. vi: 12; and xi: 3. In the first of these passages you will find that in such a kind of garment Elijah was clothed, and as John had been designed under the name of the prophet, Mal. iv: 5, whose spirit and qualifications he was to possess, Luke i: 17, he took the same habit. As to his diet, it may appear a very singular one to us, but in Eastern countries it is not at all uncommon. In modern travels you will find it mentioned that locusts make very nice eating. When fried and sprinkled with salt they very much resemble the river cray-fish. By their law the Jews were allowed to eat of these, Lev. xi: 21, 22. They are an article of food to the present day in several Asiatic countries. Honey was frequently met with in Judea, as in this country, in hollow trees, and likewise in the clefts of rocks. Compare 1 Sam. xiv: 26; Judges xi: 8; Ps. lxxxi: 16. *

Verse 5. "What went ye out into the wilderness to see?" Jesus inquired at those who had gone out to see John. And what do ye suppose were the attractive circumstances which drew forth from city and country such immense multitudes as are represented to have resorted to John? In the first place it was a time of great and general expectation, it being generally supposed that the kingdom of God, spoken of by Daniel, would immediately appear. In the next place, the appearance of a prophet was a novelty in Israel, none having appeared since the days of Malachi, who is supposed to have flourished or exercised his office between 436 to 420 years before Christ. Again, the circumstances attending his birth, the peculiarity of his manner and mode of preaching, so different from that of the Scribes and Pharisees, concurred with the above in "drawing all men to him." Lastly, a vague idea that he might be the Christ, drew forth many to satisfy their curiosity. See Luke iii: 15.

Verse 6. It was customary among those sects or bodies of men, Jewish or Gentile, who were distinguished by any peculiarity in their religious or philosophical opinions, to have some distinctive word, sign, or mark by which the initiated might be known. What you have heard about masonic words and signs and initiatory rites, will give you my children, an idea of what I mean. Baptism, the initiatory rite employed by John, meant probably somewhat like this, as children are generally washed on their introduction into this world, those professing their faith in a new kingdom should thus signify, most appropriately, their change of views on this subject.

Verse 7-14. The Pharisees (literally, separatists) were a sect among the Jews professing themselves purer and better than others. "Lord, I thank thee that I am not as other men" was the language of their hearts and lips. The Sadducees answer to the Materialists and Infidels of our day. The Pharisee was secretly wicked, the Sadducee openly profane. Imagine to yourselves, then, an assemblage of such—hypocrites and scoffers—coming to John under pretence of wishing to hear about a kingdom, which they neither believed in, nor desired. No wonder at the harsh epithet with which he begins his address to them. "Hath any one," says he, "convinced you of the destruction and wrath which are coming on this nation and land? And are ye really disposed to flee from it? If so, show your sincerity by such a change in your disposition and conduct as becomes such repentance—such a change in your views. Hitherto ye would not admit it as a possible thing that God would utterly destroy a people so highly favored by him; but this utter destruction of this once highly favored nation and land is advancing—yea, it is already at the door. Ye need not vainly and obstinately resort to the long-cherished notion, that because ye are descended from Abraham, the peculiar favorite of Heaven, ye are safe and secure. I tell you that of these stones and rocks which surround us in this wilderness, God is able to raise up a race more really worthy the name of children of the "Father of the just or upright," (not faithful,) than you, his lineal descendants. I repeat it, therefore, the end of this nation is at hand, the axe is at the root of its national and independent existence; and every one in this nation who perversely persists in not foreseeing the evil, changing his course, and fleeing from it, will assuredly be overtaken in the horrible destruction which is pending over this land and people. My office and my commission is merely to endeavor to effect a change of views on these subjects, and to admit by the initiatory rite of baptism, those who profess such a change. But after me there cometh one compared with whom I am no more, than is the meanest slave compared with that master whose sandals it is his duty to take off, or carry. The sign by which his followers are to be known is not the having been baptized, but the possession of a spirit of inward purity and sanctity—a spirit of power and of a sound mind. To him hath God committed all power on earth, and into his hands hath he put the Roman army as a fanning or winnowing machine, by means of which he will thoroughly cleanse this land: While he preserves many that will believe in him, by sending them to foreign parts, he will most assuredly bring nameless horrors and desolations and miseries on the heart of those who obstinately remain in their unbelief of his character and commission." Thus spake John. Every one should read the account of the destruction of Jerusalem by Josephus, and he will be better able to understand this passage. The preservation of Christians spoken of in verse 12, was actually accomplished by many of them fleeing before the destruction of Jerusalem, to Pella, in Coelosyria.—In illustration of the figure of speech employed in verse 12, I may mention to you that the threshing-floors in the East were generally a high piece of ground, rolled and beaten very firm and hard, on which the sheaves were laid, and the grain trodden out by oxen, and afterwards separated from the straw and chaff. The chaff was burned lest by a change of wind it should be blown back among the wheat or grain.

Verse 14. You have been consulting the parallel passages—an excellent practice—for I see that you have noticed the irreconcilability of this verse with John i: 33. By consulting Doddridge you will find two attempts at reconciliation, of which, I presume, neither will prove satisfactory. Of all the solutions of the difficulty of which I have either thought or heard, this appears the most probable: As Matthew did not attend our Lord till long after this transaction, it is most likely that he was misinformed.

Verse 15. Why was Jesus baptized? That he might comply with all the ordinances appointed by God—that he might give to them his sanction—that he might acknowledge that John's baptism was founded upon divine authority, as John claimed when he said, "he who sent me to baptize."

A wicked book is worse than a bad man, inasmuch as it can never repent, and each copy may do as much harm as one rascal.

Frugality, says Burke, is founded on the principle that all riches have limits.

PSALM IX: 17.

"The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God."

A correspondent in Tennessee requests an explanation of this often quoted passage. Sermons have been preached in explanation of it, by Universalists, almost times without number—many of which have been published in books, pamphlets and periodicals. But as it is probable that many of our present readers have not seen it explained in this work, and are distant from any place, where they can procure Bailou's Eleven Sermons, or other books containing its explanation, I will briefly notice it here.

1. The Psalm is supposed to have been composed after David's triumphant wars with the Philistines, the Moabites with Hadadezer, king of Zobah, and with the Syrians, recorded in 2 Samuel viii: 1-9. If so, the expressions, the "wicked" and "all the nations that forget God," are limited by the subject to those nations, and people. The phrase, "shall be turned into hell"—Hebrew, sheol—Greek, hades—probably signifies, therefore, that such nations and rulers shall be pursued by victorious armies, and driven or destroyed into the state or place of the dead—that being the meaning, according to our idiom, of sheol and hades. More literally, sheol denotes the place concerning which the most prying eye and the most listening ear can gain no information—and hades denotes the unseen, the invisible world—while the proper primitive meaning of hell, is the covered over, the hidden place. These definitions are given by Clarke (Methodist), and Campbell (Presbyterian), and I believe by every respectable Partialist commentator.

2. But supposing the occasion and subject of the psalm not to have been the particular one above named, but general—the text does not and can not teach the doctrine of endless misery. For this doctrine, as is now universally admitted by the great mass of Partialist critics and commentators, is not acknowledged or known in the Old Testament—that revelation discloses no name for such a place—sheol or hades express merely the place where all the dead are, good and bad, and without regard to their joys or sorrows, their happiness or misery. Consequently, if this text is made to express a peculiarly unhappy condition of the wicked, and the nations here named, it must be by a figurative use of the word rendered hell. The same critics before named tell us that sheol is used figuratively to express sorrow, distress, darkness of mind, depth of affliction. In this sense, David's own soul had been "delivered from the lowest hell"—Ps. lxxvi: 13—and, (in the near prospect of death,) "the sorrows of hell compassed" him about, Ps. xviii: 5. If such had been the effects of his own wickedness and departures from rectitude, he might well know that trouble and anguish will be the lot of the evil doer, and destruction and ruin come on the nation that has not the Lord for its God.

3. The context confirms these views of the passage. Those acquainted with the parallelisms of Hebrew poetry, will readily recognize the triple parallels of verses 15, 16 and 17, of this psalm—"the Heathen," those on whom the Lord executeth judgment, and "the nations that forget God," on the one hand, and those whose foot is taken in the net they hid, the wicked who are snared, and the wicked who are turned into hell, on the other hand. Or take the following more modern version, by Noyes.

"The nations have sunk in the pit which they made;
In the net which they hid is their own feet taken.
Thus is it known that Jehovah executeth judgment;
The wicked are ensnared in the work of their own hands.
The wicked shall be driven into hades;
Yea, all the nations that forget God."

When any proof, however slight, is brought that the Old Testament writers believed in endless misery—that

* Those who expected the Messiah as a temporal prince would think that his forerunner must come in great pomp and splendor. But in this they were disappointed. Perhaps this was meant to lead those who would think, and could be induced to give up their pre-conceived notions, to reflect that probably the glory of this approaching kingdom was to be spiritual, and the subjects of it poor and despised who derived their honors, pleasures, and riches from another world.

commentators of all denominations are wrong in their explanations of sheol or hades, as used in the Old Testament—then, and not till then, can we fairly be called on to show that Ps. ix: 17, does not militate against the doctrine of universal salvation. A. B. G.

BR. T. FISK'S DEFENCE.

I have received a communication from Br. Fisk, equivalent to seven closely written pages of letter paper size, in reply to an article by Br. Hammond, published in No. 52, of our last volume. The great length of the communication, the non-necessity of much in it for the defence of the writer, the fear that some of its incidental remarks on persons not particularly interested in the matter, will draw forth replies from them in return, and the request for its speedy appearance in our columns, which are already insufficient to contain all we wish to publish—all, induce me to omit his various comments and reflections, (save a bare outline,) and give the material parts, only, of the article. The propriety of this course will appear, from the following outline of circumstances.

At the session of the Niagara Association, in 1835, it was resolved that the Clerk forward certain charges of "gross immorality," against Br. Fisk, with their evidence, to the ecclesiastical body in the bounds of which the accused then resided. In the session of 1836, the committee of discipline of the same Association, reported "no cause of complaint." Br. Fisk then came out in an editorial article, in the Southern Evangelist, asking what had become of the charges of the preceding year—calling them inquisitorial, etc., and stating that those charges were against a brother none of them had ever seen, and who was far distant from them, etc. A copy of this paper was sent by Br. Fisk to Br. Hammond, who sent a reply to its questions, to this office, for publication, sometime last Summer. A private correspondence between myself and Br. Hammond, at last induced me to publish it. It is the article against which Br. Fisk has sent the following defence. I would further remark, that Br. Hammond's reply to Br. Fisk's questions has not been copied into the Evangelist—neither is this defence inserted there. Of course, if the parties wish to make this paper the medium for their communications on this disagreeable subject, with us must be left the privilege of deciding on the propriety of inserting any part of what is offered, and of the duration of the controversy. What we believe is equal and exact justice to both, we will grant, and no more; for the subject is not only unpleasant and painful to us, but uninteresting, if not disagreeable, to nearly all our readers. We therefore give all in the present article, which we conceive relates strictly to Br. Fisk's defence; and shall use the same license in confining the opposite side to matters of fact, and the point in dispute, should Br. Hammond see proper further to pursue the subject. To the defence.

1. Br. Fisk returns thanks to Br. Hammond for stating what the charges are, and says, that had the charges been published in 1835, with the minutes, he would have had less reason to complain that community was left to imagine the worst. He thinks some portion of Br. Hammond's letter manifests joy at being able to fix a stigma on a brother's character—a spirit inconsistent with Christian charity. Thinks the publication of the minutes did injure him, whether he was innocent or not; and complains, not that charges were made, but that he was condemned unheard. He reiterates the declaration that he never was within the bounds of the Niagara Association "since it was formed," and censures Br. H. for leaving off the latter clause [in quotations], in his reply to it.

"2. Again you say—'that the practice of issuing one proposal after another for the publication of papers, obtaining by this means a considerable amount of advance pay, and then not publishing the same, nor refunding back the money, was immoral, and highly unbecoming the character of a Universalist clergyman.' One proposal after another! That is—I make a constant practice of defrauding the community! Now, Sir, I call upon you to put your finger upon one single instance of this kind in my whole life. I pronounce the insinuation unfounded and false in all its parts—and I call upon you to sustain the allegation by positive proof, or to retract the unhallowed calumny as publicly as the charge has been made. My good name is of priceless value to me—it is my all—and I can not submit quietly to have it blackened with falsehood, and stained by groundless surmises. I never issued proposals for publishing a paper in my life, without completing the volume for which I had received pay, or making satisfactory arrangements to have it done."

He then refers to his publications in New-York and New-Haven, which he made arrangements to have completed, but which ceased after they passed out of his hands, whereby he lost the purchase money of them. As to that in New-Haven, he had made arrangements to have its subscribers supplied with another paper, when a fire in Boston destroyed the subscription list, together with all his books, papers and clothing, save what he wore, leaving him utterly destitute of property and employment.

"3. Having already extended my remarks far beyond what I had originally intended, I proceed to notice the grave charge contained in your letter of taking money from strangers without returning an equivalent according to promise. The charge is of serious magnitude—and if sustained, the guilty one deserves not only to be disfellowshipped by the Niagara Association, and the Universalist denomination generally, but to be sent to the penitentiary for a term of years. The act is no better than theft, or even highway robbery. Will it then be believed that a Universalist minister has been guilty of obtaining money under false pretences, guilty of fraud or theft, and yet allowed to preach in fellowship with the denomination for EIGHT YEARS after the foul crime was committed, before any public notice was taken of his 'immoral,' 'unbecoming conduct'?"

"The supposed offence was committed in the early part of the Summer of 1827—this fact however you think proper to conceal. * * * * From the tenor of your remarks, and the zealous exertions of your Association, the public would naturally be led to conclude that the fraud was stupendous—of great magnitude. They will perhaps be surprised to hear the following facts. The paper in question was PLAIN TRUTH—the whole amount which I received, according to the best of my recollection, was less than fifteen dollars—all told. But even this small sum was not fraudulently obtained—without returning an equivalent according to promise, as you so unjustly accuse me. * * * * Now for the charges which you say 'were sustained by satisfactory proof.'"

"It is probably well known to you that Br. L. S. Everett and myself published the Gospel Advocate, for a time in company, at Buffalo, N. Y. After my return from an extensive tour in the Western States of between two and three thousand miles, at my own private expense, Br. Everett wished to remove to Auburn. I gave him my half of the paper, and intending to reside still at Buffalo, issued proposals for publishing a semi-monthly paper to be entitled 'PLAIN TRUTH.' This was in 1827. Desiring to visit my friends at the East, I travelled through the towns you mention, preached, solicited and obtained subscribers. On visiting Philadelphia I had an invitation to return there, which I complied with; and after repeated solicitations, finally accepted a call to become the pastor of the Lombard-street church in that city. Immediately upon this, I wrote Br. Everett at Auburn to make an arrangement with him to supply the subscribers I had obtained, with the Gospel Advocate. The proposition was agreed to instantly, my list sent on to him, with the amount of money each subscriber had paid, and the following announcement made a few weeks after, in the first number of the next volume, to which I beg leave to invite your undivided attention. I quote enough of the article to settle the matter beyond doubt or controversy. Read.

"PLAIN TRUTH."

"An arrangement has been made with the gentleman who issued proposals for publishing a semi-monthly paper with the above title, by which they will be supplied with the 'Gospel Advocate and Impartial Investigator.' This paper, it will be perceived, contains double the quantity of matter of the proposed publication, and at only one-third extra expense. Ordinarily the Advocate will afford as much reading on the subjects designed to be discussed in Plain Truth as would be displayed on a half sheet, and this paper has never been played to any sect, further than Gospel truth and right reason would justify, nor will it be, so long as it remains in the hands of its present proprietors. It may be proper to state that a list of the subscribers to Plain Truth has been forwarded to us, and those to whom this number may be sent, who are disposed to accept it, if they have not paid already, will please forward, etc., or if they have paid ANY PART, to forward the remainder by mail," etc.

He says an article headed "The Christian's Consolation," signed "C. H.," and dated "Lockport, December 29, 1827," appeared in the very number of the Gospel Advocate containing the foregoing notice—asks whether it was not written by Br. Hammond—if so, whether Br. H. did not see said notice—and if so, whether he had forgotten it when the charges were brought up against Br. F. The following is too important to allow abbreviation.

"4. The answer which I returned Br. John Craig to the one addressed to me at Philadelphia, (not New-York as you state,) I have since regretted. Had the tenor of his communication been such an one as a brother of the same faith should write to another, the answer would have been indited in the same spirit. I thought it was not so—that instead of being of a friendly nature, it was a haughty demand of me to account for my conduct in not publishing the paper to which he had subscribed—dealing withal pretty largely, if my recollection serves me correctly, in surmises and suspicions, to which I was then an utter stranger. * * * * I own I was greatly disturbed by the reception of that letter—and on the impulse of the moment I answered him 'that if reasons were as plenty as blackberries, I could give no man a reason on compulsion.' I confess this was wrong—it is all the wrong however with which I have to reproach myself in the whole of this unpleasant business. I know I have at times been imprudent—what everybody says must be true—but I can solemnly aver before the Author of my existence, that I have never been guilty of intentional fraud. I never contracted an obligation in my life without believing that I preserved the means of meeting and cancelling it. I am aware that my sanguine temperament, excess of zeal in the cause I have espoused, has betrayed me into occasional indiscretions. I had hoped, however, that these would have been looked upon with as favorable an eye, as was consistent with that godlike principle which 'thinketh no evil.' Instead of which, I have been exposed to public censure, my motives questioned, my faults magnified, my principles unpunished, and my acts most ungenerously misrepresented."

Here follow some general remarks on the manner in which some few of his ministering brethren have treated him, his forbearance until compelled to speak on the subject, and the declaration, "With this subject, Sir, I have done forever—no earthly consideration will induce me to advert to it again."

It closes with the following excellent advice respecting the opposition of brother to brother, depreciating remarks, and slanderous insinuations, etc., etc.—things which, however foreign to the subject of the defence, are undoubtedly too common with some of our brethren.

"These things ought not so to be. The practice is retarding the progress of our cause, more than all things else combined. Let each one of us endeavor to amend one, to reform ourselves in this particular, and no more provoke one another but to love and good works.

"I can not conclude this communication without expressing my sincere acknowledgments to the lay brethren of our denomination, for the unvarying kindness I have received at their hands. It has been a well-spring of consolation, in the darkest hour. The majority of my ministering brethren too, have dealt kindly with me, notwithstanding all my faults and follies. That those who have pursued a different course may be forgiven by their consciences and their God, as freely as they are by me, is the sincere prayer of THEOPHILUS FISK.

"Charleston, S. C., January 13, 1837."

I would suggest to Br. Fisk—that should he notice this subject in his paper, he had better send a copy to Br. Hammond—that his ardent temperamentsometimes leads him to use language not a little severe, and too well calculated to create hostility rather than peace—and that even he needs a little reforming, on wholesale slander, when he accuses all our Northern periodicals of being abolitionist; when it is a fact, (whatever may be the sentiments of their Editors and proprietors,) that none of the periodicals have directly meddled with the question of slavery, while the Pioneer and the Evangelist are frequently—almost constantly—"fishing in the muddy waters," and stirring up strife in the South against the North. To use his own words, "These things ought not so to be"—no, not even to induce our Southern brethren to withdraw all patronage from Universalist papers here, and bestow it on those nearer home. We may not "do evil," even though it is "that good may come of it." "A word to the wise is sufficient."

THE RECORD.

The Murray Association met in Ohio City, November 26, 1836. Br. Tenney, Moderator, and Br. Stephen Hull, Clerk, protom. A letter of fellowship was granted to Br. Hull, of Oberlin; and Brs. J. Braman, B. Hickox, H. P. Sage, and S. Hull, were appointed to solicit subscriptions and establish circuit preaching in the bounds of the Association. Sermons were preached by Brs. Hull, Tenny, Sage, Braman, Hickox and Whitney. One year ago and there was but one preacher of our order in the bounds of this Association—now there are seven. The friends in Ohio City are said to be few but faithful. Br. Whitney, late of this city, it will be remembered, has settled there—and that they are about erecting a meeting-house, our readers have already been advised. Adjourned to meet in Huntington, Lorain county, on the last Saturday and Sunday in May, 1837.

NEW SOCIETIES were formed in Poughkeepsie, about the first of January; and in North Bridgewater, Mass., on the 5th inst. Of the former, Br. Shrigley says, our friends in Poughkeepsie are "numerous, respectable and zealous."

REMOVALS.—Br. Boden has removed from Marshall to Madison, to which latter place he wishes his papers and letters directed in future. Br. Linus Paine has engaged to settle with the new society in Panama, Chautauque county, after the 1st of March next; at which time he will remove there from Centreville, Allegany county, his present residence. Br. W. H. Knapp, of Danvers, Mass., has received an invitation to settle with the society in Cabotville, (Springfield,) same State. Br. B. B. Hallock has removed from New-York to New-Haven, where he is engaged to labor the whole time. Br. Elbridge G. Brooks, from Portsmouth to Exeter, N. H. Br. T. C. Eaton has removed from Fulton, Oswego county, to Dunkirk, Chautauque county, to which place he wishes all his letters and papers directed hereafter.

The installation of Br. O. A. Skinner, as pastor of the Fifth Universalist society in Boston, took place in Boylston Hall, on the 26th ult. Sermon by Br. B. Whittemore.

MEETING HOUSES.—New ones are about being erected in Calais, Me., and in Randalstown, Md.

DEDICATIONS.—A Universalist meeting-house in Philipston, Mass., was dedicated, January 25th. Sermon by Br. H. Ballou. The Union meeting-house in Berlin, Vt., was dedicated lately. Sermon by Br. R. Streeter. Rev. Mr. Root, (Baptist,) and Rev. E. Scott, (Methodist,) assisted in the services. The new meeting-house erected by our friends in Bristol, Ontario county, was dedicated on December 28th. Sermon by Br. J. Chase, from Phil. ii: 16. Brs. Townsend and Ackley, took part in the services, and Br. Andrews preached in the evening. The house is built of cobble stone, in elegant Gothic style—is thirty-four by forty-four feet, with a basement fitted up for school rooms, and surmounted with a modest Gothic steeple. The cause has prospered during the past seven years in Bristol, under the efficient labors of our affectionate Br. O. Ackley. Br. Andrews has engaged to supply their desk for a part of the time.

Br. Thomas F. King, of Charlestown, Mass., has been chosen a chaplain to the House of Representatives of that State, in conjunction with Rev. Barron Stowe, (Baptist,) of Boston.

Br. A. F. McCabe, late of Skaneateles, has accepted an invitation to settle at Hamilton, and preach to that society and the one in Lebanon, in the stead of Br. Woolley. He has already commenced his labors, and will probably remove his family there in the Spring.

SOUTHERN PIONEER.

Brs. Andrews, McCune and Robert Smith, have our thanks for their attention to our wants, in furnishing us with those numbers of their paper which we had not received. We find in them several matters and things which claim some notice, and shall receive it as soon as we can find time and room. At present we can only say—The Southern Pioneer and Evangelical Liberalist is published every Saturday, in Baltimore, Md., at $2. per annum, in advance, to which twenty-five cents will invariably be added for every three months delay. Brs. L. F. W. Andrews, George C. McCune, and Robert Smith, Proprietors and Editors, and Revs. L. S. Everett, of Baltimore; Z. Fuller, Philadelphia, and N. M. Knapp, Associate Editors. Bating its meddling with the slavery question, (in favor of slavery,) and its somewhat warm, and (I think) uncharitable spirit towards its fellow-periodicals, and many ministering brethren in the Northern and Eastern States, it is well conducted, filled with much interesting matter, a great portion of which appears to be taken from the Universalist Circulating Family Library, and therefore consisting of extracts from Universalist books. We sincerely wish them success in every laudable work and effort, and hope ever to remain sufficiently unmoved by what we disapprove in their periodical, to retain for them our good will and fraternal affection. A. B. G.

THE SOUTHERN EVANGELIST.

This is published in Charleston, South Carolina, Br. T. Fisk, Editor and Proprietor; Brs. S. J. McMorris and J. G. Stearns, Assistant Editors. What is said of the Southern Pioneer is true of this paper; both in what we approve and disapprove—save that Br. Fisk's warmer temperament and more (what shall I call it?—volatile?) genius adds point, and pith, and severity to all he writes on the disapproved subjects. By using, as we suppose, the same matter for a great portion of both papers, there is in all other respects a great similarity between the contents of the two in all that is peculiarly good, beautiful and interesting. The Evangelist has been enlarged to the size of the Southern Pioneer—that is, about the size of the Union, of New-York—and is published at probably the same terms as the Pioneer—as the first number has not the terms published in it.

THE RESTORATIONIST.

This is a neatly printed monthly, with a well filled cover, published in Boston, in connexion with the Independent Messenger, from the best portions of which its contents are taken. It contains 16 royal octavo pages in double columns, making an annual volume of 200 pages, at one dollar per annum. Revs. Paul Dean, Resident Editor, and Charles Hudson, William Morse, Adin Ballou, and Edwin M. Stone, Corresponding Editors.

I was among those who always regretted the secession of this small band from our ranks, and the spirit of hostility they manifested against all who would not secede with them. It was with reluctance that, last year, I was compelled to defend this paper from their inconsistent, (and I think) uncandid attack on its prize tale—inconsistent, for they were at that very time publishing a long, uninteresting party-spirited dream—and absurd, for the tale they attacked used but the same phrases to describe the limited punishment of the wicked, themselves and the Bible use for the same purpose. I rejoice in seeing that their opposition to well written illustrations of the truth, in the form of narratives and tales, is at an end—at least both the Independent Messenger and the Restorationist publish such articles. And so far as their labors are calculated to promote peace on earth and good will among men, and to disseminate the great truths of God's paternity, man's fraternity, and consequent universal salvation, we can heartily bid them God speed, and endeavor to promote their success. As to all else, it is written on sand, and the first overflowing of affection will wash it out of existence. A. B. G.

THE CHRISTIAN INTELLIGENCER.

This faithful veteran in the cause of universal salvation has been suspended for a time, by its proprietor, Br. P. Sheldon, who wishes to dispose of it to some one who will continue it. (Can it not be united with the Banner? Can not the breach be healed, that exists there, between Brs. Drew and Sheldon?) Br. Sheldon's avocations prevent his continuing the publishing business, and Br. Fletcher, its late Editor, is about commencing a paper which shall be neutral in politics and religion, in Thomaston, Me.

A. B. G.

EVANGELICAL PREACHER.

Br. Sanderson, of the Herald of Truth, Rochester, proposes publishing a monthly work of this title, in 12mo form, on fine paper, each number to contain two original sermons, the volume, twenty-four sermons, with title page and index—at the very low price of Fifty Cents per annum. The sermons are all to be creditable to their authors, and interesting and instructive to the reader. The work is not to commence until a sufficient patronage is obtained to secure from loss.

The price is very low, and the work eminently needed. But may I offer Br. Sanderson a lesson recorded on the tablet of my own experience? He can not afford at this price to pay for his "copy," and without that he will be vexatiously and frequently delayed for want of the wherewithal to fill his monthly. Besides—there are many excellent sermons, published years ago in pamphlets and our periodicals, which very few of his readers have ever seen—and many others, as good as the majority of sermons he can procure, published in our folio periodicals, which few of his readers have preserved, and which they wish to preserve. These will form a full fountain, from which he may always draw supplies when he can not procure original sermons, without his having to infringe on any one's rights, or to disappoint his readers, if he will but drop the one word "original."

 We will publish the prospectus in our next. Subscriptions will be received at this office, for the above, or any other of our periodicals.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. M. B. SMITH in Fort Plain, and Br. L. C. BROWNE at Burlington Flats, and at Exeter Hou. in the evening—Br. EDWARDS at Ellinwood Hollow—Br. C. B. BROWN in Ellisburg, and in Mansville in the evening—Br. WAGGONER in Eatonville, and near Esq. Snell's in the evening—Br. BRITTON in Brownville village—Br. SIAS at Perch river, and at Jenks' school house in the evening—Br. C. S. BROWN in Norwich—Br. EATON at Dunkirk.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. C. S. BROWN in Otselec village—Br. J. FRENCH in the stone school-house near Br. Smiley's, and in Talcott's school-house in the evening—Br. WOOLLEY in Clockville.

Br. GROSH will lecture in the school-house at Norridge Corners, on Thursday evening next. Subject—the resurrection named in Daniel xii: 1, 2. and John vi: 28, 29.

Br. T. C. EATON will preach in the evenings of Monday, February 12, in Alexander—13th, in the brick school-house near Br. Thompson's in Aurora—14th, in Boston, as Br. Lewis may appoint. [Received too late for insertion last week.]

POETRY.

OUR COUNTRY.

Who that delights in the wild, thrilling and erratic fancies of undirected, uncontrollable genius, has not heard of John Neal, a lawyer, now residing in Portland, Me.? And how few of his admirers have ever seen and read his "BATTLE OF NIAGARA," a poem without notes, and GOLDAU, or the Maniac Harper; a small volume but full—yes, in the eulogy bestowed on it by another poet of our land, nearly every page full enough of poetic and sublime imagery to furnish out many a modern poem? "Jehu O'Cutaract," the assumed name under which it was ushered to the notice of the world is most prodigal—a very spendthrift of his choice things, filling the board so full, there is but very little room left for any thing else—and erratic—wild—the meteor—the comet, all fail as comparisons applied to the train of thought in his bold and wandering style.

But to my object. The following extract taken from the Introduction to the Battle of Niagara—has the sense entire as far as it goes, and will, I think fully repay the time spent in its perusal by any one having within him a love of poetry. It will require study and meditation fully to understand and feel its beauty and force. Thus read, it will be appreciated. Probably I may extend this extract by continuing it in some future number. A. B. G.

And stood above the mighty flood;
And listened to its stormy voice;
And heard it on the winds rejoice;
And there—he would have sung—but there
The awe he felt was in the air.

Then he stood on a cliff when the morning unrelled
Her banners of crimson, and purple and gold,
Her plumage, and robe with its changeable fold,
And felt as he saw all these splendours outspread,
As if he had gone where some mighty one slumbers
With the ruins of song, and the relics of numbers;
Who woke as he heard the unhalloed tread!

Yet—yet 'twas an impulse may never be quenched:
The fountains that burst where the light has its source—
Or cherubim wings, may be stayed in their course,
When they lighten along where the storm is entrenched;
Her spear from the angel of night may be wrenched;
Or the plumage of peace in the battle be drenched—
When it bends o'er the strife, like the bow of the sky,
Or the light that is seen in a martyr's donee's eye—
Before you may still the tumultuous voice
Of a heart that is heaving with song;
Before ye may silence the lyres that rejoice,
Where the wind from the water comes sweeping along;
And the chorus of mountain and cavern is strong.

THE WAY TO WINCHESTER.

"Can you tell me the way to Winchester?" asked a traveller of a group of people who stood round the steps of a country store, at the foot of the Blue Ridge in old Virginia, one dusky evening.

"Yes," said one—"you will go down the road about half a mile, turn to the right, then take the left hand road, and it will bring you to Burn's Ford, cross the river, and they will direct you."

"It looks like a storm ahead," said another—"you had better take the path along the foot of the hill—it is nearer by a mile."

"Cross over the plantations" said a third—"it is hardly half the distance; when you get to the highland you see yonder, the town will be in full view, and you will get in before night."

"And where," asked the traveller, evidently not a little perplexed, "and where does the great road right ahead of us lead to?"

"Oh! that's the road to Winchester—but we thought you wanted to go some nearer way," was the response.

The traveller jogged on, satisfied with the plain old road, and I dare say got to Winchester as soon, and safe, and sound, as he would by any of the by-roads and short-cuts so kindly recommended to him—for I had the satisfaction, when I travelled it, a few days afterwards, to find it one of the most direct, smooth, and pleasant roads in all Virginia.

I wrote down in my Sketch-Book at the time, "The way to Winchester"—and there it stands to-day, when the comments I mean to make, or the incidents proposed to be connected with the sentence, are forgotten. But they lead to a train of reflections which we will pursue for a few moments.

Here are crowds of busy people in the streets, all travelling, or in pursuit of some object. Do you ask what it is? They are seeking for the way to Wealth. Consulting with each other—interchanging opinions—and, perhaps, spending in anxious inquiries the time which ought to be occupied in reaching the object they desire. Let us pause among them.

Here is one who had, after a good deal of search, thought he found out the shortest way to wealth by the road of Speculation. But that road has a great many branches, and not a single pointer by the way upon which you can depend. Our friend started at first by the road of the Lotteries, and travelled on until he found himself a long journey further from his goal than when he set out. He came back to the starting place at last, an older man, with an older coat, and darker prospects. He has since been racking his brain to find some by-way across other people's property. He has bought stocks, but they just as often fell as raised in his hands; he made bets whenever he thought he had got ahead of any one, but he lost oftener than he won. He undertook to buy bargains; but often as not, the seller, instead of the buyer, had the bargain. And now he is almost at his wits end. He would know the way to wealth. Well, there it is, the plain old way, as straight and even as the Winchester road. Industry and economy is the turnpike road to wealth.

There is another who has taken it into his head to wait until somebody dies and leaves him a fortune. A third is looking out for an eligible settlement in the way of matrimony, with the chivalric resolution to take, for better or worse, the first bag of gold he comes to. A fourth is inventing perpetual motion, or some gimcrackery of the kind, with worlds of wealth in all his visions; and a fifth is absolutely going to ride to wealth on a goosequill. And thus, from the broad beaten road before them, they turn to the right and to the left, by the ford and by the hills, until, between their short-cuts and by-ways, three-fourths of them slip through and are forgotten by the way.

But let us turn over a leaf. Here is a group of the more sober, sage, and thinking, among men. They selected a better defined and more substantial object of pursuit. They seek the road to happiness—yet by as many different routes as the other.

One conceives that the way to wealth and the way to happiness are the same, and finds his vast mistake in the pressure of cares, and the withering and scorching influence of avarice as it steals over the heart. Another seeks it in honor, and toils on, the slave of popular caprice, until he sinks beneath his efforts, a victim, and, perhaps, a show. Another grasps at pleasure, and finds in every successive indulgence, the wretchedness of disappointment, if not the horrors of remorse.

And yet, as before, the broad, direct, and certain road to happiness, is open and easy of access to all. Reason points to it, experience adds her testimony, and religion her appeals—yet, searching for it in every path, travelling every other road to attain it, the masses of mankind turn from the way of simple virtue, and never reach the end to which that pathway leads, and that alone.

TENDENCY OF TRUE GREATNESS.

Not infrequently do we hear imputed to wit, the very faults that proceed from the absence of it. Your half-hints, the mere shadows of ideas, darken the mind instead of enlightening it. Virtue is both an affection of the soul and a demonstrable truth; it must be either felt or understood. If you derive from reasoning only what misleads instinct, without attaining to that which can supply its place, then it is not the qualities you possess that become destructive, but rather those in which you are deficient. Of all human calamities, the remedy should be looked for above. If we raise our eyes to heaven, our thoughts swell into a nobler nature; it is by soaring aloft that we breathe a purer air, and are cheered by a brighter light. Man should, in fine, be prompted to aspire to every kind of perfection, and superiority; nothing can more contribute to improve and refine his morals. Superior talents excite an admiration, and win an affection, which disposes the mind of those who possess them to gentleness and lenity. Observe men of cruel dispositions; you will generally find they are deficient in intellectual endowments of the higher order; nature even seems to have given them a cast of countenance that disgusts and repels; and they would fain avenge themselves upon the social order for what nature has refused them. I would, without the smallest fear or suspicion, confide in those whom I find satisfied with their lot, and who by some talent or other, can claim, and do readily merit, the suffrage of mankind. But for the man who is incapable of obtaining from his fellow-men any pledge of voluntary approbation what interest can he feel in the conversation of the human race? To him whom the world admires, the happiness of the world must be dear.—Madam de Staël.

MARRIAGES.

In Fort Plain, on the 8th ult., by Rev. L. C. Browne, Mr. HENRY C. KENYON, to Miss ELIZABETH YERDON.

By the same, on the 23d ult., Mr. JEREMIAH WIETING, to Miss SARAH A. KOCHER.

In Deerfield, on the 18th ult., by R Barlow, Esq.,

JOHN H. ELLIOT, to Miss ELLEN PLUMMER, both of this city.

In Eaton, on the 17th ult., by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. NELSON A. JUDD, of Smithfield to Miss ANN M. GAGN.

At Richfield Springs, on the 29th ult., by Rev. T. J. Smith, Mr. ATTI JONES, to Miss ELIZABETH ANN CHADWICK, both of that place.

December 29th, 1836, by Rev. S. R. Smith, Mr. ELOX C. BURLEY, to Miss CHARLOTTE BURLINGHAME, both of Oriskany Falls.

January 18th, 1837, by the same, Mr. N. F. METCALF, to Miss DELIA B. CLARKE, both of Hampton.

DEATHS.

In Western, on the 17th ult., Mrs. CAROLINE WHITE, consort of David White, and eldest daughter of Mr. C. Seymour, aged 26 years. She was greatly and deservedly loved—bore her painful illness, of a year's duration, with exemplary patience—and died heartily resigned to the will of God, relying on his promised mercy in Christ. Her end was peace.—Communicated.

In Columbus, Chenango county, on the 24th ult., THOMAS HOWARD, in the 95th year of his age. He was a native of Rhode Island—served several years in the provincial army during the French and Indian war, and again faithfully served his country in her struggles for Independence. He emigrated to Columbus, from Charlton, Mass., forty-three years ago, and has ever sustained the reputation of being an honest and worthy citizen. Notwithstanding his great age and early hardships, his mental powers remained sound to the last, and he died, as he lived, firm in the faith and hope of universal salvation. Thus, like the last stars of morning, our Revolutionary fathers fade away into greater glory! The funeral discourse was delivered by Br. Moses B. Smith.

* * Editors at the East are requested to copy, for the information of relatives and friends—and to do honor to the memory of a revolutionary patriot. S. C.

In Castile, January 9th, Miss BARBARA SHEAFF, aged 21 years. Her funeral was attended by the writer, and the consolations of the Gospel offered to the mourning friends and a numerous congregation from Isa. xl: 1. T. P. A.

PROSPECTUS, FOR THE SECOND VOLUME OF THE GOSPEL SUN.

S. COBB AND M. H. SMITH, EDITORS.

The first number of the second volume of the Gospel Sun will be issued on Friday, February 2d.

The Gospel Sun is a paper published simultaneously at Boston and Haverhill, Mass., and devoted to the cause of Universalism, to the defence and illustration of the Bible, and to the improvement of Society.

It will contain Sermons, Essays, Criticisms, and Miscellany of a refined and moral tendency. Its tone will be mild, but decided; courteous, but independent. And the Editors pledge themselves that no exertion on their part will be spared to make the Sun an able defender of the Truth, and a welcome companion at the family circle. And they are enabled thus to promise as some of the most able and popular writers in the denomination will contribute to its columns.

CONDITIONS.—The GOSPEL SUN and NEWS REGISTER, will be published simultaneously in Boston and Haverhill, every Friday morning, at $2.00 per annum, if paid within six months from the time of subscribing, or $2.50 at the end of the year.

ORIGINAL SERMON.

BY REV. G. S. AMES.

"For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet." 1 Cor. xv: 25.

That Jesus will reign in his mediatorial office, until he shall have succeeded in conquering and subduing every foe, but few professing Christians are willing to dispute. On this point there is not only a coincidence in sentiment, but the feelings and prayers of all denominations are alike. But concerning the means which Jesus will employ to effect this end, and the result of his ultimate success in effecting it, there is a manifestly extensive difference of opinion. Our object, therefore, in this discourse, will be, by the assistance of Almighty God, to carefully discuss these points of difference, and by an unprejudiced appeal to reason and the word of inspiration, show what must be truth in relation to this all-important subject.

The most general and acceptable doctrine is; that Jesus, in consequence of the magnitude of offences, will himself become offended; and in order to give offenders their just demerit, will revile again and rain down upon them the fire of unmitigated and inexpressible pains; which are the measures he is supposed to employ in effecting a triumphant victory over his enemies. The following is the manner in which the cruel Cyprian of the third century dwells upon this subject. "O! what a glorious day will come, when the Lord shall begin to recount his people, and to adjudge their rewards; to send the guilty into hell, to condemn our persecutors to the perpetual fire of penal flames, and to bestow on us the reward of faith and obedience to him. What glory! what joy! to be admitted to see God; to be honored, to partake of the joy of eternal life and salvation with Christ, the Lord your God; to salute Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles; to rejoice with the righteous, the friends of God, in the pleasures of immortality, when that revelation shall come—when the beauty of God shall shine upon it, we shall be as happy, as the deserters and rebellious will be miserable in unextinguishable flames!" Thus Cyprian supposes Jesus will subdue his enemies—so he is to put them under his feet; and come off clothed in the habiliments of victory; and it fully demonstrates his ignorance of God, his destitution of the spirit of Christ, and the sympathies common to a merciful and affectionate heart. He has more clearly and easily expressed his views than he can prove them; and his mind evidently manifests a greater love for fable and poetry, than for truth and humanity. A careful and unbiassed study of the Scriptures, shows us plainly that such an idea is without foundation in truth, that it stands in hostile array against the character of the Gospel, and the goodness and wisdom of God. No arguments are required to prove this fact. We must be allowed, therefore, to dissent from the opinion, but not without giving our reasons for so doing, as we advance with our discourse.

By a reference to the teachings of Jesus and his inspired apostles, and the duties which they faithfully enjoined upon us, we are presented with some useful instructions concerning the manner in which Jesus will effect this great end; viz. putting all enemies under his feet, or what is the same thing, the defeat of his enemies. We reason from example. Let the hearer be careful to remember that this determines, and decides the great question now at issue; whether the whole world will be finally saved, or whether a part will be forever lost; for it tells us whether an enemy, when put under the feet of Jesus, will groan in unutterable agonies, or be restored to the participation of life and joy.

We inquire, then, what has Christ said in relation to those moral duties which we owe to our enemies, and to mankind generally. He has wholly discountenanced a requirement of the Jewish law, which reads thus—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy"—and he recommended the following in its place. "But I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use and persecute you." Paul says—"If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head." These injunctions seem to have been introduced for our regard, as the most commendable means which can be adopted to subdue our enemies; the necessity of which is absolutely verified in the experience of every philanthropist. We very well know that the most successful method we can adopt to effect this object, is to employ those means which will subdue their enmity; and these means Christ has explained and enforced in the above beautiful language. We are to treat them with kindness and respect. To feed them, if hungry; if thirsty, to give them drink; and never to treat them with unfeeling neglect; for this would never effect a removal of those feelings lurking within, that stimulate them to be eternally our enemies. It would be like adding fuel to the flame, because it would be attended by an endless increase of enmity. Whenever, and wherever the Christ-like spirit of love has been manifested to even the most inveterate foes; an immediate salutary effect has almost invariably followed: and not only do those who retaliate increase the envious spirit of their foes, but they encourage in their own breasts the evil they are endeavoring to destroy in others, and are visited with the painful consequences which always flow from such an indulgence; remorse of conscience, misery and guilt. But if a directly opposite principle of conduct is embraced; if for wrath and revenge we use benevolence and charity: the basis of their enmity is at once destroyed. They have nothing wherewith to accuse us. They are completely under our feet. To resist such dealing, coming from any source, they can not. It will gradually win over their affections, gain their respect and vigilant exertions to promote our good, and secure our interests.

The wandering traveller when exposed to the severe chill of Winter's frosty blasts, can not be persuaded to lay off his thick mantle, (which he hugs with a firmer grasp as the cold increases,) by throwing snow upon his back. But pour out the genial, cheering rays of the enlivening sun, and he will lay off his garment, in heartfelt homage and respect. This will successfully subdue his cold condition, and put the chilling blasts of the pelting storm under the victorious feet of light, heat and comfort. In the material world, light is a phenomenon which stands opposed to darkness, and who ever thought, that darkness was necessary to overpower the obscurity of night! At a certain period, we are informed the earth was without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the mighty deep; and how, let me ask, was the thick cloud of gloom dispelled? Answer—"God said let there be light, and there was light." Thus light was poured out upon the earth, and darkness disappeared. How amply sufficient the means! How excellent the remedy! So the warming and enlightening virtues of love, brotherly affection, and good will, must drive from the breast the chilling and gloomy evil of enmity, and convert its votaries into sincere and devoted friends.

Now, if Jesus has commanded us to be merciful and kind to our enemies; what inference must we draw concerning the manner in which he will deal with his enemies? It certainly furnishes us with honorable conceptions of the truth unfolded in the text; for it is not to be supposed that he would urge upon mankind a rule he was unwilling to practice himself! If he has commanded us to be merciful, he is not cruel. If we are required to be virtuous, he can not be vicious. If he has commanded us to love our enemies, he does not hate his. And if love in us always aims to promote the happiness of all whom it embraces, then love in him, will not result in the destiny of irretrievable suffering and wretchedness for any creature in the universe.

But suppose we revert to a history of his life. Let us call to mind his conduct and dealings towards those who, in his age, were violent in their enmity, and were even proud to have it known that they raised a dissenting voice against the humble Nazarene. What spirit did he manifest to those who thus reviled him—and what prayers did he express on their behalf? Did he reproach or scorn them for their follies and crimes? Nay—he gave health to their sick—sight to their blind—hearing to their deaf—speech to their dumb—strength to their weak, and life to their dead! No inquiries did he find it necessary to make into their respective views of religion, before he consented to confer his invaluable favors. He asked not their views in relation to the propriety or impropriety of his measures. Independent of their judgment, he did his work; leaving the result to Heaven. Thus freely conferring these inestimable favors upon all the afflicted, his conduct was attended by an increase of faith, obedience and love in them. When on the shameful cross, in the last agonies of expiring nature, he manifested, in the most feeling prayer ever offered from earth to heaven, the manner in which he means to put his enemies under his feet. He had labored, with all diligence and perseverance, to reveal unto the world their duties of love to each other, and it was not for him, in this instance of ill-treatment and abuse, to breathe forth, either in expression or conduct, a spirit of retaliation. He therefore prays, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!"

We look with confidence to the period of Christ's sojourn and ministry in our world, and the characteristics of his life, for the course he will sustain during every period of time. We look to the manner, in which he treated his enemies while upon earth, for the manner in which he will treat them during every period of his reign.

But I may perhaps be told, that Jesus will not always have the happiness of his enemies in view. But I call for evidence. If Jesus, during his ministry in the world, did not give us a true sample of his method of achieving a victory over enemies; I ask, where shall we go to find the information? How shall we know the spirit of his dealings with men? We must remain totally ignorant of it, and our endeavors to imitate him in word and work, will be predicated upon mere imagination. We therefore appeal to the unchangeability of his nature and government, and set it down as a reality, that a history of his dealings with sinners, while upon earth, forms a true sample of his dealings hereafter. Did, he then, forgive men their trespasses; and implore the pardon of indulgent Heaven upon his persecutors and executioners?

He will never do injustice by treating with unfeeling hardness, those who have treated him wrongfully, or out of ignorance have despised his name.

It is here worthy of due observation, that the world, when Christ lived on earth, was as wicked in character as it ever had been before, or has been since. The people were then as unjust, and unkind—they were as entirely destitute of the heavenly graces, of all that is dignified and noble in man, as they were in any anterior period—and subsequently, men would not suffer by a comparison with them. Hence, if Jesus ever will have any disposition to endlessly curse any enemy of his religion, as some have vainly supposed, he would have done it then. Yea—it would have been the leading theme of that memorable sermon, so fervently poured forth from his soul's best affection on the mount. He would have reviled the unfeeling misanthrope in return! He would have cursed Pilate and the revengeful multitude on the spot, and never—no, never!—would he have prayed for their pardon in that feeling and touching sentence, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!" All this, we repeat, he would have done, if in any future period of time, it will be consistent for him to do a similar act. But it was not so. Yet nothing can be more true, than that he possessed the power in this hour of persecution and death, to exterminate every foe around him! At a breath, he might have scattered that council which consented to the fatal deed of death! But this would never do. Correct examples for the regard of future generations, were too necessary, and withal his mind too wise, his conduct and character too benevolent, yea—too God-like, to admit of it. This was not the way, and these were not the means which Jesus employed to put his enemies under his feet.

Most of you undoubtedly remember the instructive story of Joseph and his brethren. We will here introduce it as an illustration of our views. No brother had ever been more illly treated by his fellow-men than Joseph had been by his brethren; and none ever had a stronger reason (if this may be called a reason) for using revenge and neglect. But how did he put these enemies under his feet—and what means did he employ to effect a triumphant victory over them? Did he refuse them the corn for which they came into the land? Did he threaten them with slavery and bondage, as a recompense for their evil treatment of him? No, none of these things. He kindly filled their sacks with corn and other necessary provisions; and after learning that Benjamin, whom he loved, was then alive, he insured their pledge, that although they would then depart, yet in due time they would return with Benjamin and all the family, to subsist upon his munificence. In due time Joseph succeeds in accomplishing this, the object of his dearest wishes. He feeds and clothes them at his own expense, and secures in addition to their lives, their unmingled felicity! Thus, he subdued his enemies by the warming, vivifying, and powerful principle of love, unmingled with retaliation or revenge. Though he was once reviled, yet he reviled not again. His mind suffered no alteration—his affections, no change. What a perfect emblem of the great Saviour of sinners! How beautifully it sets forth, in all its parts, the forgiving spirit and the conduct of Jesus towards erring and dependent humanity!

But we have on hand another portion of history which will furnish us with another illustration of this subject. We allude to the case of Saul and David. On a certain occasion, Saul, in the most audacious manner, declared himself the enemy of David, and with a phalanx of three thousand chosen men of Israel, publicly sought his life. Numerous were the devices which he exercised for this purpose. But in the night, when the multitude lay concealed in the deep, dark cave of the rocks, that they might arise the following day refreshed, to pursue their bloody project, David, who was least expected, goes to the spot, and silently marches among them. Here they lay completely in his power. He went to Saul, who himself was helpless in slumber. But, let me ask, how did David put him under his feet? Did he take his life? Did he command his army to destroy the whole multitude before they departed from the place of their concealment? Most certainly not.

What renders this circumstance so conspicuous, is the fact, that David was a man of war. David undoubtedly found out, in the course of his experience, that to oppose enemies by enmity, was not the way to subdue their hatred. But that this was, in reality, what we have called it, a successful victory on the part of David, the expressions of Saul will fully show. Learning that his life had been valued and spared by him, whose very existence he had sought to terminate; he voluntarily breaks out in the following words—"Blessed, be thou, my son David. Return, my son David, for I will no more do thee harm, because my soul was precious in thy sight. Behold I have played the fool, and erred exceedingly." Thus Saul was convinced that David had defeated him, and yielded the battle without a murmur. This instance renders it evident, that such means are amply sufficient to accomplish the total defeat of all Christ's enemies, if he employs them in his station. They are fully adequate to this end. Through their influence, alone, can all enemies be subdued.

But there is one other portion of Scripture, which has an immediate application to this subject, and will serve to set it, perhaps, in a much clearer light. We introduce it, because it will carry our minds immediately to God; and by what it will teach us concerning him, we shall be enabled to explain more particularly and satisfactorily, how Jesus will put all enemies under his feet. On a particular occasion the Syrians made war with Israel, and adopted means, as they supposed, for carrying their destruction into effect. About this time Elisha, much celebrated for his marvellous inspiration, resided in Dothan, as related by the historian. The Syrians having learned this, and being unacquainted with the circumstances of the king of Israel, sent to the prophet for the purpose of acquiring some suitable information adapted to their object. But the prophet, instead of granting the information they required, looked to the highest interests of God and man, and prayed for divine interposition. Accordingly, God smote them with blindness. Here stood the bloodthirsty Syrians, powerless in the presence of Israel.—Without the least difficulty they might have drenched the earth with their gore. They might have turned upon them with all the fury of enemies, until they had effected their destruction. But how did God, by the mouth of the prophet, tell Israel to put the Syrians under their feet? Here follows the answer—"Thou shalt not smite them. Wouldst thou smite those whom thou hast taken captive with thy sword, and with thy bow? Set bread and water before them, that they may eat and drink, and go to their master!" And that the means thus adopted, were sufficient, is evident, from what follows.—"The band of Syria came no more in their land." Forever thereafter they dwelt in safety, and reposed unmolested under the vine and figtree of happiness.

To show that God, in accordance with this example, treats his enemies with kindness, we have only to look to our own experience. Nothing is more strongly substantiated in the universe, and no fact makes stronger appeals to our reason, than that God is impartially good—excepting and excluding no one, of any name or nation under heaven. Look at nature! How impartial and ample—how sufficient the dispensations of his munificence. The morning sun rises to manifest our heavenly Father's impartial and changeless love—sets to confirm its truth. We slumber, and enjoy it—we awake to know it. Nature is full of blessings for man! With the freest voice she calls upon all to share in the provisions of her bountiful table, and she calls not in vain; for her voice is obeyed by each living being, from the highest potentate on his diamond decked throne, to the meanest insect which creeps upon earth's low surface. The orient emblem of immortality, who rides in his golden chariot, in unclouded splendor through the magnificent horizon, pours out in inexhaustible profusion, upon the just and unjust, the radiant beams of terrestrial light, giving life to vegetation and fertility to the earth; maturing the fruits of our gardens, and ripening the harvest of our fields, to fill the mouths of the hungry with food and gladness. The gentle rains which descend with repeated fulness, to refresh the young spirit of the tender herb, as it points its way upward, manifests in the most visible manner, and proves by the most undeniable evidence, the glorious truth, "that God is kind to the evil and the unthankful." All these impartial dispensations of God's providence prove that God loves his enemies with a love as much superior to that of man, as he is greater and wiser than man.

Look then, at the gift of his Son. When all had gone out of the way, and come short of his glory by sinning against his equitable laws; and when even his chosen people had disregarded his ordinances, and service, to teach for doctrines the commandments of men—when the world, too, was, as it were, one mass of fell disorder and corruption, he sent his Son while they were yet sinners, not to condemn them, but to reconcile them to God; by whose grace he tasted death for every man, and gave himself to be a propitiation for the sins of the whole world. There is nothing like contingency and partiality in this. It proves that God, in a spiritual sense, is "good unto all." As an infinitely wise and immortal being, possessed of every other excellence, infinite and supreme, and without variableness or the shadow of turning, he worketh all things after the counsel of his own will, none possessing the power to stay the accomplishment of his plans and purposes.

Now, Jesus of Nazareth is the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person. In him are reflected all the qualities of the divine nature, even the uncaused benevolence of the Godhead. If, then, God deals with his enemies as we have showed above, and Jesus, his Son, is like him in every respect, we may ask, how will Jesus deal with his enemies in verifying the truth of the text? In other parts of our discourse, we have shown the character of his earthly reign—and from the unchangeability of his government, we have seen that he will not change his plan, and must therefore reign in the same spirit, and for the same purposes during every period, while he stands in that station.

We have showed that while upon earth, Jesus subdued his enemies by making them his friends. This was done by removing their enmity—by deeds of respect and kindness. And it is farther evident, that no true conception of the manner in which he will treat his foes hereafter, can be derived aside from what we know of his treatment of them while upon earth; consequently, every view which contradicts the spirit Jesus manifested while in the flesh, must be conjecture, and not reality. Let us refer, for proof, to a case in which Jesus exemplified his earthly conduct and precepts, after his death; and which is also proof positive of our general views. We allude to that of Saul, of Tarsus. What was Saul? He was a determined enemy to Christianity and its Founder. Having been brought up after the strictest sect, a Pharisee, his bitterness and opposition to every thing coming under the name of Christ, was almost without parallel. He verily thought himself justified, (so perverted was his understanding, and so corrupted his heart!) in the sight of God and man, when persecuting the followers of Jesus. How zealously was he affected in the extermination of that cause! Fired by the spirit of bigotry, he arrays all his forces against the meek reign of the Prince of peace; and, as if unsatisfied with a course of prudence and reason, "he breathes out threatenings and slaughter;" and with a military power marches towards Damascus to put them into execution. What next follows in the history of this foe to God? Does Jesus submit? does he yield to his senseless invective? Nay—Saul, himself, is defeated. He found himself unable to measure arms with God. But how did Jesus put him under his feet? Did he crush him beneath a falling tower, or overpower him by a host of mighty angels? Did he carry him to the shades of endless slavery, and oppression? No!—He poured out the irradiating beams of heavenly light, upon his benighted soul. In sweet, mild, and yet powerful language, he addresses him, "Saul! Saul! why persecutest thou me?" and while the guilty man could give no reason, conviction was carried home to his soul. He now beheld his duty. The voice of immortal love from heaven, had conquered his enmity. He left the feet of Gamaliel, and in humble submission bowed at the feet of Immanuel—became a faithful servant of the truth, and a zealous apostle of the grace of God.

Such is one among many instances of the effects of the love of Jesus, during the primitive ages of the Christian church. It made a friend of an enemy, and gave him joy in the embrace of love and goodness.

Produce an instance, where enemies were differently treated—making wretchedness the aim and end of the work, without any design to recover them to usefulness and happiness, and the argument will be shaken. But this can not be done. Taking this, therefore, as an example, we must come to the conclusion, that while Jesus reigns as mediator, and so long as there are foes to his name and religion, similar effects will follow the transaction of his official duties.

As the brilliant rays of the king of the skies, utterly banish the gloom of night from creation, and refresh impartially, by their vivifying influence, all space and seasons; so Jesus, by the life-giving spirit of his truth, will dissipate the clouds of moral gloom, and drive away from the hearts of humanity the last besetting sin—convert our doubts and fears into faith and love, and afford us such views of God's character, and men's immortal destination, as shall humble our minds, control our spirits, and afford us not only the pleasure of knowing the truth, but the unspeakable joy of obeying its precepts. And when Jesus shall have subdued all enemies unto himself, and have succeeded in transacting the business of his high and important station, then all enemies will be no more forever, internal enmity will give way for the peaceable fruits of righteousness—all men become the devoted servants of the Lord, and everlasting light prevail universally. All will then come off more than conquerors through him that loved them, and the Redeemer be crowned with honor divine. That this is the happy prospect which awaits the world, is evident; for Jesus must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet—even the last enemy is to be destroyed, which is death. The ransomed of the Lord while participating in the rich grace of their deliverance from sin, and while contemplating their everlasting security from all foes without, and enemies within, are to exclaim, "O! death where is thy sting, O! grave where is thy victory!" But no answer shall be heard—for the boaster shall be at silence. Then shall Jesus have completed the object of his mission, and finished his reign. Then will he resign up his mediatorial kingdom to the Father—become himself subject unto him—all nations, tongues and people, freed from sin, and death, shall assemble in one immortal choir above, to join in one everlasting anthem of praise—

"Forever to own,
That God, alone,
Is all in all!"— AMEN.

THE NIGHT SCENE.

BY MISS U. M. FELTON.

[Will the writer please excuse the delay of her article? It was not intentional. A. B. G.]

It is the solemn hour of night. Silence has hushed the busy multitude—wide o'er the earth she sways her sceptre, and reigns sole mistress of the midnight scene. Still is the voice of mirth and revelry, the joys of fortune, and the pangs of woe!

The laborer rests his weary limbs within his humble cot—the traveller, after wandering over hill and dale, espies at length a hospitable roof, blesses his host, and sinks to rests, unconscious where he is. The mourner's tears are dried; the deep-drawn sigh has ceased, save now and then, an involuntary heaving of the perturbed and anxious heart, visible, to the quick discerning eye of friendship, watchful to soothe every woe. The invalid finds a short relief from scorching fever—consumption's attenuated victim fancies himself, perchance, again in health, roving the verdant fields, climbing the mountain's top, and breathing the pure fragrance of the air. The worn out warrior rests on his armor—the voice of the sentinel, the neighing of the war horse impatient for the battle, disturb him not. He is alike regardless, whether to-morrow's sun rise in peace, or light the path of death. Pale with study, the sons of science hail the glad hour, blow out the lamp, and freed from its unhealthy vapor, from intricate reasonings and unexplored paths, find a short respite. The philosopher, who, a few hours since, engaged in explaining the general laws of nature; and the astronomer, who was but now unfolding the beauties of the celestial world, find no attraction so powerful as that of sleep; and amidst the whirl of planets, they repose in safety. The prisoner hears the sullen door turn on its hinges, and the retreating footsteps of his keeper; and amidst dire imprecations and the clank of chains, prepares to rest his aching head. A couch of down, adorned with gems, and surrounded by a guard, sustains the royal monarch before whom nations tremble. But not half so sweet his sleep, nor half so tranquil beats his pulse, as the poor slave, stretched on his bed of straw, or sailor boy sleeping in his swinging hammock, on the rocking wave.

All nature pauses. The brute creation, led by instinct, observes the general silence. The sun, great source of light and life, has sunk himself to rest in ocean's bed; while the moon, with borrowed lustre, forgets not earth, but over all creation spreads superior beauty—shines on the craggy mountain's top—lights the dark forest where sits the boding owl, and gilds the broad waters with her silvery hue. Grand and harmonious work, worthy of a God! Fit hour for contemplation! How exalting the thought, that while all nature lies buried in sleep's profound oblivion, its great Author never slumbers, but extends his watchful care over fallen man, alone unmindful of his glorious works. Transporting thought! Our Father watches over all, and although the night of death shall come, and for man no morn shall rise, or natural Spring again renew its bloom, yet beyond this changing scene, another Sun—the Sun of Righteousness, shall rise, before the splendor of whose beams the natural sun shall be shorn of its rays, and an eternal Spring shall bloom in regions of fadeless immortality!

RENUNCIATION OF PARTIALISM.

That every individual is entitled to the right of forming and cherishing opinions for himself, whatever those opinions may be, is a fact which no one will deny. Every person is endowed by his Creator, with a capacity to judge and think for himself, on all matters pertaining to his present and future felicity; and to restrict this privilege, is counteracting the design of that Being whose providence and excessive kindness has made accessible to us all things conducive to our present, as well as our future happiness. Common sense suggests the idea, that intellectual faculties for the exercise of reason, were not given to man to serve in silent subordination; and I am far from believing that an impartial being, whose only design in the creation of millions of rational creatures was their ultimate holiness and happiness, would, in the distribution of reason, the greatest blessing, deal with a lavish hand to a part, and sparingly to others, equally entitled to his beneficence by the relationship which they sustain to him. It is contrary to the character and disposition of a being who is infinite in goodness, and equitable in all his dealings to his creatures; and even if we admit it possible, it is unwarrantable to conclude, that the favored few are to prescribe rules of conduct and articles of faith for the more unfortunate. And that this destitution of the large share of reason and intelligence boasted of by others, should preclude them the right of thinking and acting for themselves, is too gross a violation of the laws of justice and humanity, to receive the sanction of any, possessing even a moderate share of what constitutes common sense.

I have often had occasion to lament that many professing to be the followers of the crucified Redeemer, forget the indubitable right every man has to his opinion, and the prevalence of that spirit, which actuates them to denounce all who refuse to subscribe to the principles they profess. It is this that incited me to inquire into the truth or fallacy of a doctrine, represented to be exceedingly pernicious in its influence, and as having a tendency to corrupt the morals of men, because there was no endless hell to restrain them from the indulgence of vice. Convinced that an error could not be successfully refuted without a knowledge of its pretended basis, I labored to qualify myself to oppose the doctrine I now delight to sustain. The result of my inquiry was a happy disappointment. While engaged in opposing what I supposed an egregious error, I first beheld its perfect accordance with Divine revelation, its virtuous tendency, and its comforting influence. Solemnly convinced of its truth, I felt it a duty to myself, to renounce the cheerless and ungrounded dogma of endless misery, and to embrace the soul-cheering doctrine of a world's salvation.

It is true, that few doctrines are more subject to the slander of vile and seditious persons, than Universalism; and yet, perhaps none have greater claims to prosperity. The progress of a doctrine which truth and duty bear up, is not impeded by the ranting of bigoted and prejudiced individuals, and surely, if it remains buoyant when exposed to the investigation of the profound divines who constitute the professors of some theological institutions, it at least favors the idea that it is beyond refutation. Let it not, however, be supposed that the result of controversies and disputations, is the criterion by which I regulate my opinions; for though it affords strong presumptive evidence as to the truth or falsity of a doctrine, the reasons forming the basis on which my opinions are founded, are far more satisfactory to me. Twenty years include every transaction of my life, all of which have been spent in a vicinity noted for the prevalence of zealous adherents to the demoralizing doctrine of endless punishment. To many of those, though now differing widely from them in sentiment, I am indebted for their moral precepts and friendly admonitions in the early part of my life; yet at the same time, duty to myself forbids, that I should so far restrain the dictates of truth, as to withhold the declaration, that it not unfrequently a greater deficiency in morality than is tolerated by the weakness of human nature, was manifested. Such are the causes which induced me to doubt the validity of their professions, (though exhibiting high claims to assurances of Divine favor,) which finally terminated in an utter rejection of the belief that a portion of mankind were created to suffer endless woe. If I am asked why I have embraced Universalism, my reply is, it is the result of a candid investigation of the Scriptures, and a serious attention to the tenets it inculcates; and solemnly convicted of its Divine origin, its tendency to inspire the illiberal with charity, the wavering with confidence, and the desponding with hope, I point all to its exquisite beauties.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER V.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

ON READING.

That is a most extraordinary art, reader, by which I am now communicating my thoughts to you, although perhaps a thousand miles intervene between us, with as much ease and accuracy, as though you were in my immediate presence.—This operation, to one who is a stranger to the method of its performance, would appear the work of supernatural agents. A late writer, in describing the inhabitants of one of the remote islands of the Pacific Ocean, states that they had no conception of the arts of writing or reading. When informed that one person can communicate his thoughts to another, without voice, or gesture, or without being in his presence, they utterly discredited the assertion. But after repeated experiments, becoming fully satisfied of its truth, yet viewing it as a work transcending all human power, they alleged that it must have been accomplished by necromancy.

The art of communicating ideas by inscribing visible characters, is of very ancient date. In its first stage, it consisted merely in drawing a rough sketch or outline of the object, in regard to which the communication was made. From this state the art was advanced to the use of more systemized hieroglyphics; and from these, gradually improved to our present system of writing. Previous to the invention of the art of printing, books were multiplied only by the pen—a work so laborious and slow, as to cause them to be few in number, and of immense value. So scarce were books, that ambassadors were once expressly sent from France to Rome, to obtain a copy of Cicero's Orations, and Quintilian's Institutes. The library of the Bishop of Winchester, in 1494, contained but parts of seventeen books; and on his borrowing a copy of the Scriptures from the neighboring convent St. Swithin, he had to give a heavy bond, drawn up with great solemnity, that he would return it uninjured. If any one gave a book to a convent or monastery, it was supposed to confer everlasting salvation upon him. Previous to the year 1300, the library of Oxford University consisted only of a few tracts, which were carefully locked in a small chest, or else chained, lest they should be carried away.

There are two prominent objects in reading, viz:—amusement, and the acquisition of valuable knowledge. These, if possible, should be combined into one. No volume should be perused for amusement, which does not instruct as well as delight. And all publications of an instructive character, will amuse and please the mind, when read with a proper thirst for its lessons of wisdom. It should be the desire of every youth, of both sexes, to acquire a habit, or taste for reading. This habit will soon become one of the highest sources of enjoyment. But it must be acquired young. If it is not established before the age of twenty-five or thirty, the probability is, that it will not be at all; and the individual in this condition, will be cut off from one of the most valuable sources of knowledge and improvement. You should read, not only for the pleasure which it affords you, but to obtain practical information, and to enlarge and enlighten your views on those subjects intimately connected with your welfare, and the interests of your race. You should read to “multiply your ideas, correct your errors, erase your prejudices, purify your principles, and that you may settle down on the everlasting foundation of truth, in all things.”

A well established habit of reading, bestows benefits innumerable. The young lady or gentleman possessing this habit, gives fair promise of future respectability and usefulness. There is little reason to apprehend that they will become profligate or vicious. Examine the victims of crime—the inmates of prisons—and, as a general rule, it will be discovered, that in youth they were averse to reading. In perusing useful publications, the youthful mind is elevated above the influence of vicious passions, and is absolved from their contaminations.

Through the medium of books, you can live, as it were, in all past ages. You can enter the presence of the wise and the great of antiquity—you can listen to their lessons of instruction—treasure up the fruits of their research and experience, and thus make them your immediate instructors. In books you have at your disposal the history of your race. You can range over its ample extent—beholding here, the corroding influence of wealth without just principles—there, the fruits of blind rashness—and every where, the unavoidable evils flowing from ignorance and sin, and the superior advantages of knowledge and virtue. As the bee extracts honey from objects nauseous and poisonous; so can the industrious reader obtain lessons of useful wisdom, from the errors and imperfections of those who figure on the historic page.

The reader, while sitting by his own fireside, becomes a traveller in foreign lands. He participates in much of the enjoyment of the tourist, without experiencing any of his difficulties and dangers. He thus obtains an acquaintance with the condition, manners and customs of distant nations; and his mind becomes enlarged by contemplating the wide diversities of laws, of morals, of religions and literature. He is also enabled to compare the numerous privileges and advantages, which he enjoys in this happy land, with those possessed by other nations—and he led the more sensibly to appreciate the immense value of our system of government, and the importance of striving to purify and perpetuate it.

Reading fills up many leisure hours, which would probably be otherwise less profitably occupied. When the labor or business of the day is closed, the mind relaxes and seeks for amusement. These are dangerous hours to the young. Then temptations put on their most fascinating garbs; and unless guarded against by some counter power—some repelling force—will lead to every species of evil. These critical seasons test the character, and reveal the prospects of the young. Those youth who have established the habit of reading, in these times of leisure, turn as naturally and readily to their books for amusement, as do the profligate, to scenes of infamy and vice. And reading not only thus saves from forming sinful habits, but becomes the means of laying up stores of useful information, to be turned to profitable account in after years. The young, in this way, can deposit treasures in a “Savings Bank,” that will yield a compound interest to their owner. In what manner can youth of either sex, pass an evening more usefully, than in perusing some entertaining and valuable publication, for their own edification and that of the family circle? The habit of reading can become so deeply settled, as to form the controlling desire of the mind. So firmly was this habit established in Brutus, that on the eve of the battle of Pharsalia, which it was foreseen would decide the fate of the Roman dominions, he was found calmly reading in his tent, and with his pen taking notes from his author. And Petrarch, the great poet, if he did not read and write during the day, was very unhappy.

But as the manner of reading, and the selection of books for perusal, are what renders the habit most useful and important, and would, if properly treated, swell this chapter beyond its proper length, I will here close the chapter, and resume the subject in my next.

A SKETCH.

BY MRS. S. L. WHISTON.

It was on the evening of a cold winter's day, the last in the month of December, 183—. Another year had told its tale of disappointed hopes and unlooked for blessings; and a new one, with the usual promises of happiness, was fast approaching. I was seated in the comfortable little parlor of my friend B., with his amiable and interesting family. A cheerful fire burned on the hearth;

the father sat with one hand resting on a volume he had been perusing, while the other supported his venerable forehead as if in deep thought—the mother was busily employed with some useful needlework—the eldest daughter, a beautiful girl of fifteen, was engaged in finishing something which she intended as new-years presents for the younger members of the family; while a little boy of five, who had been permitted to sit up on that evening after his usual hour of retiring, was amusing himself with a favorite cat. Every thing around them seemed to have an air of comfort; and to a casual observer, nothing appeared wanting to make them happy. But the sudden start at the sound of a vehicle approaching, and the deep drawn sigh and looks of disappointment when it passed the house, told that yet another was wanting to complete the happiness of that family circle. “I wonder,” said Mary, (the daughter before alluded to,) “why James does not come; I am afraid he has forgotten his promise to spend new-year's day at home.” “I thought, mother,” said little Henry, “you said he would be here by dark and it is a long time since it was night.” “I do not think,” replied the anxious mother, “that he has forgotten his promise; I am afraid he is ill, or some accident has happened to him.” “I think,” said Mr. B., “there is no doubt but he will come—it is not very late, and he may have been detained—we need not be alarmed as yet.” But a slight tremor in his voice, betrayed the want of that confidence which he endeavored to impart to others. At last a sleigh was driven to the door—all eyes were in an instant directed towards it—it stopped—“Tis he!” burst at once from every lip, and in a moment more the object of their solicitude was locked in the arms of the affectionate mother. Then succeeded kind inquiries, and remarks on his improved appearance, etc.—all was joy and rejoicing. Their happiness was now complete.

After retiring to bed, while meditating on the happiness to which I had been a witness, I was lost in a kind of reverie. Methought I was transported to the abodes of celestial bliss, and that I beheld the Father of mankind seated on the throne of glory, surrounded by angels and archangels—Jesus on his right, with outstretched arms, ready to receive the multitudes that were coming to their final home to be forever with their God. Silence reigned around.

Oh, 'twas a beautiful sight! to behold millions and millions of glorified spirits, purged from the dross and corruption of sin, and made pure in the blood of the Lamb—the smile of Infinite benevolence beaming on all alike, and penetrating the recesses of every heart! But something yet remained to render their happiness complete—even Jesus was not satisfied—for there was one wanderer who was not brought home. Presently he entered. “And now,” said He who tasted death for every man, as he prostrated himself at the feet of his Father, “I have seen of the ‘travail of my soul,’ and am satisfied—into Thy hands I resign all which Thou hast given me, that Thou mayst be ‘all in all.’” When a sudden brightness, exceeding in splendor the glory of the mid-day sun, shone from the throne of God, the angels struck the chords of their golden harps, and all sang, as with one voice, the song of Moses and the Lamb, Hallelujah! for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth!!

HEBREWS IX: 27.

BY REV. W. S. BALCH.

“And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment.”

Whoever will read this text in this connexion, will perceive at once that the apostle is laboring to show the correspondence that existed between the types and symbols of the Old Testament, and the realities of the New, keeping in view the pre-eminence of the latter. In the last verse of the 6th chapter, he introduces the order of Christ's priesthood. In the 7th, he proceeds to show that the Scriptures pointed out a new priesthood after the order of Melchisedec and not after Aaron; and that the ministry of Jesus was in accordance with the character of that to be established in the place of the law. In the 8th, he introduces the two covenants, and shows wherein the new is better than the old—because it dispenses endless and universal blessings. In the 9th, he contrasts the earthly with the heavenly—the external forms and legal services with the spiritual and moral reformation of the Gospel. The priest daily offered sacrifices for the sins of others, but “once every year he went into the holiest of all, not without blood, which he offered for himself, and for the errors of the people.” By this it was signified that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest. But Jesus, the spiritual and merciful high Priest, exhibited the true and living way, entering into heaven itself, having offered himself once for all. See vii: 27, ix: 7-15, and x: 10-14.

The offering of sacrifices, and the sprinkling of the blood, prefigured the death of Christ; and the priest standing as the representative, typically died in the sacrifices he offered. But the institution was not perfect, inasmuch as he entered into the earthly tabernacle with the blood of others; but Jesus entered into heaven itself, with his own blood. When the high priest went into the tabernacle, he bore on his bosom the breast-plate of judgment. See Ex. xxv: et seq., and Lev. xvi: 16. If the offering was accepted, he came out bearing the judgment rendered, while all the people raised the shout of joy and gladness. In reference to this important part of the service, upon which the whole argument and force of the figure was to turn, the apostle uses the text at the head of this article, and the one that follows. “And as it is appointed unto men [the priests] once to die, [in their sacrifices] and after this the judgment, so Christ was once offered that he might bear the sins of many, and unto them that look for him he will appear the second time without sin unto salvation.”

This passage which has so often been torn out of its connexion by the unsparing bigotry and prejudice of Limitarians, is tied in its place by the strong connective “And”—and the comparatives “as” and “so.” “And as” in the one case, “so” in the other. Of those perverters of the apostle’s argument, we might ask the following questions: What similarity is there between the natural death of one man or all men, and the sacrificial death of Christ? Would it be logical to carry on the comparison of the priesthood and sacrifices, till arrived at the most critical point on which the whole was to turn, and then fly off in a tangent and talk about the natural death of men? It would be like a man giving a relation of the manner of sowing and harvesting rice in the southern States, and in the midst of the relation, say a few words about Peter the Great, and then return to tell how it was prepared for use—“And as” Peter the Great was once a ship carpenter, and after this Emperor of Russia, “so” they prepare rice in South Carolina! What jargon! unintelligible nonsense! Equal violence is done to the passage under consideration by the construction sometimes put upon it.

Probably one great cause of the misunderstanding of this text, has arisen from the misplacing of a small word by our translators. Small words, or words misapplied, frequently affect the meaning very essentially. Whoever will consult the Greek Testament will find that there is a definite article before men, and none before judgment. The text should read thus. “And as it is appointed unto the men once to die, and after this, judgment, so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many,” etc. This makes it perfectly plain. While the men are definitely pointed out, the judgment is left indefinite, as it should result from the offering that was made, in approval or rejection.

DIALOGUE.—THE DEVIL’S DESTRUCTION.

BY BOGARTUS HORNAR.

Scene I.—A private residence.—Persons—A Universalist husband, and his Methodist wife. The latter dressed, as if to go abroad.

U. H. Where are you going this evening, wife?
M. W. You surely forget—this is the evening we have preaching and class-meeting. Will you not accompany me?

U. H. I would, with pleasure, but you remain always in class, and I would then have to return home without you.

M. W. By no means, husband—you can also remain, if you will but consent to be questioned by the preacher, and answer him civilly, as the rest do.

U. H. If that is all, I will go.

Scene 2.—The Class-Meeting.

Methodist Preacher. (To M. W.) Well, sister, and what has the Lord done for you, since our last meeting?

M. W. (Sobbing.) Oh—h! I have been often beset by the great enemy of souls; but have always been helped off more than conqueror. Yet am I sorely tried for resignation, when I look on the conditions of those near and dear to me, who are yet out of the ark of safety! Oh, righteous God! could Satan only be bound, or utterly destroyed; that sinners might be released from his influence—saints, from his temptations—Heaven, from his “opposing rage”—and all the universe rejoice together in peace and glory!

All. A-men!—God grant it!—A-men!

M. P. That’s right, sister! pray on!—(To U. H., who, all this time appears highly elated with great joy.) And, friend, what has the Lord done for your poor soul!—(then, in a quick, stern tone) you appear to be very happy, Sir!

U. H. And so I am, Sir—for as I was coming here with my wife, this evening, I picked up the leaf of an old book, and find most glorious news on it! I hope they are true! Here it is.

M. P. That—why that’s a leaf of the New Testament—the holy word of that Being who can not err or lie.

U. H. Well I am very glad you think it is true; for just hear what glorious news it discloses!—(Reads from Hebrews ii: 14, 15.) “Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he (Jesus) also himself likewise took part of the same: that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the DEVIL; and deliver them who, through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage.” There, Sir,—is not that glorious news? The devil, the arch enemy of God and man, is to be destroyed at last! Then “sinners will be released from his influence—saints, from his temptations, and Heaven from his ‘opposing rage.’” Oh, then the whole universe will rejoice together in peace and glory! Oh, what glorious news! Praise God—praise God for it!

M. P. (Angrily.) Stop your noise, will you! You will find the devil last long enough for you, in spite of your Universalist stuff—so, begone out of meeting!—The class is dismissed.

(The meeting breaks up in shame and confusion—the Universalist rejoicing, the Methodists groaning in fear that Methodism may prove false, and the devil be destroyed.)

ORIGINAL ANECDOTE.

A Baptist clergyman, at a protracted meeting, talked boldly about facing opposition, reproach and persecution. “I expect these things—the Christian always meets them—but I care not for them—I know not what the fear of man is—I care not what mortals can do to me—I fear not the face of clay.” Suddenly dropping his tone from that of the bully and braggadocio, to that of the culprit and coward, he added—“But I fear God! Yes I fear God! I never think of him without dread and trembling!”

A singular, shrewd and honest man, who was present, observed after meeting, that he didn’t wonder that Elder — was so afraid of God, “for,” said he, “if the Elder had spoken of me the many hard things he has said of God during the past week, I would certainly punish him the first time I met him!” 1. 3. 5.

AN INQUIRY.

Some Christians believe that the Heathen who hear not of Christ will be saved, and that many in Christian countries, who hear the Gospel will be lost. Is not this contrary to the declaration of the Saviour as recorded in John iii: 17?

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

UTICA, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1837.

UNIVERSALISM PLEASING TO THE CARNAL MIND.

How often has the charge been gravely made, and pertinaciously persisted in, and reiterated, that Universalism is a doctrine peculiarly congenial to the corrupt heart of man, and pleasing to the carnal mind, which is enmity against God! How many times has this charge been urged from the pulpit and the press; and by how many, and how sincerely, is it yet believed! Yet by how few, comparatively, is the subject critically examined and carefully investigated. The same class of people who urge this charge against us, also urge and zealously maintain that “mankind are naturally depraved and totally corrupted in all the faculties and parts of soul and body”—that human nature is wholly inclined to all that is bad, and wholly opposed to all that is good.

It seems, however, never once to have occurred to these sage reasoners and devout dogmatizers, that allowing these two propositions to be true, mankind, generally—nay, almost universally, would run naturally and directly into Universalism. If they are all by nature totally depraved and inclined to every thing that is evil and corrupt, and this doctrine is so entirely congenial to the carnal mind and corrupt nature of man, it would follow, as a matter of course, that all men would naturally incline to Universalism. But is such the fact? No; by no means, if the generally avowed sentiments of mankind are to be taken as the criterion of their natural inclination. Some avow their preference for Paganism, some for Mahomedanism, some for Catholicism, some for Calvinism, some for Arminianism, some for Deism and some for Atheism. Whether all these avowals are the result of the natural inclinations of men, or are occasioned by the circumstances of birth and education, it is not necessary to inquire at this time—it is sufficient for us to know that none of these numerous isms is Universalism; and that the proportion is but small, of this vast corrupt family of human nature, that avows its belief in the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.”

Again, we inquire what there is in Universalism which is so congenial to the corrupt and carnal mind? Is it the fact, that it teaches that God is infinitely and changelessly good to all, and his tender mercies over all his works? Is it, that it teaches its votaries to imitate the God they worship, by loving their enemies, blessing those that curse them, and doing good to all men as they have opportunity? And are these the principles on which the wicked and corrupt of our race, have acted and manifested their wickedness in all past ages of the world? Was it on this principle that the Pharisees acted, when they murmured against Jesus because he possessed so philanthropic a spirit as to receive publicans and sinners, and eat with them? Was it because of their universal benevolence to all men, or their faith in God's universal benevolence that they laid burdens on men's shoulders grievous to be borne, and which they would not move with one of their fingers—and that they finally put to an ignominious death the innocent Son of God? Was it their strong attachment to Universalism that led to the perpetration of all these crimes? Were the early persecutors of the Christians, Universalists? and was it this peculiar sentiment that led them to the perpetration of all the cruel enormities they committed? Was it Universalism (i. e., the conviction that God was the universal Father, and Friend, and Saviour of all men, and that they were bound to be universally benevolent, kind and impartial to all men, like the God they worshipped,) that led Nero and Caligula, to the bloody deeds they perpetrated? Was it Universalism that inspired the Popes of Rome to issue their bulls and anathemas against Luther and his coadjutors in the reformation, and against all heretics in all ages? Was it Universalism that led John Calvin to bring the innocent Servetus to the stake? Was it Universalism that urged on the several monarchs of the British empire, successively to wage wars of extermination against Catholics and Protestants, each in their turn?—that kindled the fires of Smithfield?—that drove our forefathers from the shores of old England to the solitary wilds of America? In short, was it Universalism that waded those same pious forefathers of ours to banish honest Baptists from their colony, hang conscientious Quakers, and put to death so many innocent men and women as they did, under the pretence of their being witches and wizards?

Here are questions which we would thank our accusers to solve, whenever they make the assertion that Universalism leads to all manner of crimes, and is perfectly congenial with carnal and corrupt minds. Now we affirm that Universalism, so far from being congenial with the carnal mind, is of all doctrines most abhorred and hated by the carnal and corrupt mind: and, on the other hand, that of all doctrines in the world, this is most congenial with a truly spiritual and heavenly mind? Will not all allow, at once, that the Scribes and Pharisees of our Saviour's time, were very wicked, corrupt, and carnal minded?—that they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God?—that they were like whitened sepulchres, inwardly full of all manner of corruption? Well what was one of the principle objections they made to Jesus? Why, that he was too benevolent, too liberal, too condescending, too gracious and compassionate to those they were pleased to call publicans and sinners. Had Jesus confined his grace, his mercy, and his attentions exclusively to them, and sentenced the publicans and sinners to endless woe, the proud and haughty Scribes and Pharisees would, no doubt, have been well pleased with him. But their eye was evil because he was good. (Matt. xx: 15.) They were displeased that his grace was extended to others as well as themselves. They could not brook the idea, that they who had, in their esteem, borne the heat and burden of the day, should fare no better than others who should come in at the eleventh hour. It was too humiliating to their pride, too mortifying to their vanity, that others should be made equal with them. The elder brother in the parable murmured, not because he was not invited to partake of the fatted calf, but because his younger brother was permitted to taste it. And this is the ground on which some of the proudest and wickedest men in creation strenuously oppose the doctrine of universal salvation—it is not at all congenial to their taste.

But how is it with the truly heavenly and spiritually minded? Every such individual prays most fervently that the doctrine may prove true. It is the first warm and gushing prayer and fervent desire of every newborn child of grace, that God would have mercy on a world of sinners, and save them from blindness, sin and death. It is the last fervent ejaculation of the dying saint, as his spirit is about to wing its way to the unseen world. The doctrine truly is a pleasing doctrine, not to the carnal, but to the spiritual mind. It is pleasing to God, to Christ, to angels and to saints. "For it pleased the Father that in Christ should all fulness dwell; and having made peace through the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things to himself; by him, I say, whether they be things on earth or things in heaven." Col. i: 19, 20. "The Father loveth the Son and hath given all things into his hands." And Jesus says, "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out. For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." Now this being the express will and purpose of God in sending his Son into the world, let us inquire whether the Son performs his work in such a manner as to satisfy the Father. That he does, is testified directly by the Father, who declares to the world, "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." And furthermore, he testifies by his inspired prophet, that Christ "shall not fail nor be discouraged," but "the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand," Thus we see the doctrine must be pleasing to God and to Christ. And that it shall be pleasing to saints and angels will appear obvious, when we are assured that "all things shall be subdued unto Christ"—that "God shall be all in all"—and that finally "every creature in heaven, and earth, under the earth," etc., shall unite in the song, "Blessing and honor, and glory and power, be unto him that sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." D. S.

TOO GENEROUS.

Our feelings have been sensibly touched by the generosity of one of our best and most steady correspondents—personally an entire stranger to us, and one who has always refused compensation of any kind for his great and valuable services. We cannot avail ourselves of it—it would be ungenerous in us to do so—at least we think it would—but we mention it to show that there are such men in the world—an honor to our kind. He offers the sum of ten dollars yearly to aid in raising the sum of one hundred dollars as a yearly fund to be distributed in prizes for tales and essays to be published in the Magazine and Advocate—on condition that nine others will "go and do likewise."

While on the subject, I will only add, that our late disappointment has considerably discouraged us in the present mode of procuring prize articles; especially as we have been hastily censured by one who should at least have considered, that we are as much bound by, and as little accountable for, the decision of the committee as any of the candidates are. We have done our best, and really feel that we deserve something better than ill-judged censure for it—for what we have done, as well as for what we meant to do but could not. Whether we shall offer premiums for tales and essays in favor of Universalism, another year, or not, we can not now say—time must determine. But I have long thought of offering a premium for an article against Universalism which shall be pronounced good and worthy of attention by a committee of clergymen of denominations holding to the opposite sentiment. The only difficulty is, the procuring of the committee. Of one thing our subscribers may rest assured, all we can do, will be done to render our paper acceptable to them, and useful to the cause in which we are engaged.

A. B. G.

* * * Mrs. Burr and Hanscom will accept our thanks for their respective pamphlets. The first is a full treasury of arguments for Universalism; and the latter a complete refutation of Elder Cilley's handbill, of which some one was obliging enough to send us a copy—probably one of Elder C.'s friends. We thank the sender, as, by comparing the two, we are enabled the better to understand the refutation.

A. B. G.

2 THESSALONIANS 1: 6-9.

"Seeing it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you; and to you, who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ: who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power."

Some of our readers are excluded from facilities for procuring books and pamphlets explanatory of passages that are frequently quoted in proof of the doctrine of endless misery. For their sakes, I notice briefly, (briefly for the sake of those to whom such explanations are a "thrice told tale,") such portions as they offer for our solution, and afford them clues by which they themselves may be guided into the proper meaning. Such a passage is the one before us.

Notice, then, that the tribulation which is come upon "them that trouble you," and the "rest" to be enjoyed by those "who are troubled" were to take place at the same time. This time was to be "when the Lord Jesus" was "revealed from heaven."

1. Who troubled the church in Thessalonica? Though the Christians were troubled by their own countrymen, yet these were but agents in the hands of others. By referring to Acts xvii: 5-10, it will be seen that the prime movers of all the persecutions, were the persecuting Jews.

2. When was the Lord to be revealed from heaven? By referring to Matt. xvi: 27, 28; and xxiv: 30, 34, with the parallel and similar passages, the answer will be—at the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish polity, when these persecuting Jews would be brought into total disrepute, be dispersed among all nations, and have no more power to persecute.

3. What is the punishment described in verse 9? The "everlasting destruction" is the destruction of the Jews as a people and a nation—in which latter sense it yet endures, and will endure indefinitely, which is all the word everlasting means, added to the meaning of continuity. "From the presence of the Lord," etc., signifies from the temple, where God especially was present—from Jerusalem, the city of that temple—from the land of Judea—in all which places he especially manifested his presence and "the glory of his power," by revelations, prophecies, miracles, etc. See Lev. xxii: 3; 2 Kings xiii: 23; and xxiv: 20; 2 Chron. xx: 9; and Jonah i: 3, 10.

The Jews were thus cast out, and destroyed; and they yet are to this day. The "rest" for the Christians was less brief, and is not called "everlasting." If these hints are insufficient, more will be added when called for.

UTICA BEREAN INSTITUTE.

For the information of similar associations, I notice the semi-annual election of this Institute, which was held on Tuesday evening, the 7th inst., when the following persons were chosen its officers for the ensuing six months. Silas Beebe, Jr., President; O. Hutchinson, Vice President; George L. Platt, Recording Secretary; Rev. D. Skinner, Corresponding Secretary; O. Marshall, Treasurer; Nelson C. Powers, Librarian; Dr. J. P. Newland, A. F. Culver, and the writer, Directors. The lectures, essays and debates have, thus far, created considerable interest, brought forward, from their timidity and diffidence, several young persons to the manifestation of much talent and information, and have been well and usefully attended. The library contains about one hundred and forty volumes, and will soon be further enlarged. The books are much read, by the younger members especially. I mention this fact in the hope that some of our friends who have books which they can spare, will send them to the library, as a loan or a gift—for they will then do good to many, while now, probably, they are but of little use even to their owners. In conclusion, I would add, that this society has had, as is generally believed, a visibly improving effect on its members, rendering them more attentive to mental improvement, and to their general pursuits, conversation, etc. It is also believed that it has somewhat increased the knowledge and extension of religious truth among those who attend as mere spectators.

The meetings are held every Tuesday evening, in the north room in the basement story of the Universalist meeting-house; and the exercises consist of lectures and essays on various subjects, literary, moral, religious and scientific, on one evening; (beginning next Tuesday evening;) and in the discussion of some question on the next evening—and so on, alternately.

MINIATURE LEXICON.

A friend lately made me a present of a most beautiful dictionary, entitled "The Reticule and Pocket Companion; or Miniature Lexicon of the English language, by Lyman Cobb." New-York: Harper and brothers, publishers. It is beautifully bound in watered silk, gilt edged and lettered—and more beautifully printed in a very neat, fine, yet perfectly legible type—each page surrounded with sage proverbs and mottoes, or specimens of false syntax, enclosed in rules—on a fair, fine paper, and contains all the words in our language, except perhaps some of the most common derivatives! The definitions are plain and concise, and amply sufficient for all purposes, for which such a reticule companion would be resorted to. On the whole, it is one of the neatest specimens of the typographical art, I have ever seen, and would be one of the most beautiful presents that could be made to a lady or gentleman.

The work is one inch thick—its pages, excepting margins, are one inch and six-tenths wide by two inches and nine-tenths long. Deducing rules, mottoes, definitions, and other additional matter, and it would follow that all the words in the English language might be legibly printed in a book containing but very little more than one cubic inch!—and all these, again, could be reduced down to the twenty-six letters of the alphabet! From such minute materials, what lofty piles of ponderous octavos, quartos and folios have been reared—to be forgotten.

A. B. G.

LIBERAL DONATION.

With great heartfelt joy I acknowledge the receipt of ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS, to be distributed as follows:—Fifty dollars to the society for the relief of the widows and orphans of deceased Universalist clergymen, of the Central Association—and the remaining fifty dollars for specified purposes equally charitable and praiseworthy. The truly benevolent donors will accept my thanks for making me the dispenser of their bounties—an office most grateful to my feelings, and gratifying to my pride. They choose to remain unknown, and that, and all their other requests, shall be law unto me. God bless them!

The donation to the society, will be paid over to Br. Skinner, the Treasurer, on his return from Auburn—that for other purposes will be employed as directed, as soon as I can find a method of employing it. A. B. G.

APOLOGY.

We have had much to apologize for, but disliking the business, have suffered it to pass by. Our correspondents have supplied us so scantily, in general, as to leave us but little choice in selections from what was furnished, and to keep us from preparing matter ahead, so as to enable us to use our occasional leisure moments to proper advantage. But it is not of our labors in this respect that we would apologize now—it is of the appearance of our paper. The paper with which we have been lately furnished, and which we had to use, for the want of better, has been such as to render it almost impossible to make a good impression on it. We have done all we could to remedy the evil, and have to regret that our efforts were not more availing. The paper maker is now engaged in a large supply for us, which we hope will in some degree atone for the past, and long render unnecessary any painful apology for a similar defect.

A. B. G.

THE VALUE OF THIS PAPER.

To show how differently different persons estimate the same work, I would remark that some of our subscribers in this State, who can pay in advance and therefore get the paper for one dollar and fifty cents, and to whom the postage does not exceed fifty-two cents a year, complain of its high price—and especially if they delay the payment: till after three months, or the year, and have to pay two dollars, or two dollars and fifty cents beside the postage, do they complain of its great cost. How different is the language of others! We have just received a letter from an esteemed and active agent at Chippewa, U. C., who says they now pay four cents postage on each of our papers—making two dollars and eight cents for postage alone. This, with the advance price of the paper, causes it to cost them three dollars and fifty eight cents per annum, for each copy! Yet they cheerfully subscribe for it—our list there has increased considerably—and he says of our subscribers, "Those who have commenced taking your paper here, are well pleased with it, and say they would not be deprived of it for twice the amount it costs them." Well done—if each Universalist who takes or who should take our paper could but be made to believe that, by taking the Magazine and Advocate, they were receiving the value of seven dollars and sixteen cents for their two dollars and two cents, (or out of the State, for their two dollars and twenty-eight cents,) whew! what a steady, staunch, large and well paying list we would soon have—what essays and disquisitions could we procure by hiring correspondents—what paper—what typography—in short, what a paper we could afford to publish!

But, Query—Could not the postage be lessened to our Chippewa friends by having their papers sent to Niagara? As to sums less than five dollars, Br. W. can retain them in his hands till he gets enough to remit, or a private opportunity. Money paid to him is the same as if paid to us.

A. B. G.

Two brief addresses delivered before the Clinton Liberal Institute, will appear as soon as we can find room for them on our last page. Two articles by Br. Sudler, and Elder Whiche's letter will appear as soon as convenient. They are long articles, or they would have appeared sometime ago. We are sadly off for brief articles—pith, point and brevity, on a proper subject, will insure almost any writer, a good reception by us and our readers.

A. B. G.

Will our friends study brevity in obituary notices? They are most numerous at this season when we have least room for them, and generally are longer than usual. Hence, either delay in their appearance, or the necessity of rewriting them when we have least time to do so.

RESTITUTION HYMN.—Can any one send us the music to the words, "Come then, O my soul, meditate on that day," etc.? If with bass and second, so much the better. We design republishing the hymn, and probably can add the music, in this paper.

HYMN TO NATURE.

Translated from the German.

BY MRS. AUKORA B. THORNG.

Holy Nature, kind and true,
Thy footsteps let me pursue!
Lead me with thy own dear hand,
As a child in leading band!

When fatigued and care-oppress'd,
Let me sink upon thy breast;
There breathe heaven's own pure air,
Resting on thy bosom fair.

Oh, how blest with thee am I,
For whom I heave affection's sigh!
Thy footsteps let me pursue,
Holy Nature, kind and true!

THE MIND OF MAN.

How little is the mind known or considered! That all, of which man permanently is—the inward being, the divine energy, the immortal thought, the boundless capacity, the infinite aspiration—how few value this, this wonderful mind, for what it is worth! How few see it—that brother mind—in others; see it in all the forms of splendor and wretchedness alike; see it, though fenced around with all the artificial distinctions of society; see it, through the rags with which poverty has clothed it, beneath the crushing burdens of life, amidst the close pressure of worldly troubles, wants and sorrows; see it, and acknowledge and cheer it in that humble lot, and feel that the nobility of the earth, that the commencing glory of heaven is there! Nor is this the worst, nor the strongest view of the case. Men do not feel the worth of their own minds. They are very proud, perhaps; they are proud of their possessions; they are proud of their minds, it may be, as distinguishing them; but the intrinsic, the inward, the infinite worth of their own minds they do not perceive. How many a man is there who would feel, if he were introduced into some magnificent palace, and were led through a succession of splendid apartments, filled with rich and gorgeous furniture—would feel, I say, as if he, lofty, immortal being as he is, were but an ordinary thing amidst the tinsel show around him; or would feel as if he were a mere ordinary being, for the perishing glare of things, amidst which he walked! How many a man, who, as he passed along the wayside, saw the chariot of wealth rolling by him, would forget the intrinsic and eternal dignity of his own mind, in a poor, degrading envy of that vain pageant—would feel himself to be an humble creature, because, not in mind, but in mensuration, he was not quite so high! And so long as this is the case, do you believe that men understand their own minds, that they know what they possess within them? How many, in fact, feel as if that inward being, that mind were respectable, chiefly because their bodies lean on silken couches, and are fed with costly luxuries? How many respect themselves and look for respect from others, in proportion as they grow more rich, and live more splendidly, not more wisely, and fare more sumptuously every day! Surely it is not strange, while all this is true, that men should be more attracted by objects of sense and appetite, than by miracles of wisdom and love. And it is not strange that the spiritual riches which man is exhorted to seek, are represented in Scripture as "hid treasures;" for they are indeed hidden in the depths of the soul—hidden, covered up, with worldly gains, and pomps, and vanities. It is not strange that the kingdom of heaven, that kingdom which is within, is represented as a treasure buried in a field; the flowers bloom and the long grass waves there, and men pass by and say it is beautiful; but this very beauty, this very luxuriance conceals the treasure. And so it is in this life, that luxury and show, fashion and outward beauty, worldly pursuits and possessions, attract the eyes of men, and they know not the treasure that is hidden in every human soul.

Yes, the treasure—and the treasure that is in every soul. The difference that exists among men is not so much in their nature, not so much in their intrinsic power, as in the power of communication. To some it is given to embody and embody their thoughts; but all men, more or less, feel those thoughts. The very glory of genius, the very rapture of piety, when rightly revealed, are diffused and spread abroad, and shared among unnumbered minds. When eloquence and poetry speak; when the glorious arts, statuary and painting and music; when patriotism, charity, virtue, speak to us, with all their thrilling power, do not the hearts of thousands glow with a kindred joy and ecstasy? Who's here so humble, who so poor in thought, or in affection, as not to feel this? Who's here so low, so degraded, as had almost said, as not sometimes to be touched with the beauty of goodness? Who's here with a heart made of such base materials, as not sometimes to respond through every chord of it, to the call of honor, patriotism, generosity, virtue? What a glorious capacity is this!—a power to commune with God and angels! a reflection of the brightness of heaven; a mirror that collects and concentrates within itself all the moral splendors of the universe: a light kindled from heaven, that is to shine brighter and brighter until the end of time. What circumstances of outward splendor can lend such imposing dignity to any being, as the throne of inward light and power, where the spirit reigns forever? What work of man shall be brought into comparison with this work of God? I will speak of it in its simplest character: I say, a thought, a bare thought; and yet I say, what is it; and what is its power and mystery? Breathed from the inspiration of the Almighty; partaking of infinite attributes; comprehending, analyzing, and with its own beauty clothing all things; and bringing all things and all themes—earth, heaven, eternity—within the possession of its momentary being; what is there that man can form; what sceptre or throne; what structure of ages; what empire of wide spread dominion, can compare with the wonders and the grandeur of a single thought? It is that alone of all things that are made; it is that alone that comprehends the Maker of all. That alone is the key which unlocks all the treasures of the universe. That alone is the power that reigns over space, time, eternity. That, under God, is the sovereign dispenser to man of all the blessings and glories, that lie within the compass of possession, or within the range of possibility. Virtue, piety, heaven, immortality, exist not, and never will exist for us, but as they exist, and will exist in the perception, feeling, thought—of the glorious mind.

THE DEVIL AND THE NOTE SHAVEN.

Devil. What luck?
B. Never had better. Money tight—notes prime—business brisk. Every body "short"—merchants—lawyers—doctors—clerks.
D. Good.
B. And to see them writhe, and fret, and scold, and swear, and run to and fro, and beg, and threaten, and—
D. Grand times these for the "trade."
B. No mistake. We go the entire now. Profits never so great—"shaves" never so respectable.
D. But how's your conscience?
B. In real Shylock order—flinty—impervious. No givings—quirkings—quiverings. It's proof—complete proof—thanks to your Majesty.
D. Well. How is friend C?
B. Tame—flat. Too tender-hearted—too chicken-fied—too soft altogether. He wants stamper. For instance—yesterday. Chance, noble—case, pressing—note, prime—risk, nothing—and just half a minute before two o'clock! Yet the fool took only six per cent a month!
D. And when the "law" acts, and the sheriff's grapple, and the victim's safe—and when you and I would rejoice, and smile, and be deaf; he heeds the wife's cry for mercy, and the children's moan for bread?
B. Just so. He wants pluck.
D. Too bad. Out of character entirely. He'll disgrace the trade. He must be hardened—sterled—seared.
B. Yes, your Majesty, or resign his agency!

In Fleming, January 22, of pressure on the brain, GEORGE F., only son of Mr. Maden, aged 2 years and 6 months. Thus was this sweet child cut down in the flower of his days to bloom in the sweet air of paradise. May God comfort his bereaved parents, and teach the us to say, "Thy will be done." G. M. W.

A NEW WORK, AT FIFTY CENTS PER YEAR.

Persuaded that the publication of SERMONS is a great auxiliary to the spread of Universalism, and peculiarly adapted to meet the wants of societies destitute of stated preaching—the subscriber proposes to publish a monthly work, to be entitled, the each number to contain two Original Sermons. It will be printed in duodecimo form, on fine paper, with covers, making a volume of twenty-four SERMONS, with an index, and executed in a style equal to any similar work, at the extreme low price of FIFTY CENTS.

It is hoped that all Universalists who wish to place in their libraries a valuable collection of sermons, will avail themselves of this opportunity. No sermons will be published but such as it is believed will be creditable to the author and interesting and instructive to the reader.

From the style in which the above work will be executed, the matter it will contain, and the extremely low price of subscription, it can not be expected that any variation will be allowed from the conditions of publication.

The motives which induce us to make this attempt will not allow us to hazard a brief existence of the work proposed—consequently it will not be issued till a patronage is insured sufficient to encourage a commencement.

Subscriber's names must therefore be returned, directed, post paid or free, to G. SANDERSON, Rochester, N. Y., before the first of next April.

No subscription continued unless payment be made on the reception of the first number. Individuals or companies forwarding five dollars, shall receive eleven copies; for ten dollars, twenty-three copies; for twenty dollars, forty-six copies.

Notes on solvent banks of any denomination in the State, or out of it, received at par. G. SANDERSON. Rochester, January 27, 1837.

 Editors with whom we exchange will please give the above a few insertions, and the favor will be reciprocated.

DISCOURSE ON PUNISHMENT.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY, OF AUBURN, N. Y.

[Published by request.]

"And that servant which knew his Lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes."

Luke xii: 47, 48.

In his individual capacity, man is always searching after happiness. Whether roaming the wild seas or exploring the wastes of the desert, whether reading the stars or unveiling the secrets of the mountains, whether lonely in the wilderness or busy among the multitude, whether humbly walking in the glories of virtue or living amid the horrors of sin, he is always seeking after happiness. It is very true, that he frequently mistakes the correct means of attaining happiness, grasps for good that which produces evil, but still, above all his folly, it will be seen that pleasure is his object. With this fact before us, in connexion with the truth, that virtue produces peace, and vice, misery, and also that the followers of the Restitution are charged with denying punishment for sin and opening the flood-gates of iniquity, we believe that the present subject will be of deep interest to us; and that, while speaking in defence of "that sect which is every where spoken against" and revealing our views of divine punishment, the strongest attention of the hearer will be given me. In effecting this duty, it will be unnecessary for me to speak of that opinion which consigns the sinful to unending pain, to trace its history through the persecutions of the dark ages and from the days of Calvin to the authors of Salem witchcraft, and point out its weak hold upon the hearts and lives of men—like Elihu, when speaking to Job, I am to show mine own opinion.

It is a well established fact that God has fixed certain laws in the physical world, for the government of man, which can not be broken without certain inevitable consequences following. If we neglect the laws of our organization which produce health, if we are thinly clad amid the piercing winds of our climate, if the extremities of the body are not sufficiently protected, if the system is so compressed that the vitals can not perform a healthy action, if we overload ourselves with food, then a derangement of the functions of life is the certain result, and that derangement is accompanied by pain to the loss of enjoyment in a greater or lesser extent, according to the magnitude of the wrong. It must be obvious to every individual, that we can not attain that high state of health which makes it felicity even simply to exist, without pursuing temperance in all things; for if we do not practice temperance, we walk in the ways of misery. It is very true that intemperance may be followed a short period without fixing permanent evil results, if it then be given up; but still, pain will follow to an amount commensurate with the transgression. If an individual who is not habitually intemperate, should for once be perfectly intoxicated, and should never become so again, yet he would not escape distress, for the languor of his body, the pain of his head, the state of his eyes, and the shame of his mind, would convince him that there was no departure from the physical laws which govern man without a just retribution; which retribution must continue, until temperate habits are again pursued. So correct, then, is the position that pain does follow an infringement of the laws of human nature, that careful observation will convince us that much of the pain and misery which poisons the peace of the world grow out of a neglect of those laws; for if we studied the laws which relate to us and observed them with the same vigilance that we do the laws which govern the seed we plant in the earth, many victims of a lingering complaint, of a pale consumption, and of an insane mind, would be saved to enjoy a happy life. But these things are so well settled, that I may leave them and remark,—

As in the physical, so in the moral world God has established certain laws for the regulation of our conduct, which can not be broken without misery as an inevitable consequence, which misery is the punishment due for the transgression. As certain as the laws which guide the physical universe produce their appointed results, as certain as the arm that is plunged into the fire must be burned, so certain is it, that transgression will produce misery. Nor is the misery put off for a long period beyond our knowledge, before its infliction is begun—it follows transgression as an effect. This fact constitutes one of the greatest effects of punishment, for where there is room to hope that the punishment may be evaded, its influence is measurably ruined; for even the penalty of judicial death for murder, bad as it is, has but little effect, because murderers know that there is chance of escape by reprieve. It is not more sure that God judges the sinner, than it is, that he has said, "in the day (or period) thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die;" Gen. ii: 17—die to happiness, peace and enjoyment.

The effects of iniquity, or if you please, the punishment of iniquity, does not consist in one thing alone; but every effect which can be traced to sin as a cause, is the punishment of that sin—hence various effects follow crime of different circumstances and magnitude. The Scriptures clearly support this statement. God said to Adam concerning the tree of good and evil; "in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die." Adam did partake of it notwithstanding, and the punishment was, the loss of his innocence and a troubled conscience, exhibited by endeavoring to hide himself from his Maker. Solomon said, "he that is soon angry, dealeth foolishly; and a man of wicked devices is hated." Prov. xiv: 17. The punishment of hasty anger is the deprivation of pleasure, turbulent feelings, continued quarrels, and the scorn of men. He also says, "Depart not from the words of my mouth.....lest strangers be filled with thy wealth.....and thou mourn at the last, when thy flesh and thy body are consumed." Prov. v: 7-11. The punishment of debauchery is, not only pain in the heart, but loathsome disease, most of all to be dreaded because it comes with the conviction that it is the result of our own folly. David says, when referring to the wicked, "but thou, O God, shalt bring them down into the pit of destruction; bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days;" Ps. lv: 23—to which Solomon adds, "the fear of the Lord prolongeth days; but the years of the wicked shall be shortened." Prov. x: 27. In these instances premature death is the result of transgression. These passages might be multiplied, but it is not necessary, for the reflecting reader of the Bible must be convinced that, not only is pain of mind the punishment of transgression, but imprisonment, quarrels, scorn, sickness and death, when they result from transgression, form parts of punishment attached to various crimes. Let it not therefore any more be said that we believe pain of conscience is the only punishment due to sin, as has sometimes been represented.

By the position which these cited passages prove, we are taught that punishment is graduated according to the criminality of the offender—the punishment of anger is not as great as that for murder, for it would be obviously unjust to inflict the same amount of pain, either in quantity or duration, upon sinners whose criminality is greatly different. If a parent should inflict the penalty upon a child for disobeying a simple command, that a man receives upon the gallows for murder, the world would cry out against his wickedness and cruelty. How then can any person believe that God will inflict the same duration of pain upon sinners who die without repentance, when one may be a murderer and another only a dollar-thief? The fact that punishment is graduated according to the greatness of the sin committed, is of itself a clear refutation of unending torture in any of its forms, for where pain is unceasing, there can be no graduation.

An unjust tyrant frequently deals out his cruelty without reference to character—but God, who judges in the earth, and probes every heart to its secret places, punishes according to crime. The Scriptures declare it. Paul affirms that God "will render to every man according to his deeds;" Rom. ii: 6—which statement is reiterated many times in the New Testament. The text, however, settles the matter beyond controversy. "And that servant which knew his Lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes." This passage is so clear, and punishment according to the amount of guilt is so obviously a just principle, that this portion of the subject may well pass without farther remarks.

Solomon affirms that "the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner;" Prov. xi: 31, on which the language of Paul is an excellent comment; "be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap; for he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit, shall of the spirit reap life everlasting;" Gal. vi: 7, 8—or a knowledge of God and the Saviour. John xvii: 3. How clearly we are thus taught, that punishment is not put off for a long period, but that it commences on the earth.

It may be urged as an objection, however, that Paul speaks of "consciences seared as with a hot iron," and that for such there is no punishment on the earth—but this is a mistake. Generally speaking, the more timid and keen is the conscience of an individual, the more cautious he will be not to commit any very great crimes; but the more his conscience becomes hardened, the more obnoxious he renders himself to outward punishment. When the sinner commences his career, he suffers intensely in his mind; but as he progresses and loses his shame, his caution flees, and ere he is aware of it, he is subjected to the scorn of the world and an ignominious imprisonment. Consequently, as inward punishment decreases for crime, the outward increases. When the warnings of the prophets and the voice of Christ failed to recall the Jews from sin, and they hardened themselves to the persecution of the Redeemer, then outward destruction fell upon them, and they were scattered over the face of the whole earth like dust before the breeze. Hence Solomon says, "he that, being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy." Prov. xxix: 1. If the sinful wretch will not heed the counsels of wisdom, he falls without remedy. The intemperate man who minds not the warnings of experience, is destroyed without remedy by "delirium tremens."

It may farther be objected, that many sinners do not receive punishment in the earth, because they appear to flourish in their business and to be happy in their minds. This objection is founded upon appearances, and appearances are often deceptive. Our Saviour represents the Pharisees to be like "whited sepulchres," which appeared well outwardly, but inwardly, were full of corruption. "It is not all gold that glitters." An individual who is splendidly clothed amid luxuries and decorated with smiles, may yet carry a heart that rankles with pain and sorrow. Have you not known of persons who appeared happy and whom you esteemed to be happy, and yet, you afterwards found were at the same time constantly in fear? The name of an individual not a great distance in the West might be given, who was supposed to be very prosperous, and so far as virtue was concerned, happy; yet who has burst upon the world as a great sinner within a short period, while we feel convinced, that even when he was thought to be prosperous and honest, his soul was so troubled with fear in prospect of discovery, that he sat upon thorns. Besides, though a sinner may appear prosperous, yet it may sometimes be accounted for in the fact, that his cup is not yet full, nor his sinfulness ripe for punishment.

David himself once supposed, that sinners flourished, that they were prospered, had abundance and lived in ease. This he declares in the first part of the 73rd Psalm. But in the latter part of it, for entertaining such an opinion he says of himself, "so foolish was I and ignorant; I was as a beast before thee." Verse 22. He was brought to see that his former view was incorrect. "When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me, until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end; surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction; how are they brought into desolation as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors;" verse 16-19—while in another place, he expressly declares, "bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days." Ps. lv: 23.

There can not, in fact, be any firm objection to the statement, that the punishment of sin is certain and will be inflicted without fail. God has placed his signet to the truth of it, and who will call it counterfeit? David says, "verily there is a reward for the righteous; verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth." Ps. lviii: 11. If God judges in the earth, then the language of Solomon must be true; "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished," Prov. xi: 21; for "behold, the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth; much more the wicked and the sinner." xi: 31. This statement, clear as it is, is confirmed by the language of God, "But the wicked are like the troubled sea, when it can not rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt; there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." Isa. lvii: 20, 21. How can we affirm that there is peace to the wicked any where, when God declares that there is no peace to the wicked? Paul affirms, "But unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil; of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile; but glory, honor and peace to every man that worketh good; to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile; for there is no respect of persons with God." Rom. ii: 8-11. This statement is sustained by his declaration to his Colossian brethren; "But he that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done; and there is no respect of persons;" Col. iii: 25—all of which is signed and sealed by the declaration of Jehovah to Moses; "And the Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed, the Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty." Ex. xxxiii: 6, 7.

This clear and lucid testimony, which proves that God will punish sin, is illustrated by examples from the schools of experience, that tell the fearful story of the hardness which besets the way of the transgressor. There was Cain, whose distress was so great, that in his anguish he affirmed, "my punishment is greater than I can bear"—there was Haman, who hung on the very gallows which he had prepared for Mordecai the Jew—there was David, who for his sins, declared on the earth, that the pains of hell gat hold of him—there was Peter, whose heart smote him for denying his Lord—there was Judas, whose grief was so great that he died—there was Nero, who came to a miserable end—and to these we may add, all the prisons of the world, which read to us such scenes of degradation and blighted hopes—while we are persuaded that every individual, on reflection, will admit that his or her own experience proves that the laws which govern the moral world, can not be broken with impunity. And surely, no reader of history can for a moment doubt, that wicked nations who forget God, are driven into punishment, from the Jews who sighed and mourned for seventy years in Babylonian captivity, down to the horrors of the French Revolution.

Oh, could I open every scene of vice, more particularly in large cities; could I bring to light every narrow path and lane where sin hides its form; could I hold up to view all the misery generated in the cells of iniquity, from the beginner whose incipient folly marks his brow with shame and makes his heart tremble, to the miserable wretch, who, loathsome from disease, is fairly rotting to the grave; could I make bare the consciences that have burned with all the fire of misery; it would not be necessary for me to say, that "there is no peace to the wicked;" for God does punish the sinful. It is written by the pen of unchanging truth in the archives of revelation, it is on the foremost page of every history, it is recorded on the business of life, it is burned in upon the experience of every individual, and were it written on the broad vaults of heaven with blazing suns, it could not be rendered more true, clear and demonstrative. The continuous results of flowing life establish the important truth, that the spirit does not more certainly return to God who gave it, than that virtue produces inward peace, without which inward peace, a universe of bounty would be desolation, and with which, even a desert becomes a temple of the most high God. And not more certainly does the mountain torrent find its level, than vice produces misery, destroys pious reflection, benumbs the intellect, and makes the creature an enemy to his Creator.

I know that the erroneous voice of modern schools will tell us, that the path of the righteous man is oftentimes set with thorns, while the way of the wicked is frequently strown with flowers; but this is said in the face and eyes of divine testimony; "great peace have they which love thy law; and nothing shall offend them," Ps. cxix: 165; and "there is no peace to the wicked." What? am I told that the righteous man who loves God and does good to men, who walks uprightly and is blessed by the widow and orphan, is wretched and miserable? Am I told that the victim of debauchery, prematurely an old man in the morning of his days; that the bloated, tottering, degraded intemperate, whose unhealthy desires are like the tortures of the rack; that the inmate of a prison, driven from society by her offended laws; shall I be told, that these are happy? You might as well tell me that the fields of Northern ice produce a hotter fire than that which burned in the furnace of the king of Babylon, with as much prospect of being believed.

That mind which rests upon Christianity and integrity, is impenetrably guarded against misery. You may surround it with sickness and with death, and even amidst the blasts of affliction its songs of triumph and glory will be heard returning thanks to God and the Lamb. Such a mind is but little indebted to outward circumstances for its enjoyment—the stream flows from the Deity. On the contrary, the vicious soul will be pained, and wrestle with its agonies amid the calmest scenes of nature and the bounties of earth. Why will not the world learn this all-important truth, and instead of chasing the bubbles of sin in order to procure happiness; instead of getting up new devices to satisfy their unhallowed passions, why will they not conform themselves to the laws of God, and reap the heavenly joys of obedience to him? Alas for their folly, alas for their errors—they will still go on, accumulating testimony upon testimony, that the "way of transgressors is hard."

While, then, it is a truth, that God will punish transgression, it is also a truth, that that punishment will be continued until every rebel shall be reformed and sin finished; until there is no more transgression—then the punishment will cease, for God hath declared, that he "will not cast off forever." It is in vain to object, that many die impenitent, that there is no change or repentance beyond death, for this is not only a puny child of creeds, but it is unscriptural. Paul expressly affirms that "we shall all be changed," 1. Cor. xv: 51; while there is not a professor of Christ in the world but who believes in a change beyond death; for it is after death that even Christians are to get free from the impurities to which man is heir. Therefore, as the God of heaven hath put into the hands of the Saviour a kingdom of divine truth, that he might govern the children of men; for Daniel declares that "a kingdom was given him, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him," vii: 14—as we are all to appear before the judgment-seat of moral right erected in this kingdom—so punishment will continue to be exercised in every place where sinners exist, until Christ shall have subdued all things unto himself, and given up the kingdom to God, that he may be all in all. This noble truth, then, leads me to speak of the object of punishment.

I can not conceive a good reason why pain should be endless, for it can not add to the glory of God, the happiness of saints, nor the good of the punished. But when we discover that punishment is reformatory in its tendency, we are at once convinced that goodness is manifested in its infliction. Every individual who deserves the name of parent, when he punishes his child, aims at the benefit of the child, for he does not pain the child simply because it has transgressed and he wishes to put it in misery, but to produce obedience. Nor does God punish his children for the sake of painning them, merely; for the prophet expressly declares that God "doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men;" Lam. iii: 33—he chastises them for their good. This position is sustained by the Scriptures in the most lucid manner, as we shall discover.

The Psalmist says; "It is good for me that I have been afflicted, that I might learn thy statutes." Ps. cxix: 71. God affirmed to his sorrowful children by the prophet; "For a small moment have I forsaken thee, but with great mercies will I gather thee; in a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment, but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy upon thee, saith the Lord my Redeemer." Isa. liv: 7, 8. Of Israel, God declares; "Thine own wickedness shall correct thee, and thy backslidings shall reprove thee." Jer. ii: 19. We have a very clear passage on this subject, by the apostle Paul. Speaking of Christ as the true foundation, he remarks; "Now if any man build upon this foundation, gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble: every man's work shall be made manifest; for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward; if any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire." 1. Cor. iii: 12-15. In another place, on the subject of punishment, he says—"For they (earthly fathers) for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure; but he (God) for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness. Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby." Heb. xii: 10, 11. These passages clearly speak of punishment and the object of its infliction; it is to produce ultimate reformation in the offender, and reduce him to obedience. What other great leading object could a Being of unlimited power, wisdom, love and goodness possess in punishing his children? It is not simply to pain the creature, for he does not delight in misery—it is not to exhibit pain to others, because he teaches us to alleviate distress. What then is it? He must have some object. Indifferent he is not—cruel he is not—but good as well as just he is, and hence, he can not punish his children with any other view than their final good. This fact, in addition to others, presents God to us in a most attracting view, and draws from us the involuntary tribute of affection, "our Father, who art in heaven."

From all the positions which we have advanced, our conclusions are clear and decisive. We see that our reward for virtue is here, and is finite; that it consists in a peace of mind which creates enjoyment in every outward circumstance of nature; that it is confidence in God and faith in Christ; that it is to be respected through life and comforted in death with joyous hopes of immortality. Beyond this we can expect nothing more as a reward, for even the best man that ever lived, can not put his hand upon his heart, and in sincerity affirm, I deserve immortality for the good which I have done. Our punishment for sin is also finite, and consists of every evil which flows from transgression as a cause; which punishment is certain and unescapable.

The joys of immortality and the ever-during pleasures of the presence of the Almighty, are not a reward, but form an unqualified gift from the hand of God to his children. Hence Paul says—"For by grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God; not of works lest any man should boast." Eph. ii: 8, 9. But still, without purity and holiness, no person can enter into the enjoyments of this gift. In this fact we discover the wisdom of God in punishment. He afflicts us when we are sinful, and keeps the affliction upon us so long as we remain sinful—but the affliction is for the purpose of breaking down our rebellion, softening our hearts, and preparing us for the higher and more glorious scale of being which is prepared for us in the paradise of God.

When we repent of our evil deeds and reform, then we are forgiven, for forgiveness does not consist in remitting deserved chastisement, but in blotting out our iniquities on repentance, and so saving us from all the farther pain which we might have endured had we continued sinful. The wandering prodigal is a complete illustration of this matter. When he, in a far country, fell into harlotry and riotous living, he was severely punished by the state of his mind, by starvation, and by the meanest employment. But when his punishment had brought him to his senses, and with subdued feelings he returned to his home, his father freely forgave and blotted his ingratitude from remembrance—then, his heart made wise by previous affliction, and convinced that his kind father gladly received him, then he was prepared to receive with joy the gift of the feast which had been prepared for him. So with us. God punishes us to reform us, and when we are reformed, then we are fitted to receive the glorious gift of immortal felicity in the heavens.

It is true that the polypus-spirit of objection will rise against this view of the subject. But will you tell me, that if the certain object of punishment be reformation, then you will continue in sin, because finally sure of salvation? What perverse folly is such an objection; when it is clear that no man will practice its spirit. If a person should say to his son, that if he broke his commandment, he would punish him to make him obedient, do you suppose that that son would say, "if your certain object is to make me obedient, I will laugh at your punishment and continue disobedient; but if you threaten to make my pain last all my life, then I will obey"? Yet this answer is the very spirit of the objection.

Will you be ungrateful, because God seeks to reclaim you by chastisement, instead of threatening to thrust you down to intense agonies world without end? What blindness! No heart which is warmed by the love of God, can make such an objection. If we were certain that no punishment whatever would endure for more than one hour, even then, every unprejudiced mind will admit, that it is much better to avoid the pain of that hour, than to endure it. Surely a man will not risk his health by swimming a stream when he can find a bridge by which to cross it. It is therefore a plain dictate of common sense to avoid the oftentimes dreadful punishment for sin, and to walk in that virtue, all whose ways are pleasant and her paths peace. Is it not far better to acquire virtuous conduct, to be useful to community, and to enjoy the pleasure arising from the consciousness of having acted well our part on the stage of life, than to walk in vice, be despised as a pest of community, and then sink to a dishonored and an infamous grave? Well has President Nott remarked—"Even though there were no God; no immortality; no accountability," "I would frown on vice; I would favor virtue." In this statement, we must all agree. For though our existence were as brief as the air-bubble and as unstable as the evening zephyr; yet it is more glorious, more ennobling, to write our names with the "spirits of just men made perfect," on the pages of virtue, than to inhabit the cells of sin and veil our memories in disgrace, and at last endure the severest sting of death. Let us then be wise, and avoid sin and embrace virtue. AMEN.

ROMANS VIII: 20.

BY REV. L. L. SADLER.

"For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope."

Br. GROSH—Having seen an article in the second number of the Magazine and Advocate, current volume, from your pen, purporting to give an explanation of the above passage, and in which you follow the common interpretation, I take the liberty of sending you the following exposition. This I do the more readily, from the fact that you observe in the close of your article, "while I am persuaded of the correctness of this view of the passage, I would be pleased to see the opposite opinion explained, especially if any thing not here noticed can be adduced in its favor."

The apostle, to my understanding, through a good proportion of this chapter, attempts to show what were the purposes of God in man's creation, as revealed in the Gospel of Jesus Christ. It is a difficult matter for many in the present day, to reconcile existing evil, though it be of limited duration, with the infinite goodness of God. The apostle attempts in illustration, by way of vindicating the ways of the Almighty in relation to his dealings with his creatures, and gives the people addressed to understand, that as we learn by comparison and contrast, our "present light afflictions are designed to work out for us, a far more exceeding, eternal weight of glory." See verses 17, 18.

In his dissertation on the subject, he remarks, that "the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly"—that is, for the sake of the vanity, as an object or end. This could not have been the design in view. Such an idea would impeach the goodness and wisdom of God. Yet, as he was made subject to vanity, he was thus constituted agreeably to the pleasure of the Deity in some sense; for it would not do to say, that he had acted in his formation unwillingly, or contrary to his will. Hence the apostle adds, "he was created subject to vanity [willingly] by reason of him, (Christ) [or, in reference to him] who hath subjected the same in hope." It is similar in sentiment and phraseology to the declaration of the prophet—"God doth not willingly afflict nor grieve the children of men; but though he causeth grief, he will have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies."

That it was the design of the apostle to argue, that God had subjected man to vanity, not willingly, as though he delighted in it, and desired it for its own sake; but in reference to his redemption through Christ, by which he would eventually attain to higher perfection, glory, and beatitude than he could have otherwise have witnessed, seems almost self-evident from the explanatory verse following. "Because the creature itself, also, shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption, into the glorious liberty of the children of God." This solved the whole difficulty—showed that evils were often blessings in disguise, and "that all things were working together for good" to the understanding of such as beheld the termination. In view of such a wise arrangement and glorious result, see his exulting exclamation, recorded in the subsequent part of the chapter.

That the Partialist commentators should agree in the supposition, that willingly has reference to the creation, and not to the Creator, as you affirm, is very reasonable; because had they applied the term to the Creator, they would have been obliged to adopt the sentiment, that God had a more glorious, ulterior design in view, and of course, if it were according to the original purpose and will of God, "that man should enjoy him, and glorify his name forever, as his chief end"! why then as a matter of consequence, the whole family of man would obtain an inheritance in heaven, agreeably to the design of their creation. Such an interpretation would have wholly destroyed the fundamental principles of their theology; and hence, they adopted the other exposition, which, to say the least, renders the words "not willingly," useless and unnecessary; as no one would presume, that we could have exercised volition ere we had an existence.

I might labor this subject, but it is unnecessary. Those who wish to investigate the matter, can do so by the hints suggested.

FILIAL DUTY.

There is no duty so binding, or that lays us under such strenuous obligations, as that which we owe to our parents. It is of the highest importance, because to them, as a medium of communication, we are indebted for almost every thing we enjoy, both in a moral and physical point of view. It was they who guided our infantile steps, and taught us to walk in virtue's paths—they told us of an all-creating Intelligence, and, as we learned to lip his name, inspired our hearts with the mingled praises of devotion.

There is no trait in the human character so admirably calculated to gain the friendship, and win the esteem of the virtuous and good, as filial affection. It is an evidence of a heart alive to gratitude, and warm with generous emotions. If a child loves his parents fervently and affectionately, he will seldom fail to love his God; and if he loves him, he will love the works of his hands—he will seek nothing but his own good, and the good of his fellow-beings. A SISTER.

ENCOURAGING.

[Having a little corner which this letter will fill, we here insert its encouraging words. Ed.]

Fredericktown, (O.) February 5, 1837.

I am a young man, and hope to be benefited by Br. Austin's "Voice to Youth."—I also anticipate much from "S. R. S." against skepticism—Infidelity is more fearful than Partialism. The Magazine and Advocate is a powerful moral reformer. The duties it inculcates, and the motives it holds forth as inducements to do right, have to my knowledge, in a number of instances, produced a happy change in the feelings and actions of individuals. This is what we need—something that will instruct us in our daily duties and obligations to ourselves, our neighbors, and to society. I am also pleased to see so much good feeling towards honest opposers. In haste.

Yours truly,

C. S. C.

DIALOGUE.—THE SAFE SIDE.

BY BOGARTUS HORNAR.

Prejudice is like a stiff-necked horse with a blind bridle on; it can see only in the direction towards which its head faces. Bigotry is like a man who closes his eyes wilfully to the light of day; nothing but a sudden flash can make it raise its eyelids. The objections they urge against a sentiment as despised and degraded as Universalism is by them, must be answered often—sometimes in the same words; for they are slow to hear—sometimes differently; for they are slow to understand—and in every way, if possible, towards which the head of prejudice can be turned; and as startlingly as possible, that bigotry may be surprised, some time or other, into seeing that its darkness is created by its own conduct, merely. Therefore, although the following contains nothing new to the intelligent Universalist, it may be astonishingly so to that class of our opposers which reasons more from fears within, than from evidences without. And it is hoped, devoutly, that their objections to embracing happiness, both here and hereafter, may be removed, by thus placing in their way, and causing them to see, that Truth which liberates those, who, through fear of death, are all their lives subjects to the bondage of error.

Protestant Partialist, Universalist, and Roman Catholic.

P. P. There is one argument in our favor that you cannot get over. You must admit that we will be saved at last, according to Universalism, whether our faith is right or wrong here.

U. That may be a reason to a cowardly mind, but is no argument to an honest and intelligent one—or if it is, is an argument in favor of Universalism, instead of being against it.

R. C. How so?

U. You all admit that if there is any uncertainty in regard to future prospects, it is the part of wisdom and prudence to make sure of the present.

P. P. and R. C. We do.

U. Well, this argument is based on the supposition that your doctrine may be false, or that mine may be false—just as it may happen to turn out—and that, therefore, the future prospect is, so far, uncertain. Now, do you not see that you lose all the present joys arising out of the infinitely extensive and glorious faith of universal salvation; and suffer all the torturing anxiety and sorrow attending the belief of the horrid doctrine of —

P. P. I see what you would say—but first hear me. We deny that you can be saved at all, if you live and die a Universalist, and if our faith proves true—so that our salvation is not so uncertain as you represent; but yours is.

R. C. Yes; and even admitting what he urges, what are the fleeting joys of a life-time, compared to the terrible agonies of an eternity spent in the flames of hell?

U. Nothing, in the comparison, I admit—but then it is a comparison, only. The argument is built wholly on “ifs,” and although, in your own minds, your salvation in the future is more probable than mine, yet, by your own showing, it is probability, only, (I mean as stated in your argument,) after all; while the present salvation I enjoy is a reality, a certainty, by your own admission. However, to show you that your future salvation is not more probable, even, than mine, will you please to prove that the terrible agonies of an eternal hell will be the doom of Universalists—and that, too, for believing in Universal salvation? And further—prove, also, that future salvation is the happy lot of Partialists—and that, too, for disbelieving Universalism? For till this is done, your future salvation is no more probable than mine.

P. P. That can be done soon. “He that believeth and is baptised, shall be saved; and he that believeth not shall be damned.”

R. C. Yes, yes—there you have it!—“shall be damned.”

U. “Believeth”—what?—“believeth not”—what? Endless misery? Is that the thing, for believing which you are to be saved; and for disbelief of which I am to be damned? And even if it is, (as you know it is not), is that “damnation” to be endless; or to last only while my disbelief continues?

P. P. Come—come—I can not answer so many questions at once. A right belief includes the doctrine of endless misery, of course.

U. “Of course”? Then you can show me a passage of Scripture where a belief in that doctrine is stated as a pre-requisite to the “salvation” spoken of.

P. P. No, I do not know of any such passage; but, then, the belief of the Gospel is there required; and the Gospel contains the doctrine in question.

R. C. Ah, ha! he has you there, I believe.

U. By no means. That is the very question in dispute, and I can not allow it to be taken for granted—I call for proof.

P. P. Well—well—it is not necessary now to enter on that question—you have already admitted enough for me, viz.—If my doctrine fails, yours will save me; but if yours fails, mine will not save you.

R. C. Yes—yes—that is the clincher, after all!

U. If correct, it only proves that my doctrine is a more saving, and consequently a better doctrine than his! But I have not admitted, that if my doctrine fails, yours will not save me as well as it will save you. For if future salvation is of election, by the sovereign pleasure of God, without regard to the creature's worth, faith or works—my chance of having been elected is as good as yours.

P. P. Admitted—but if of faith and obedience, how then?

U. And if future salvation is of the free, unpurchased favor, and universal goodness and mercy of the Creator, (as I contend it is,)—then that grace is as free to me as it is to you.

P. P. Admitted—but that does not answer my question.

U. If it is of correct faith—as your argument respecting the safe side, leaves it equally doubtful which of us is in error, my chance is, again, as good as yours. But if salvation is of a good faith—as your argument allows mine to be a safer, a more saving faith than yours; and as it is also more honorable to God, more desirable in its consummation, to every holy and benevolent soul, it must therefore be a better faith than yours, and thus proves my chance of future salvation to be better also!

P. P. But I did not say “of faith,” only; but “faith and obedience”—obedience to the conditions of salvation!

U. And if future salvation is awarded because of works—or, “of obedience,” as you call it—as I am confident that my doctrine, by representing God in the most lovely light possible, and being more happily to man, will sooner induce us to love God entirely, and our neighbor as ourselves, than yours will—and as it therefore furnishes more, and greater, and better motives than your doctrine can—so it must procure better works, or a more perfect obedience, than yours will—and of course, I stand a better chance of salvation—

P. P. Hold—hold—you are going too fast. To use your own words—“I call for proof.”

U. Well—which doctrine represents God as most lovely, to mankind?

P. P. Yours, to the carnally minded!

U. And which is most lovely to the saint, who desires, and labors, and prays for the salvation of sinners?

P. P. Ah, I see you wish to ensnare me!

U. Well, then, you fearful soul, we will take the answer you have given. It is the sinner whom God wishes to save. If the sinner can be brought to love God entirely, he will be saved; for love is the great commandment—the fulfilling of the law. Now, can you deny the loveliness of Universalism, and its consequent eagerness to save?

P. P. But still you have not proved that it will lead to better works, than my doctrine will,

U. I think I have. But answer me this question,—which are the best, the most meritorious—works arising from the love of God, or those arising from the fear of hell?

P. P. Oh, we love God, too, as well as fear his judgments.

U. Yes; but all the love you have, we have also; and perceiving additional reasons to love God, where you see reasons only to fear hell, we have so much more love in addition to that we have in common with you. But you have not answered the question I proposed.

P. P. Why, certainly, the love of God is a better motive to good works than the fear of hell.

U. Have works arising wholly from that fear, any merit?

P. P. No—they are forced works, performed on selfish motives.

U. Then you admit that, on the score of salvation by works, your belief in endless misery is a disadvantage to you.

P. P. Ah! how? Does it not cause me to be more watchful to abstain from evil, and to do good, that I may make my salvation sure?

U. Suppose it does—your works then have no merit, but are forced and selfish altogether—and how can they, then, be any benefit to you? (A pause). But even admitting that the watchfulness to abstain from evil and to do good, caused by the fear of an endless hell, is meritorious and beneficial—“eternal life is the gift of God,” not a reward for finite actions—“not of works, lest any man should boast.” “To him that worketh, the reward is counted as a debt—if of works, then it is not of grace—if of grace, then it is not of works”—I do not give the exact words, but you remember the Apostle's argument?

P. P. Well—well—I only hope your doctrine is true: for if it is, I will be saved at last, at all events; but if mine is true, you are in an awful condition! I beg leave, therefore, to remain on the safe side—where I have two chances to your one.

U. But, my dear Sir, do you not see that there are no chances in the case? It is not a lottery—God's government of the universe allows no chances! If God's promise, and oath, and nature can be relied on, the only safe side is in that reliance. On that side, I am—and to that side you must come, before you can be saved.

P. P. How will you make that appear?

U. From your own reasoning. You admit that you rely on a chance in your own system. If that chance fails, you rely on my system certainly saving you. Therefore, if Partialism is false, you deem Universalism true, and if true, that it is certain to save—while, at the best, it is only a chance whether Partialism will save you even if true. That chance, you admit, is as good in my favor, as it is in yours, if salvation depends on election, on free grace, or on correct faith. And I think I have proved, clearly, that if salvation depends on a good faith, or on works performed from good motives, my chance is even better than yours—that is, admitting that there are chances in the case. You admit, also, that I enjoy a hope full of joy, now; while you have one alloyed with torturing anxieties and fears—that my faith is better in life, than yours—and that, therefore, I have the “bird in hand,” while you have only a bird in “the bush.” Now, even on your own admissions, I am on the safest side in every view.

P. P. I admit nothing, only, that if your doctrine is true, I shall be saved at last as well as you!

R. C. And you do not allow his arguments to be conclusive at all, at all?

P. P. Certainly not—he cannot overthrow my position, that, because his doctrine will save me as well him, if true; while mine will save me, if his is not true; therefore I am on the safe side, and he is not.

R. C. That's right—stick to that—for that's exactly my argument, and no Protestant can get over it, nor even answer it, without resorting to just such quibbles as this Universalist has used with you!

P. P. What do you mean?

R. C. Why, you see, every Protestant agrees that if a man lives a pious, godly life, even if he does belong to the communion of the Mother church, he will be saved—

P. P. Admitted—but what of that?

R. C. Only this—the Holy Apostolic church holds, that no one dying out of her communion, can possibly be saved; so that if you would be on the safe side—the only safe side—you must turn Catholic! For, you see, if my doctrine fails, yours will catch me and save me, as I mean to lead a Christian life; but if yours fails, mine will damn you forever and ever, to a dead certainty! And how, then, can you call yourself on the safe side, man?

P. P. And that you call “your argument”—your safe side the safe side!

R. C. Yes, man, safer than ever yours is in comparison with the Universalist’s—for we hold that all dying in our communion will be saved at last, (for purgatory will not hold us for ever!) but, if you are correct, and Universalism is false, a man may belong to your communion, and go to hell for ever, in the end. A mighty pretty safety that is, any way!

P. P. Ah, but how will you prove that endless misery is the penalty for not belonging to your church?

U. (Laughing). Stop, stop, friend; you must not use my weapons in this controversy; for you have declared them insufficient.

R. C. Indeed, he must not! He must stick to his own ever blessed and true words. The question is not, which is the true, but which is the safe side? And surely, “he that believeth not shall be damned.”

P. P. “Believeth not”—what? In the Romish pope and church?—

U. Stop, my friend, is it fair to use arguments you would not receive yourself?

R. C. Surely not. And is not the holy Catholic church named in the Apostle’s Creed? Why even the Episcopalists don’t deny that! And surely, to believe in the blessed Son of the Virgin, is to believe in his vicar, the Pope—and to believe his Gospel, is to believe in his holy Apostolic church, of course!

P. P. “Of course!”—why that is the very thing in dispute, and I can not allow you to assume—

U. But, my dear Sir, that is one of my arguments against yourself!

R. C. Yes, himself has said it was not conclusive at all, at all! And he can not deny that if my doctrine fails, his will catch me; but if his fails, he is lost to a dead certainty—and that therefore I am on the safe side!

P. P. I do deny it! The safe side, to tremble in slavery before the Priesthood!—the safe side, to give up the keys of mind and conscience to Antichrist, and wear the fetters of Mystery Babylon, the—

R. C. Keep your temper, man, and don’t go to calling names—blackguarding a n’t argument, you know! Now, be cool. If I lead a good Christian life, in my church, I am safe, if you are right—you won’t deny that! But if my church is right, then you are in an awful condition—you won’t deny that?

P. P. Yes, “if”—but there are no “ifs” in the case, I tell you! God has given us a revelation, and if his Word can be relied on—

U. Tut, man! you are deserting your own incontrovertible argument, and taking up my “inconclusive” ones!

R. C. Certainly is he! He admits that a true Christian in our church will certainly be saved; and what else does he want but to be on the safe side?

P. P. But you won’t let me speak! I say, God’s revelation decides the matter—

R. C. And what has that to do with the argument? Sure it’s not truth, but the safe side you are seeking!

P. P. But I say that the true side, must be the safe side, let that be where it may.

R. C. Well, I won’t argue that point with you—but I hope your system may be true; for then, even if mine is false, yours will catch me and save me. And you, Mr. Universalist, we both hope your faith is correct; for then, if both our systems fail, yours will save the whole of us.

P. P. In that I fully agree.

U. I thank you, gentlemen; for in that agreement you make it appear, very clearly, that the only final and steadfast hope either of you have for salvation in immortality, is in the truth of Universalism. And rest assured, that if the endless and universal goodness and mercy of God fails in saving any of us, nothing else can or will succeed. In it, therefore, is the only hope any of us can rationally have for our salvation. Let us, then, cease to calculate chances, like gamblers; or seek any other safe side than truth, like cowards—for P. P. is right, “The true side must be the safe side; let that be where it may.” WHAT IS TRUTH?

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PREPARATION FOR DEATH.

It is a solemn fact that we must, sooner or later, die. The positive declaration of the Almighty, “dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return,” has irrevocably sealed the doom of all the sons and daughters of Adam. The “house appointed for all the living,” will, ere long, enclose our mortal remains; the green clods of the valley will cover us, and the willow will hang its branches o’er our heads. The places that now know us, will know us no more forever; our bodies will return to dust, and our spirits to the God who gave them. Death is certain, but of the day or hour of our departure, we know not. Well saith the apostle, “Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? it is even a vapor that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away.”

And now, dear reader, permit me to ask you two questions, and after you have read them, stop and answer them before God. Are you prepared to die? If God should say to you, “this night thy soul shall be required of thee,” could you say, “Come, welcome death, thou end of fears,

I am prepared to go?”

Dear reader, if thou canst answer these questions in the affirmative, happy is thy lot. Yea, with a joyful heart can I bid thee God-speed, and rejoice that thou hast that blest assurance, that, if this “earthly house of thy tabernacle were dissolved, thou hast a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens” for thy enduring home! But if this should meet the eye of any one who is “living without God and without hope in the world,” let me exhort him—“Repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out when the time of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord.” Acts iii: 19. “Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon.” Isaiah lv: 7. Dear fellow sinner, such commands and invitations as these, are not to be slighted with impunity. Evil consequences will continually follow their rejection, however long continued, until you will be glad—glad, indeed, to embrace them. Therefore, “return unto thy Father’s house, where there is bread enough and to spare.” Live no longer an enemy to God, by wicked works.—“Cease to do evil and learn to do well.” And for your especial encouragement in virtue, and your discouragement in vice, hear the words of the Saviour, “All that the Father hath given me shall come to me, and him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out.”

May God assist both writer and reader to return unto him with full purpose of heart to do his most holy will. May we live peacefully and joyfully while we do live, that when we are called upon to lay down this “tenement of clay,” our ransomed spirits may soar away to that brighter and better world, where “sickness and sorrow, pain and death” can never more disturb us, or mar our eternal felicity. And that we may thus usefully live and thus joyfully die, may we ever cherish and practice the faith which represents the whole family of ransomed mankind, redeemed from sin and iniquity, and immortalized at last to chant the deathless song of Moses and the Lamb, throughout vast eternity.

“How long, dear Saviour, O how long
Shall this bright hour delay?
Fly swifter round, ye wheels of time,
And bring the welcome day.”

HEATHENISM vs. CHRISTIANITY.

The intelligent Christian must be shocked and disgusted in reading Gibbon’s luminous pages, to find him often lauding “the refined polytheism of Greece and Rome,” and sneeringly contrasting “barbarous” Christianity with its elegance and refinement. Equally disgusting is the affected delicacy of those who sneer at matrimonial ties, and affect to be shocked at the “improper language of the Scriptures,” and yet laud the “graceful allegory of the Pantheon.” For it is well known that most of the “improper language” referred to, is more owing to the age in which the Scriptures were translated, than to the originals; and that the rest is necessarily used merely to describe in the briefest manner, the rites and ceremonies of the Heathen nations around Judea, in order that their practice might be forbidden to the Jews—in other words, the “improper language” merely describes some of the “graceful allegory of the Pantheon,” to forbid its practice! The very worst—the most indelicate passage that can be selected from the whole Bible, will not compare in impropriety with any correct and definite description of even the public worship of the gods of Greece and Rome! much less with the private worship of their “refined polytheism.” And every classical scholar must admit that the actions attributed to, and applauded in, the gods and goddesses of those nations, excel in cruelty, obscenity and natural enormity the worst actions of the worst Jews named in the Old Testament.

But to descend to such particulars of Grecian and Roman worship as I may with propriety name, and our readers peruse—let us see what is this “graceful allegory”—this “refined polytheism”—so lauded by Gibbon and others, as superior to what Voltaire terms “the senseless superstition of Christianity.”

The most wicked and cruel rites universally practiced by the Heathen, was that of human sacrifices. Believing that earthquakes, pestilences, etc., were exhibitions of the wrath of their gods, seeking revenge, or means for satiating their thirst, for human blood, they soon conceived the idea of propitiating those blood-thirsty divinities by offering human victims, on their altars. In general, the sacrifices of slaves and captives of war, was deemed sufficient—but on extraordinary occasions the most valuable lives were thus offered up. We should doubt these facts were they not too well attested by many Heathen as well as Christian writers who witnessed them. “Porphyry says the Greeks sacrificed men when they went to war. Clemens Alexandrinus, says, that both Erectheus, king of Athens, and Marius, the Roman General, sacrificed their own daughters. Plutarch, in his life of Themistocles, relates that three beautiful Persian women, richly habited and adorned, were, by the advice of the prophet Euphrantides, offered as sacrifices to Bacchus,” at the commencement of the Persian war—“the people with one voice bringing the victims to the altar.” The same historian says, that the Romans, at the beginning of the war with the Gauls, buried alive a Gaulish man and woman, also a Greek man and woman, in the Ox-market, by way of sacrifice. Livy says they repeated this sacrifice at the beginning of the second Punic war. Porphyry says human sacrifices continued to be offered at Rome, till the reign of Adrian, who abolished them in most places. The same writer mentions, as a well known fact; that in the reign of Dioclesian, in the city of Rome itself, a man was always sacrificed at the feast of Jupiter Latiaris. At a festival in Sparta, boys were whipped with so much severity, on the altar of Diana, (the priestess superintending the act,) that they often died in consequence. This custom was instituted by Lycurgus, the great lawgiver, in exchange for the sacrifice of a man, every year, on the same altar, the oracle having only declared that the altar of that goddess must be sprinkled with human blood. There was also an altar of Bacchus in Arcadia, on which many young women were beaten with rods until they died. At Chios, and also at Tenedos, in Greece, when the sun entered Aries, they tore a man in pieces with their hands, after sacrificing him. But enough has been cited to prove that human sacrifices were common and frequent among the polished Greeks and Romans—and why? Their gods and goddesses were angry, malicious, blood-thirsty divinities, and required them—they worshipped, adored and invited these gods, and gave these sacrifices.

But this was not all. Read the lives of these divinities—their cruelties and lusts—their low amours, and their base violations of truth, honor and honesty, and then turn to the pages describing the rites with which these human sacrifices were offered up, and you will find scenes recorded which would disgrace a brothel—transacted in the temples of the divinities by the wise, the fair, the good, and the great of the nation!

Oh, God! it seems almost impossible that superstition could so debase thy creature man—thy most lovely workmanship woman—that the wise would become thus foolish—the good, thus depraved—the great, thus mean—but so it was, and it forms an everlastingly irrefutable evidence of the necessity of a revelation from Heaven—and of the superiority of the Bible, and its religion, (construe them as wickedly as their enemies may,) over all the wisdom of this world. When, therefore, I briefly inform you that every sensual vice severely punished by the laws of every Christian land, was actually required as a part of the worship of the greatest divinities of Greece and Rome—was almost daily, and certainly every year, practised in their temples by the priests, priestesses and worshippers, either privately, or publicly, or both—you will be prepared to admire the modest delicacy with which Paul has so very briefly hinted at the pollutions of Paganism in the commencement of his Epistle to the Romans. He could say no less—and it were improper for him to have said more. Let, then, those skeptics who laud “the refined polytheism of Greece and Rome,” no longer affect delicacy and blushes at this apostle’s very brief, yet accurate description of what they so much admire.

Now compare this with the worst records of the Bible—with those passages which the opponents of Christianity delight to quote in proof of its barbarity—and mark the difference.

Even admitting our common version of the Bible correct, in the rendering it gives of the trial of Abraham’s faith—it does the great Jehovah the justice to say that he rejected the sacrifice of Isaac with abhorrence—and that rejection stands immutable, as an everlasting token of God’s disapprobation of such inhuman worship. The sacrifice of Jephtha’s daughter is no exception—not even the common but improper view of the passage. She was not slain—she was merely sacrificed by a solemn dedication of her life to God, in perpetual virginity—in seclusion from all the world except the maidens of Israel, who, as the context informs us, often visited her in her lonely retreat. And even this sacrifice was made without the requisition of Jehovah—by her proud, rash, inflexible father. No—the God of Abraham asked no human blood to propitiate his malignity to the children of men—for he had none. The sacrifices he requires, are acts of well doing—deeds of peace and benignity.

The God of the Bible has no carnal, evil passions to gratify—need not violate every law of morality, honor, honesty and truth—for his whole nature is love—his whole providence, rectitude—his constant language, truth. And as pure as the divinity, so, according to their strength, was the fidelity of his ministers. They cut not themselves with lancets to cover, with their own gore, the altars at which they ministered. They mutilated not the bodies God created for and bestowed on them, to prove their devotedness to his service.

And how different their frank, honest sincerity from the philosophers of Greece and Rome! While Socrates condemned the superstitions of his countrymen, he yet, in his last hours, made a libation to the gods the mob worshipped, and ordered the sacrifice of a cock to Esculapius, the god of medicine.

Varro, while censuring in no mild or measured terms, the cruel and lascivious rites that were common in the worship of the several gods, says, “yet a wise man will observe all these things, not as acceptable to the gods, but as commanded by the laws.” In another place he speaks of what he calls “the ignoble rabble of the gods” which, as he says, “the superstition of ages has heaped together”—he says, “we so adore them (—this very “rabble of the gods”!)—as to remember that this worship is rather matter of custom, than founded on nature and truth”!

So far were these great and good men—these wise sages philosophers, as they are deemed by many who despise the humble apostles of Jesus—so far were they from common candor and public honesty, that they preferred hypocrisy to the enlightenment of the people, and the moral reformation of mankind. “They thought with the wise, but they acted with the vulgar” in every species of devotional indecency and criminality.

Had Jesus, and Paul, and Luther, and Murray acted on these principles, we might even now be bowing before gods of wood and stone, and sacrificing our infants and friends on their rude and gory altars, as preparatives to every sensual lust and crime that can debase humanity. But blessed be God, His are not only the thoughts of infinite wisdom, but his actions are in accordance therewith, and all his ways are goodness and truth!

“THE HARMLESS TUNKERS.”

The Tunkers are so called from the German word for dipping or immersing. They generally use trine immersion, or three times plunging of the body. Formerly, from their meekness, love of peace, and avoidance of all contention and strife, they very generally obtained the appellation at the head of this article—a negative, but in the state of society around them a glorious appellation. There is reason to believe that they, like many other sects, have woefully departed from their primitive simplicity and meekness in many particulars, and rely more on outward forms, and ceremonies, and a peculiar appearance to prove themselves the followers of Jesus, than in works meet for those calling themselves the children of light. Certain it is, that they are very scrupulous about such things as are outward and non-essential, while slander, and envy, and heart burnings and strife of words are frequent among their members. I speak only of certain portions of these people in Pennsylvania, of whom I have been able to receive information.

On one particular they have manifested, of late, a peculiar sensitiveness to the prejudices and sentiments of that very world to which it is their boast they are not conformed. It is well known to all acquainted with them in former times, and to the readers of ecclesiastical history, or the writings of Winchester, that, as a people, the Tunkers denied the dogma of endless misery, and held the doctrine of the restitution of all things. But since they have begun to seek “the praise of men, rather than the praise of God,” many of them manifest a strong inclination to deny their belief in this unpopular sentiment, and to forget that their fathers ever believed it. Preach it openly, perhaps they never did; but converse on it in private, freely, many of them delighted to do frequently, if testimony on this subject may be credited. And even while I can not justify their withholding a portion of “the whole counsel of God,” in their public labors, I must still consider it a mere trifle compared with an actual denial of a portion of the truth, and consequent hypocrisy. I again repeat that what I now say, relates merely to the knowledge I have obtained of a small portion of the denomination. And I utter it with no feelings of ill will, but rather of sorrow, and for the purpose of contrasting it with what I have lately learned of another portion of these our brethren in the faith of universal salvation.

By reference to the statistics of Universalism in this paper, and to the conversion of Br. Joseph Gipson, or Gibson, of Sangamon, Ill., it will be seen that he is claimed as a convert from the Tunkers. At the time of noticing this event, our readers may remember that I doubted any change in his sentiments, but merely supposed he had been convinced of the propriety of publicly preaching them. The following letter will show that he remains in his own church—that he and his brethren in Illinois need neither change here named, but are in public and in private believers in the restitution. The letter from which we extract is from an active and faithful agent, whose kindness has laid us under many obligations.

A. B. G.

“Pleasant Vale, Ill., January 23, 1837.

“Your correspondent of Sandy Creek, Ill., was mistaken about Br. Gipson, of Sangamon—he is yet of the Tunker church, but he holds to, and openly preaches the doctrine of universal salvation, which is held to and advocated by all the Tunkers in this country. They are Restorationists [or believers in a limited punishment after death.] The Rev. George Woolfe, of Adams county, says, that Br. Skinner expresses his views better than he could do it himself. These things you will allow me to know, for I belong to the same society myself.”

“Universalism has taken such a hold in the vicinity of Pleasant Vale, that the Partialists can do nothing with the people....The Methodists have left us....The Baptists sometimes come within our borders, but rather serve to build up our cause than to pull it down. In fine, nothing but a Universalist preacher, can effect any thing here. If one should come amongst us, I think he could soon form a society, and a house would soon follow of course. The people in this country generally exercise more freedom of thought and speech, than they do at the East—preachers are looked upon but as men, of like feelings and passions with ourselves.”

UNIVERSALIST STATISTICS,

For the last half of the year 1836.

ACCESSIONS IN THE MINISTRY.

JUNE—but omitted in the statement of that half year. R. M. Byram, G. W. Farr, G. W. Quinby, Abel Chandler, and F. W. Baxter, fellowshipped by the Maine Convention.

REV. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL.

I notice with regret—regret for Br. Sanderson's sake—a violent phillipic in the last Herald of Truth against this gentleman, in which he is compared to the Rev. J. R. Breckenridge, as on an equality with Mr. B. in candor, etc. That Mr. Campbell sinned against dignity and decency in his notice of Br. Potter and his congrega-tion, in Lockport, no one will deny—and that he violated truth for the sake of making himself appear greater than he really is, no one who has read both sides of the story, can doubt—but is Mr. Campbell habitually guilty of such low blackguardism? If not, he certainly can not be compared to Mr. Breckenridge—who is never decent in controversy, while Mr. Campbell has never yet been indecent in any controversy of his that I have ever read or heard of.

As to Mr. C's feat in calling for a vote of the con-gregation after his debate with Mr. Owen; if that is to make a man as unreasonable as a whirlwind, as Br. Sanderson declares, then there are many in our own denomination whom Br. S. highly esteems as honorable men, that must be set down as beyond the borders of sanity and candor. In thus writing I would by no means be understood as defending this condemned practice; but I really think that it is wrong to condemn a man's whole conduct, and blacken his whole character, be-cause he is guilty once in a great while of a wrong ac-tion. Neither myself nor Br. Sanderson could abide such a test; and we should be careful, for our own sakes, how we aid in establishing it as a test for the characters of others—"for with what measure you mete" etc.

"Then gently scan your brother man,
And gentler, sister woman,
Though each may gang a kennan wrang,
To stop aside is human."

A. B. G.

PHOO—PUFF—WHIZ!

Br. Zelotes Fuller, (not S. W. Fuller,) of Philadel-phia, Corresponding Editor of the Southern Pioneer, thus notices the discussion now in progress between Mr. Campbell and Br. Skinner. "The discussion will be published entire in the columns of this paper, [The Pioneer,] in successive numbers, commencing forthwith. We would thank the readers of the Pioneer, particularly in this city, (Philadelphia,) to circulate as extensively as possible the above information, as no doubt there are many here who will feel disposed to embrace the op-portunity that now offers for reading one of the most important, interesting and splendid controversies that has ever come before the Christian world in any age." (!!!)

Then follows an earnest exhortation for new subscri-bers to apply immediately that they may know how many extra copies to print of the numbers containing the discussion, etc. Yet—would you believe it, reader?—this puff—puff—puff in no place contains any hint to inform its readers that the discussion will not be original in the Pioneer, or that it will originally appear in this paper!

Suppose the modest "senior clergyman of Pennsyl-vania," (hem!) whose meekness can not bear to be seen through concave spectacle glasses, (hem!) takes to him-self the credit of conducting both sides of this "most im-portant, interesting and splendid controversy that has ever come before the Christian world in any age"—the credit of publishing it in his "accredited organ of Uni-versalism"—the benefit of all subscriptions procured by the same, and all the honors, and glories, and splendors arising in, out, of, by, from, or to the same, forever, and ever! What says our humble and venerable senior?

A. B. G.

THE SERMON.

We present our readers with another sermon this week, (we mention this, not to apologise for publishing the sermon, by any means, for we believe a good act requires no apology,) making two sermons in as many weeks. The reason is that Br. Montgomery wanted to retain the manuscript, and hence, while he was here, we could publish the sermon and return him the manu-script before his departure. This circumstance will ac-count for the unavoidable delay of some other articles—particularly one by Apollos, which will appear in our next. A. B. G.

COUNTERFEIT NOTES.—Will our friends and agents see that they remit good money! If not judges them-selves, they can get some one to examine it for them. We sometimes receive counterfeit notes, and have to re-turn them, disagreeable as it is to do so—when, some-times the sender has forgotten all about it. This is a delicate—yea, a disagreeable situation to be placed in—yet it is not our fault. A little care will prevent it.

A REQUEST.

The P. M. at Indianapolis, Ia., informs us that Solo-mon Washer, who owes us $2 75 for the Magazine and Advocate, has gone to some other country—Can any of our friends tell us where said Washer has gone?

G. and H.

Br. Tompkins—Credit Mrs. A. Abbot, Arkport, Steuben county, N. Y., $2 00, paid to me—possibly she is a new subscriber. Also, send present volume of the Repository to Miss Sarah L. Wadsworth, Frederick-town, Knox county, Ohio—paid me $2 00.

Br. Whittemore—Credit Norman Morrison, Oneida Castle, N. Y., $5 00—Also, Lyman Corbin, Frederick-town, Knox county, Ohio, $2 00—and charge

A. B. G.

Br. Sanderson—Please send the Herald, with back numbers, to John Hodgson, Baldwinsville, at his request.

A. B. G.

Br. Price—Send current volume of the Union to Ebenezer Whipple, Jr., Meadville, and Asa Holcomb, Sr., Cussewaga, both of Crawford county, Pa. They have paid me $4 00. This notice was sent some time ago, but as the papers do not reach them, perhaps it was not received by you. They wish their papers mailed at Philadelphia, to save postage. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in March by Br. ASPINWALL in the brick school house, East Mar-tinsburg—Br. C. S. BROWN in Herford—Br. D. SKIN-ner at Norridge Corners—Br. M. B. SMITH in Cort-land village, and in Homer in the evening—Br. BRIT-ton in Hounsfield, near Br. Bagg's, at 10 A. M., at Br. McWain's at 2 P. M., and at Pillar Point in the eve-ning—Br. Sias at Lockport, and at Great Bend in the evening—Br. WAGGONER in Eatonville, and in Frank-fort in the evening—Br. HICKS in Fort Plain—Br. L. C. BROWNE in Newville and at Paine's Hollow in the evening—Br. O. ROBERTS in Le Roy—Br. BULLARD in Perryville, and at Clockville in the evening—Br. BIDDLECOM at Graves Hollow, Russia, and at Cold Brook in the evening—Br. GUILD at Harpersville at 11, A. M.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in March by Br. C. S. BROWN in Lisle—Br. BRITTON in Depauville at 10 A. M., near Br. J. Barney's at 2 P. M., and in Clayton in the evening—Br. Sias in South Champion, and in Copenhagen in the evening—Br. WAGGONER in Cedarville—Br. O. ROBERTS in Lewiston—Br. BODEN in Morrisville.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in March by Br. C. S. BROWN in Otselic village—Br. GUILD in Walton.

Br. E. E. GUILD will preach in the evenings of Tues-day, February 28th, in Harpersfield—Wednesday, March 1st, in East Davenport—March 2d, at Daven-port Centre.

* * The friends of Universalism in the above places and in Harpersfield and Walton, for special purposes, are requested to attend the meetings above noticed.—[Union, please copy.]

Br. O. ROBERTS will preach in the evenings of Fri-day March 3d, in Wheatland—10th, in Lockport, as Br. Johnson may appoint.

Br. J. French will preach at Denmark, during the year, on the first and third Sundays in each month—for the fourth Sunday in each month he is engaged at the Field Settlement for the present—and for the re-mainder of his time, he is not engaged any where.

Br. BULLARD will preach in the evenings of March 3d, in Cazenovia—6th, Durhamville.

CONFERENCES.—Universalist Conferences will be held, at McLean, and another in the Presbyterian meet-ing-house at Columbus Centre, on Wednesday and Thursday, March 1st and 2d. Ministering brethren are invited to attend.

MORAL AND MENTAL CULTURE NECESSARY TO NATIONAL PROSPERITY.

BY J. T. GOODRICH.

It is interesting to contemplate the progress of human society. For this purpose we must peruse the pages of history, and examine the condition of man in all situations, times and places. From the morning of creation to the period when the Grecian States enjoyed the invaluable blessings of liberty, we find the world subjected to severe penal laws to subdue and restrain the baser passions of uncultivated nature from acts of violence and cruelty. Intelligence and virtue had slowly progressed, and science had little advanced until then, when a few nations were destined to enjoy, for a short time, the blessings of freedom. But soon tyranny was entwined therewith, and the people returned to their former standing among the nations of the earth. Ambitious men arose, who were willing to rend the republics asunder, if they could but preside over one of its bloody fragments; and in their strife for power, they embarrassed every operation of their governments. The time had not yet arrived in which would be developed the legitimate fruits of virtue and intelligence. These republics had not yet learned that unity of feeling, and the highest state of moral, and mental culture, and that only, could render them prosperous and happy.

Thus examples are adduced of nations, who, having arisen to the highest pinnacle of eminence, sunk to the lowest depths of degradation, by neglecting to cultivate virtue and knowledge. Once let these wither and die, and nothing can save a people from destruction. Demosthenes with all the powers of resistless and overwhelming eloquence, could not save his country from destruction, after these qualities had disappeared.—Wherever a nation has become educated, enlightened and virtuous, laws are mild, equitable and firm, and justice is administered in its purity. From the fall of these republics through succeeding ages, tyranny unmolested ruled the world, and sat as a paralyzing incubus upon all human improvement. The cause of liberty keeps exact pace with moral and mental culture. And when these slumber, unconscious of their mighty powers, the dark clouds of ignorance and superstition gather and burst with ten-fold violence over the head of man. The present condition of these nations is gloomy in the extreme. Where now is Rome, once "mistress of all Italy," "that stood upon her seven hills, and from her throne of beauty ruled the world"? Where now is Carthage, that ruled two hundred cities; or Thebes with her hundred gates? They are fallen! Their glory has departed. Time's withering finger, has written decay, upon their crumbling ruins. Such is the present condition of those nations, once the seats of the muses, where the historian and the poet, the statesman and the patriot flourished; the scenes of classical recollections and of hallowed associations, where the genius of the world weeps beneath the ruined fane of antiquity. There, in those degraded nations, ignorance broods undisturbed, and vice in her most hideous forms stalks abroad, and spreads her blighting influence o'er the land.

The glorious work of moral and mental culture having been overthrown, revolving centuries witnessed a retrograde movement, revolting in the highest degree to the feelings of every philanthropist. The dense fogs of ignorance and superstition filled the moral atmosphere, and scarce one ray of light could penetrate its depths and guide the wandering mind. Brute force was again introduced, and the rack, the scaffold, the gibbet, the inquisition, and every torture, which human ingenuity could devise, were employed to repress the little intelligence and spirit of freedom that remained.

Turn your eyes to Spain, Portugal, or again to Italy, and see the inquisitions which were there established in all their bloody horrors. After inflicting the most excruciating pain that can be endured, the fortune of the sufferer falls under the excess of torture, and in the agony of the moment he yields to all they desire. Another victim suffers the most intense misery, until nature seems to be nearly exhausted. Then these diabolical operations are suspended for a moment, and the sufferer is asked if he will renounce his principles. With the little strength he has remaining, and with a glance of deadly hatred and defiance, he sternly answers, "No."

With raging fires you may consume
This body—but 'my soul—
The proud, free soul my Maker gave,
You never can control."

Thus you see the effect of restraining the free exercise of the mental faculties. To shackle the understanding is like extinguishing the sun; for all that can render life a blessing is destroyed. Should we not, since such are the consequences, in the language of the immortal Jefferson, "proclaim eternal hostility to every form of tyranny over the mind of man"? As every drop of water increases the size of the mighty ocean, so every item of tyranny swells the amount of vice and misery existing in the world.

Having seen the condition of man before he emerged from the prison in which the ignorance of the dark ages confined him, we now turn our attention to more cheering scenes and happier prospects. The contact of mind with mind, and the progress of mental culture since that period, have been and are producing wonderful results. Compare the condition of the world three centuries past, with the present state of things, and who does not perceive a great, an astonishing change? Then a few individuals inspired with a holy zeal for religious truth and freedom, raised their united voices against the hollow pretensions and wicked practices of papal intolerance. Then the great, the virtuous, the immortal Luther, with a few other less brilliant luminaries, stemmed the tide of popularity, and in spite of faggots, gibbets, or other tortures—in defiance of the frowns of a wicked, bigoted and degraded world, dared to draw from the fountain of eternal truth. Yes, Luther, regardless of all but his conscience and his Maker, steps forward as a defender of the natural, mental and religious rights of man. Most glorious epoch in the history of the world! When the bands of superstition that had held mankind, from the time of the degeneracy of Christianity, in worse than Egyptian bondage, were severed, and the mind was left to expand without control! Brightest era of mental emancipation! At that time error began to feel the power of truth, superstition to vanish like the mist of the morning, ignorance to recede before the resplendent beams of the sun of science. At that time commenced the progress of information, which still moves triumphantly on, rejoicing in the new accessions of strength she is constantly receiving.

Turn we now to our beloved country, where the new spirit of the old world found a more congenial soil, from which moral and mental power arose, and shone with cloudless splendor upon new and independent nations. What a joyful prospect—when thirteen independent States were cemented together in the strong and indissoluble bonds of union! Then the sacred fire of patriotism, kindled by virtue and intelligence, burned with heavenly and benign influence. Freedom of speech and freedom of the press, is ringing from every quarter. The great and glorious work of moral and mental culture is and must be onward. Though we possess all the wealth of India, yet if we are destitute of freedom all will avail us nothing. Though we are strangers to wealth and the honors it can purchase, if we possess the blessing of freedom we are contented, and contentment is felicity. And freedom can never exist without virtue and intelligence.

Moral and mental culture is continually elevating the condition of mankind. The sun of liberty is shining brighter and brighter, and the voice of freedom will soon echo through the world. Yes, freedom in her primitive purity, will ride in triumph over nations—push her victories o'er all the world, and bring its inhabitants to bow with willing hearts to her mild and peaceful sceptre. Then the prison doors of the mind will be opened, and the captive freed. Then the golden pivot, philosophers sought in vain, will be obtained. Then the strong arm of physical power will no longer be necessary to enforce the principles of justice. Then thrones shall crumble into dust, the abased be exalted, the exalted be abased, and all men be brought to one common level, possessing equal rights and privileges, and universal nature cleansed from ten thousand pollutions, shall burst forth in songs of rapture.

Already have the arts been discovered which will greatly facilitate education and the diffusion of knowledge over every part of the globe. The printing press and the steam engine are agents which will do more than all the boasted virtue of the philosopher's stone can do. The generations as they rise up before my mental eye, bear the golden tiaras of knowledge bright about their brows, and the halo which liberty alone can inspire glows around their countenances. Education, the second great former of the human mind, has gone forth like the dove from the ark, and has found a place to rest her foot, and she will not return until she has elevated and ennobled the human race. Then ignorance and vice shall no longer find a lurking place in the bosom of man; for the sun of science shall illumine the world with his golden beams of light.

"Come, bright improvement, on the ear of time,
O come, and rule the world from clime to clime!
The handmaid arts shall every wild explore,
Trace every wave, and culture every shore.
Where barbarous hordes on Scythian mountains roam,
Fair science—freedom—yet shall find a home.
Where'er degraded nature weeps and pines,
From Guinea's coast to cold Siberia's mines,
Shall science light unfashioned darkness there,
And chase the dreadful tortures of despair."

MARRIAGES.

In this city, February 15, by Rev. Mr. Wilkes, Mr. Thomas M. OWENS, to Miss SARAH SINCLAIR, all of this city.

DEATHS.

In Manheim, January 12, Mr. JOHN PICKERT, aged 60 years—for the last fifteen years of which he was a firm believer in God's impartial grace. He died rejoicing in this hope, and exhorting those around him, "Mourn not for me; for I am happy." The funeral was attended on the 14th, and a discourse delivered from 2 Kings xx: 1. W. H. W.

In Chesterfield, N. H., December 21, 1836, of dropsy, Mrs. AMANDA BRITTON, consort of Mr. Lyman Britton, and daughter of Mr. John Pierce. She has left an infant daughter. It is a consolation to her bereaved husband to believe that she now enjoys that eternal inheritance, which is not according to our works, but according to the grace and purpose of God, given us in Christ Jesus before the world began. 2 Tim. i: 9. J. B., Jr.

In Alexandria, Jefferson county, on the 19th of January, after a short illness, Mrs. MARY S. DOOLITTLE, wife of Captain Jesse S. Doolittle. Mrs. D. was faithful in all the duties of life, much respected by all her acquaintance, and has left a bereaved companion and many friends to mourn their loss. Her funeral was numerously attended on the 11th ult.

In Watertown, very suddenly, on the 19th of January, Mrs. AMELIA A. STREETER, consort of Mr. N. W. Streeter, aged 27 years. A bereaved companion and four small children are left to feel their affliction in all its severity, while many sincere friends deeply sympathize with the afflicted family. Amiable, moral and religious, sister S. had the confidence and respect of all who knew her. Strong in the faith of the Gospel of impartial grace, and zealous in the cause of God, she was an ornament to the church to which she belonged, and society will long cherish her remembrance with mournful joy. A large concourse of attentive hearers joined in the solemnities of her funeral.

"Weep not for her! By fleet or slow decay
It never grieved her bosom's core to mark
The playmates of her childhood wane away,
Her prospects wither and her hopes grow dark.
Translated by her God, with spirit shriven,
See passed as 't were, on smiles from earth to heaven:
Weep not for her!"

In Watertown, February 2d, Mrs. MARY ANN HOLCOMB, consort of Mr. Hiram H. Holcomb, aged 28 years. Sister H. possessed all those qualities of mind and heart, which qualified her for the performance of the various duties of domestic and social life, and endeared her to all her acquaintance. During a long, protracted and painful sickness, she exercised true Christian resignation, and died strong in the faith that she should meet all her friends, with a redeemed world, in the peaceful climes of immortality. Her companion and three small children, with parents and connexions, are left to deplore their loss. An overflowing congregation united in the melancholy services of her funeral.

"Weep not for her! She is an angel now,
And treads the sapphire floors of paradise,
All darkness wiped from her resurgent brow,
Sin, sorrow, suffering, banished from her eyes;
Victorious over death, to her appear,
The vista'd joys of heaven's eternal year:
Weep not for her!" P. M.

In Lancaster, Pa., January 30th, after a few days severely painful illness, Mrs. MAGDALENA ROHRER, wife of John Rohrer, Esq., in the 56th year of her age. Having for several months been an inmate of the family, and enjoyed an acquaintance of about fourteen years with this worthy and estimable lady, I can not but sympathize deeply with the survivors in their loss—a loss to all who knew her—but to her, I trust, a gain unspeakable. May this consolation soothe their sorrows, and a remembrance and imitation of her virtues mitigate melancholy pleasure with their grief. A. B. G.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER V.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

ON READING.

In my last chapter, I treated generally on the importance and benefits of reading. I now resume the subject.

The manner of reading, is an important consideration. It is generally supposed that those who read the greatest number of books, must possess the most knowledge. But this does not necessarily follow. An individual may peruse whole libraries, and be but little wiser for his labor. It is no difficult task to run hastily through a publication, neither is it a profitable one. The amount of knowledge obtained from books, does not so much depend on the number perused, as the manner in which they are read. To accomplish the object of reading, it is evidently necessary that you should obtain the scope of the ideas of the author you are perusing. You should become familiar with the manner and peculiarities of his expression. It is also obvious, that to obtain benefit from reading, it should be performed slowly and with deliberation. Never permit yourselves to read without reflection. No knowledge can be obtained in this manner. It is like endeavoring to gather water with a sieve, or in the quaint language of a certain author, "it is like laboriously stooping to pick up chips, only to let them fall again." It is much better to read but a few pages at a time, and understand them, than hastily to glide through a book without treasuring up any useful knowledge. Thinking should always accompany reading. The latter without the former, amounts to nothing. And yet there is no habit more liable to grow upon the young reader, than while the eye is skimming over the page, to allow the mind to be wandering away, absorbed in some thought wholly disconnected with the subject before them. This habit is an unfortunate one. It weakens the intellect, distracts the mind, and fills it with confusion and anarchy—and it should, therefore, be strongly guarded against. The attention and thoughts, should be brought under the strict command of the will. If they fly off in pursuit of some wild vagary, they should be instantly called back, and all their powers concentrated on the page which you are perusing. Then you hold communion with the author, and are benefited. But without this attention, the book may as well be closed.

If, in reading a sentence or paragraph, you fail to obtain the meaning of the author, repeat it, and if necessary, again and again—leave it not until you fully comprehend the idea he would convey. In this manner you will often find a treasure, where at first glance you could discover nothing of importance. If your author furnishes a new thought, cease reading for a moment, and ponder upon it—turn it frequently in your mind—observe its bearing and tendencies, and its applicability to subjects in which you are interested. Thus you will often enter upon a train, which will lead to new fields of interesting and useful reflection. As you can not expect to retain in your memory the entire contents of a book, impress upon your minds the most prominent and valuable portion of its instructions. And to this end, after having finished its perusal, reflect upon its whole contents, and ascertain what new and peculiar views you have obtained. It is a useful practice of many readers, to note in a blank book or memorandum, such sentences or ideas as are deemed of sufficient importance; and they are thus saved for future application. This method I would recommend to such as have time or opportunity to pursue it.

A valuable blank book, called the "Index-Remum," for the purpose of forming an index to the subjects of which you read; and in which you may note the volume and page of any work in which any particular subject is treated, for future reference; will be found particularly valuable, to the student, the professional man, or, indeed to any who may have occasion often to refer to what they have perused. Its author, or rather its inventor, is the Rev. John Todd, now of Philadelphia, the author of "The Student's Manual," another excellent work for the same classes—excepting a very few remarks rather sectarian in their bias.

Another consideration of the utmost weight, relates to the selection of books. The importance of this subject, can not be too strongly impressed upon the minds of the young. The sentiments conveyed in publications read by youth, must exercise a sensible influence over them, for good or evil. Books of an immoral and licentious tendency, should be avoided as the poisonous Upas. No youth can read them without inflicting a leprous stain upon their minds, which will tend decidedly to evil. Consider those companions your enemies, who recommend such works to your notice. Turn a deaf ear to their advice, and strictly avoid their example.

In noticing the character of works proper for your perusal, I can not refrain from directing your attention, first of all, to that "Book of books," the Bible. Sir William Jones, one of the most learned men of his day, wrote on the blank leaf of his Bible, the following sentence—"I have carefully and regularly perused these holy Scriptures, and am of opinion that the volume independent of its divine origin, contains more sublimity, purer morality, more important history, and finer strains of eloquence, than can be collected from all other books, in whatever language they may have been written." Let this invaluable volume be often and faithfully perused—let its contents, especially its moral and doctrinal teachings be deeply impressed upon your minds, as the only perfect guide that can lead to a faithful discharge of duty towards your Father in heaven, and your fellow-beings. Well written books and other publications, relating to the doctrinal and moral truths of the Scriptures, should also engage a due proportion of your attention, as calculated to purify your hearts and enlighten your minds. Paley's Natural Theology, and his Horæ Paulinæ, and works of a similar character, tending to strengthen the convictions of the truth of Christianity, should be read by every youth.

Here, perhaps, I ought to remark, that all standard works, pertaining to or connected with your destined pursuits in life, should engage the next place in your studies. As these will vary according to those pursuits, and as you can never be at a loss for more able and experienced advisers than I can be, I dismiss this consideration with the remark, that you should, by no means, confine yourselves to these works alone; but give them your chief and best hours, seeking relaxation from their perusal in such other works as I now shall name.

History is a very important branch of general study. Mavor's Universal History, is a large and expensive work—but an excellent compendium. Bigland's Letters on History, is as brief as the other is voluminous. The amount of leisure, and pecuniary means you possess, (if remote from a public library,) must determine for you, which of these, or of the following works you will peruse. They, all, are well worth perusal, and are recommended to your notice. History of the Jews, by Flavius Josephus, Rollin's Ancient History, Gillie's Greece, Frost's History of Greece, Ferguson's Roman Republic, The Annals of Tacitus, Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, bearing in mind that he is a cold sneerer at Christianity, even while pretending to advocate it in the form held by the church of England; Hume's England, continued by Smollet; Robertson's Histories, particularly of Charles the Fifth, and of the Discovery and Settlement of America, Irving's Conquest of Grenada, Mackintosh's England, Russell's Modern Europe, Baines' History of the Wars of the French Revolution, American edition on account of the notes, Ramsay's History of the American Revolution, and Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History. In biographical works you will also find much historical information, blended with a display of human character. I would therefore recommend you to read, in connexion with the foregoing, the lives of any great men who figure prominently in them—particularly Voltaire's Life of Charles XII, of Sweden, a fine specimen of a good style; Marshall's Life of Washington, Spark's Lives of Franklin, Ledyard, and his Washington papers; Irving's Columbus, and his Voyages and Discoveries of the Companions of Columbus, Southey's Nelson, Wirt's Life of Patrick Henry, and Lives of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence.—Others might be named, but the advice of the wise and virtuous, and the references made in these works, will unite in guiding you to all else that can be necessary to your instruction in this important branch of reading.

Such works as Buffon's Natural History, Goldsmith's Animated Nature, Good's Book of Nature, Arnot's Physics, Wood's Mosaic Creation, Treatises on Botany and Chemistry, and publications on Experimental Philosophy, can be read with much profit and amusement. The Art of Being Happy, from the French of Droz, with notes by Timothy Flint, is a work full of valuable instruction to the young. Combe on the Constitution of Man is one of the most valuable publications that has issued from the press in many years. I would earnestly recommend its perusal to all whose eye meets these lines—it will richly repay you.

Of poetry, there are comparatively but few entire works that can be safely recommended to the young. Pope has many beauties, intermingled with much that is decidedly of an immoral tendency; and the same may be said of Burns, Byron and Moore. But there can be no hesitancy in recommending Milton, Cowper, Young—making due allowance for their religious peculiarities—Scott, Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge, Campbell, Beattie, Thomson, Bryant, Mrs. Hemans, and Mrs. Sigourney.

In relation to the propriety or impropriety of perusing novels and other works of fiction, much has been said on either side. There can be no doubt that our book-stores and libraries are flooded with works of this character, that are extremely insipid, and of a tendency highly deleterious.—That works of fiction of a proper character, can be safely and beneficially read by the young, I have no hesitancy in declaring. But you must be cautious in your selections. None should be read but those of a purely moral tendency, and such as are illustrative of historical truths. Of the former, I would mention particularly those of Mrs. Opie, Miss Edgeworth, and Miss Martineau. Of the latter may be enumerated the Misses Porter's, the most of Scott's, a few of Bulwer's—especially his Rienzi—several by Cooper, Miss Sedgewick, and Mr. Simms. Many of Irving's lighter works are of an entertaining character, and may be profitably read—particularly his late productions, A Tour on the Priaries, and Astoria.

In reading works of fiction, keep your mind constantly fixed on the delineations of character—mark the shades of difference between them, the different operation of external circumstances on them, and the different motives that actuate them—and apply all to the purposes of self-examination and self-improvement. When the work is historical, read it in connexion with that portion of history to which it refers, and with that portion of geography which describes its location, and carefully note what is fictitious, and what is real. If I mistake not, Chambers' Memoir of the Prince, Chevalier Charles Stuart, will make you doubly interested, even in Scott's interesting Scottish novels relating to that individual—and so of others.

Fear of protracting this chapter beyond the bounds of your patience, prevented me from naming many other works worthy of your perusal, with comments on their merits, and directions for more fully availing yourselves of their interest and benefits. But what is here offered will suffice, probably, to direct you, until experience sufficient will be attained to render further direction from me of doubtful necessity.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE PROMISES OF GOD.

BY MRS. CYRENA MERRY.

"And God said unto Abraham, in thee, and thy seed, shall all families" and "all kindreds of the earth be blessed." Here appears to be a promise which is universal in extent, and which applies to every individual of the human race, even all families and all kindreds. This promise was made by Jehovah himself; and not only so, but "God, willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath, and because he could swear by no greater he swore by himself." So says Paul, Heb. vi: 13, 17. And now the question arises, What is the nature of this blessing which extends unto all, and for the performance of which God has so firmly pledged his veracity? Shall we understand it to consist in temporal things, or in spiritual? Doubtless many would say, (and I have frequently heard it asserted by those who believe that God does not dispense his spiritual blessings to any except an elect few,) that these are temporal blessings, and must be so understood, because they are so universally extended to all nations, families and kindreds, and of course every individual is to partake, and is included in this promise. But I must take the liberty to dissent from the above view of the subject, and think the Scriptures will support me in so doing. Let us then appeal to Scripture to decide this very important matter. I say important, because I believe much, very much depends on the decision of this point.

Paul says, Gal. iii: 16, 17, 18, "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made." And he expressly says, that this seed to which God had reference, and in, and through whom these blessings were to flow to mankind, is Christ. And he goes on to state, that this promise or covenant was confirmed by God in Christ, four hundred and thirty years before the law was given to Moses. "Nevertheless the law can not disannul the promise, or make it of none effect. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise." And again, Rom. iv: 13, 16, Paul speaking of the promise made to Abraham and his seed, says, they should inherit the world. He does not say, a part of the world, but the world. I should infer from this, that the whole world is included in the promise. Again, Heb. i: 2, "God hath, in these last days, spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things." And it is not to be through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. For if they which are of the law be heirs, faith is made void, and the promise made is of none effect. Therefore it is of faith, that it might be by grace. And again, Gal. iii: 8, "And the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the Heathen through faith, preached before the Gospel unto Abraham, saying, in thee shall all nations be blessed." Again verses 13, 14, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us, that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ, that we might receive the promise of the spirit through faith."

Thus, I think, enough has been quoted to convince any unprejudiced mind, who will read with attention, that these blessings which were to flow to us in and through Christ the promised seed, were spiritual blessings; and also, that they are universally to extend to each, and to all families, kindreds, tongues and nations. For Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us. And for what? that the blessing of Abraham might descend unto us, through himself, that we might receive the promise of the spirit through faith. And blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings, "Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children, by Jesus Christ, to himself"—"And having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him." And again, Heb. ii: 8, "Thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet. For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. But now we see not yet all things put under him. But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor, that he, by the grace of God, should taste death for every man."

Dear reader, although as the apostle saith, we see not yet all things put under him, or brought into a voluntary subjection to his will and government; yet rest assured the time is hastening on, when all shall know the Lord, from the least to the greatest. When the Jews, together with the fulness of the Gentiles, shall be brought into the enjoyment of this Gospel covenant, which was established upon the blessed promises that God made to Abraham and his seed, and there shall be but one fold and one shepherd. For he will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will he remember no more. Yes, reader, I would say unto you, be not weak in faith, and stagger not at the promise of God, through unbelief, but be strong in faith giving glory to God; being fully persuaded that what he has promised he is able also to perform. For he saith, "As the rain cometh down, and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud: so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing where I sent it." And when the Son of God, who is appointed heir of all things, was sent into the world, he said, "Lo, I come to do thy will, O God." And the prophet saith of him, "The pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand. He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied."

Let me ask, what can satisfy the righteous and benevolent soul of the blessed Son of God—he who suffered an ignominious death and gave his life a ransom for all—he who through all his life went about doing good, and performing acts of love and kindness; giving sight to the blind, setting at liberty them that were bruised, healing the broken-hearted, and above all, preaching the Gospel to the poor? Yes, thank God, he was sent to preach the Gospel to the poor—that Gospel which was proclaimed by the heavenly messenger on the plains of Bethlehem, when he said unto the shepherds, "Fear not; for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." This was the doctrine which he taught; this was the Gospel that he preached to the poor. Ah, yes; the blessed Saviour even wept on account of the temporal calamity which hung over Jerusalem, and which befel them in consequence of their wickedness. But he tells them, there is a time coming when they shall say, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." What—I ask again—what will satisfy the soul of him who could do all this; nay, more, who could say of his cruel and unrelenting murderers, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do"! O, what exalted benevolence, what heavenly love, what unfeigned pity he manifested through all his life! This, reader, is the promised seed of Abraham—this is the proclaimed Saviour, who shall save his people from their sins—this is the great Mediator and heir of all things—this is the Son of God, and the sinner's friend. And it is he who shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied. And is it possible, or can we believe for one moment, that any thing short of the salvation of all for whom he paid a ransom, will or can satisfy his soul? O no, it cannot be!

It draws forth tears of joy and unfeigned gratitude, while I reflect, that I—that you, reader—and that all the world have such a friend—such a mediator, and such a redeemer; who has paid the great debt by giving himself a ransom for all, to be testified in due time: and who, after that he had offered one sacrifice for sins, forever sat down on the right hand of God, from henceforth expecting, till his enemies are brought to bow in humble and voluntary subjection to his will. For he must reign, till all things are subdued unto him. And then cometh the end, when the Son also, himself, shall become subject to his God and to our God, to his Father and our Father, "that God may be all in all." "For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things, to whom be glory for ever and ever."

"GOOD MORNING."

BY REV. T. J. TENNEY.

Good morning, Br. Grosh!—ay, good morning; for see, the Sun of Righteousness has risen—His rays are penetrating the darkness, and dispelling error, and filling the world with the glories of heaven. Good morning.

Good morning, Br. Grosh. How beautiful—delightful to contemplate the onward progress of the happy kingdom. It is not now as formerly "Like angel visits, few and far between," but often that we are greeted with the blissful appearances of a soul, filled "With the fulness of God."

Stout-hearted opposers are filled with love and the goodness that leadeth to repentance; and we already hear them declaring—"How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings—that publisheth peace—that saith unto Zion, thy God reigneth." Good morning.

Good morning, Br. Grosh. Blessed—all blessed be the great I AM. Soon will he deliver us from corruption to incorruption—from dishonor to glory—from weakness to power—from the sorrows of earth to the bliss of heaven. Soon, O soon, shall we join our friends in the enjoyment of the "inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeth not away"—in the ascription of "blessing and honor, and glory, and power unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."

One Shepherd and one fold—one Father, and one family,

"All blessing, and all blessed."

"Glory to God on high;
Forever bless his name;
Let earth, and seas, and sky,
His wondrous love proclaim.
To him be praise and glory given
By all on earth, and all in heaven."

PORTRAIT OF A RELIGIOUS FAIR.

Br. GROSH—Did you ever attend a fashionable, modern, religious fair? No? Then I will essay to give an outline description.

Hand bills were posted in all public places, stating "The Ladies' charitable society of —, will hold a Fair on the — Inst., for the purpose of purchasing the Rev. Mr. — a cloak, procuring a chandelier for the new church, and cushioning the pulpit." The time arrived, and I repaired, out of idle curiosity (and, I confess with shame, somewhat against conscience,) to the place. In one corner of the capacious hall, which was a dancing room, I observed "Rev. Mr. —" with the deacons and officers of his society, in a whispering consultation, the subject of which I soon learned to be, the propriety or impropriety of opening the exercises with prayer. It was at last decided to be inexpedient. At this I was somewhat surprised, as the Rev. gentleman was remarkably tenacious of the custom of public prayer, and very forward in obtruding his devotional services on all occasions. He had denounced the Universalists in the neighborhood, for omitting it in the business meetings of their society and in their singing schools. Here, for once, at an assembly for religious objects, he saw fit to dispense with the exercise.

This matter being disposed of, the "performance" commenced. By the politeness of a friend, I was furnished with a written hand-bill, containing the order of the evening. First came on "The Sale of Fancy Articles for Pious Objects." (I quote from the hand-bill.) Bless us, what a variety! A very beautiful and accomplished lady of my acquaintance now appeared as salesman—or rather, as saleswoman. "Gentlemen, here is a splendid set of egg-shell cups and saucers, with gilt edges, and flowered inside, only twelve shillings." Purchased immediately by Deacon C. "And here is a dozen elegant muslin night-caps, tied with red ribbon and ornamented with a bow of the same material. They are designed exclusively for gentlemen's use. Only a dozen—a dollar apiece—who bids?" "I, I, I," exclaimed two dozen voices. They were soon distributed. "O, here is another dozen, which was overlooked. We can supply the gentlemen who bid for the others." These were also distributed.

"And here, gentlemen, is the finest article in our whole stock—a splendid artificial kitten. With a little more finishing, it would almost catch a mouse. Not being able to fix a price upon so valuable an article, we leave the gentlemen to bid, not doubting the most gallant will bear away the prize, when we inform them that it is the work of a lady they all admire, and the result of a week's hard labor." "This reminds me of the fable of the mountain in labor," said a wag at my elbow. "Who knows but this kitten, the result of a week's hard labor is designed to catch the mouse brought forth by the mountain." The kitten, however, was really a curiosity. It was stuffed with wool, covered with a kind of plush; with the ears and tail of a real kitten which fell a martyr to the manufacture; eyes ingeniously wrought with yellow silk, much resembling nature; and a few swine's bristles thrust through the nose. After much bidding, it was struck off to Mr. L. at ten dollars. I doubt not the ladies remembered him for their devotions at the next weekly female prayer meeting.

Next in order was the "Cake and Ring." A small cake was produced, cut into thirty-two pieces, at a shilling a slice, and said to contain a ring. The saleswoman informed us that the Young Gipsy, who would soon appear, had declared that the gentleman who should be so fortunate as to purchase the piece containing the ring, would unquestionably be married before the expiration of the year. It was soon disposed of, several gentlemen purchasing two or three slices apiece.

Now came the "Wheel of Fortune, and Fortune telling by the Young Gipsy, late from Austria." A singular machine was now brought forward, consisting of a wheel, with a crank, and having large figures painted on the rim. Where it came from I know not; but some worldly minded people have hinted that there is a room in the public house where the Fair was held, where some of the gentlemen present at the fair, occasionally staked their spare change, by way of amusement. After the wheel, came the "Young Gipsy"—a slenderly formed, light-footed creature, ingeniously apparelled a la gipsy; with long black hair floating carelessly over the shoulders; a green habit, extending downward to the waist; a short scarlet petticoat, and white stockings. Notwithstanding the ingenuity of the disguise, I could easily recognize in the voice, air and movement, the "admiral" fabricator of the kitten—the beautiful Miss —, a teacher in the Sabbath-school. The gipsy now advanced with the irresistibly graceful air of a Taglioni, and commenced singing in a voice of thrilling sweetness,

"O'er the ocean wave I come,
From my transatlantic home,
My art is the dark necromance;
For a shilling a piece,
All your doubts I'll release,
Thou gentlemen and ladies advance."

As she closed, the gentlemen all rushed forward to learn their future destinies. But the gipsy told them she could augur nothing unless the gentleman should stand beside a lady. Each gentleman now rushed to secure a partner. This achieved, each paid his two shillings, wrote his own name and that of his lady, on a slip of paper, placed the slip upon one of the figures painted on the rim of the wheel—the gipsy gave the wheel a turn, and the fortunes came out in pairs. All were to be married, and, in general, speedily. One gentleman, however, a wealthy bachelor, was to have no children, and was counselled by the Fates to make a handsome donation to the "Ladies Charitable Society," to enable them to purchase materials for the next "Fair."

Next was announced the "Post Office." A large table surmounted by a small desk, was placed in the centre of the room, and a lady took her station as Post Master—Post Mistress, I should have said. Toot, toot, toot, blew the horn; and we were told the mail had arrived. "A letter for A. Gilbert, Esquire—in a female hand—from Hudson; postage six shillings." (Esq. G. was known to be paying his devoirs to a lady in Hudson.) The postage was paid without hesitation. "The Clerk will read the letter, with the consent of Mr. G., for the amusement of the company." Agreed to. Hudson, December —, 183—.

"My Dear betrothed—I have recently learned that you are frequently seen gallanting the ladies in the village where you reside. To this I should not so seriously object, provided you did not transcend the bounds of civil and courteous gallantry. But judge of the depth of my affliction on learning from unquestionable sources, that you have recently been paying the most marked attention to the beautiful Miss — Miss — name so obliterated with moisture as to be illegible," concluded the fair clerk. Loud laughter and some clapping.

Deacon W. now whispered the P. M., "Mr. N., the Universalist, is present. Have a letter for him." This was soon arranged. "A letter for Mr. N.—from Clinton—postage one dollar." (Mr. N. had a son at the Institute.) "I receive my letters at the regular office," replied Mr. N. "I was so foolish as to come to this Fair, to gratify my wife and daughter, and pay three shillings for admittance, which might better have been given to the poor. You will please, however, practice the rest of your ridiculous trickery in the name of religion, on some one else." "Hiss—s—s"—issued from a multitude of voices, and a whole breast-work of finger ends was simultaneously pointed at poor Mr. N. "How ungallant! since the Fair was got up by the ladies" exclaimed Mr. L., the gentleman who purchased the kitten. "How impious! since the object is the promotion of the gospel," ejaculated the clergyman. The next week Mr. N. found a quadruple letter at the regular office, post-marked New-York, and charged with six shillings postage. It contained nothing inside but the word "Niggard," written on the inner sheet.

Lastly was announced "The Dance of the Aged Beggars." A man and woman then came forth who were recognized as Mr. and Mrs. —, members of the church, and past the meridian of life. They were attired in rags, after the costume of the Swiss—pretended to have emigrated from Switzerland—were shipwrecked on their passage, and lost their all. They danced a Swiss waltz, after a fashion; the old lady then passed round her bonnet for charity, and gathered about twelve dollars.

The audience were then thanked for their attendance and liberality—the next semi-annual Fair was announced—the clergyman sprang to the money drawer, and so concluded the evening's entertainment.

A SKETCH.

A child sat on its mother's knee, learning to lisp the name of father. It was beautiful. No sin had marred the impress of Divinity, or stamped upon its brow the mark of Cain. The mother's heart grew proud—and her eye brightened, and her love increased, as she gazed on that bud of loveliness. I too gazed, and thought of death. I thought, should he come and lay his cold hand on that tender frame, its mother's heart would break. But he came—the child died. I witnessed the mother's agony—I saw how utterly unavailing were prayers, and tears, and cradled innocence, and exclaimed—"How terrible is death!" and I murmured at that decree of Heaven, which lays blooming infancy in the grave.

I saw another being—a young, glad creature, just stepping on the brightest stage of girlhood, with all that buoyancy of spirit, which a young, rich and chastened imagination was susceptible of forming. She had never known sorrow, and you could not look on her clear, confiding countenance, without reading a confirmation of that truth. She was one of those rare beings whom we sometimes meet with in the journey of life, in whose presence we seem to forget, that we hold communion with frail mortality. I looked on her, and thought death could not mar the hopes of friends in one so pure and beautiful. But what can bribe him? Friendship plead—hope entreated—love wept and prayed—but in vain. She died—and again in bitterness of soul, I exclaimed "How terrible is death!" and again I murmured at that decree of Heaven, which consigned youthful beauty to the charnel-house and the worm.

But I saw yet another being—an aged woman—one whose brow told a tale of seventy years—fifty of wretchedness—and yet she lived. Intellect, beauty, grace, smiles, tears, friends, even love itself was gone—she had outlived them all. Guilt's strong, iron hand lay heavy on her heart. Strangers led her to the house of charity, and ministered to her wants. And when I gazed on her, I thought death a welcome messenger, when he summoned the young, and the lovely. I thought that they were truly blessed, who died in youth, with hope, and love, and memory, and kindness, fresh around them—and I murmured no longer that the sinless child, and the glad-hearted girl, were called so soon away from the pollutions of earth, to the purity of heaven.

CONFERENCE.

A Conference was holden in Wolcott, Wayne county, on the first and second inst. Notwithstanding the bad state of the roads, in consequence of a "January thaw," the congregations, both days, were large and attentive, and we have abundant reason to believe that much good was done in "the name of the holy child Jesus," on this occasion. Sermons were preached by Bre. Montgomery, Boughton and Cook.

The ordination, which was expected to take place at this Conference, was deferred till some future time—all the ministers of the "Ontario Association" were confined at home. Our brethren, no doubt, consider it proper, yea, "good to be zealously affected, always, in a good thing."

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

DISCUSSION WITH REV. A. CAMPBELL.

The following private correspondence we had not deemed of sufficient importance to entitle it to publicity; as it relates not to the merits of the question at issue, but simply to the circumstances leading to our discussion of it, and to the time and manner of discussion. But on further reflection, as Mr. Campbell has published it in the Harbinger, we have thought it probable our readers would like to see all that has passed relating to the controversy, and therefore have concluded to give it a place in our columns.

D. S.

Utica, November 14, 1836.

DEAR SIR—I have recently received from Rev. G. W. Montgomery, of Auburn, N. Y., two numbers of the Millennial Harbinger, containing the commencement and continuance of a discussion, first between Mr. Spencer and yourself, and then between Mr. Montgomery and yourself, on the meaning of the words gehenna, hades, aión, aiónion, olém, akatalutos, and other words in the original of the Scriptures, together with certain texts, supposed to have an important bearing in deciding the question whether the punishment of the wicked will be limited or endless in duration. Accompanying these numbers of the Harbinger is a letter from Mr. Montgomery, in which he says he transfers the controversy on the part of the Universalists into my hands for continuance, this being a mutual agreement between yourself and him, at an interview had in person in June last, for reasons which I need not here state, and perfectly understood by both of you, he having made choice of me as his substitute. He also informs me that whenever the discussion was resumed, what has already been published was to be copied by, and all the future discussion published in, some Universalist paper, as well as the Harbinger. I purpose, Sir, to republish what has already appeared in the Harbinger, in the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, published in this city, of which I am one of the Editors, and of which there are circulated weekly about 7000 copies. And after the discussion is renewed to insert the whole of it on both sides; expecting you will do the same in the Harbinger.

The particular object I have in writing you this letter, is, to ascertain when it will best suit your convenience to resume the discussion. As I have heard that you either had engaged, or were about to do so, in a discussion with a Catholic Bishop at Cincinnati—and not knowing at what time that was to commence, or whether it would suit you to have both discussions in progress at the same time, or whether you would prefer finishing ours first or letting it be till after the other was disposed of, I would therefore consult your convenience in regard to time. I suppose, however, that two or three controversies in progress at the same time, with different individuals of different denominations, is no uncommon, nor perhaps inconvenient thing for you to get along with. I do not care about commencing the publication in the columns of the Magazine and Advocate, till such time as that from which it can be regularly continued onward, without any very long interval till finished. If you will be ready to resume the discussion immediately, as I hope you may—though it will take several weeks to get the articles already published and my reply to your last, before our readers, in readiness for you to respond—I will without further delay commence. You will oblige us by an exchange of papers, as we shall both doubtless like to see what is said by the other side during the pending of the discussion.

Your early answer to this, either by letter or in the pages of the Harbinger (if you send it to us) will greatly oblige,

Dear Sir, your obedient servant,
Rev. A. Campbell.

D. SKINNER.

Bethany, Va., November 29, 1836.

DEAR SIR—Your favor of the 14th inst. was received per our last mail, and I hasten to reply. I am just now, as you have learned, engaged in a very important discussion of the Roman Catholic claims and pretensions, which will call me hence to Cincinnati the first week of January next, and will likely engross my whole attention to the first of February following.

Under these circumstances it would be injudicious to divert my attention to another subject, and therefore I must postpone the discussion which you have proposed till after that period.

Touching the propositions to which you allude on the part of Mr. Montgomery, I have to observe, that, in addition to your name, he gave me those of Messrs. Balfour and Ballou in Boston, and some others. I did not stop in Utica, owing to fatigue of much speaking. But while in Boston I took occasion to intimate to Mr. Balfour (to whom I had an introduction while visiting the book-stores for the purpose of purchasing his books) that I thought the question at issue between him and other Christians had not yet been fully or fairly discussed—that I had just read the discussion between Mr. Thomas of Philadelphia, and Dr. E. S. Ely, and was more fully convinced that neither of these gentlemen met the exact question fairly. Mr. Balfour observed that if I would write something on the subject, he would reply to it. I remarked that I would prefer to have a viva voce discussion of the whole matter, and then a publication, if necessary. He declined such a discussion, on the ground of his not being in favor of that species of controversy; and so the matter ended.

Now, Sir, permit me to suggest to your consideration whether it would not be better to have such a viva voce, face to face discussion of the real subject at issue between us, and let some stenographer give it to the world. This would give more conviction, interest, and value to the matter; and it would, coming from a neutral party, or a mere stenographer, have more influence with the whole community.

One chief reason additional, prompting me to this course, is, your paper is weekly—mine is monthly; and we could not meet on equal footing, unless you were to suspend hostilities for three weeks at a time. Again, I may add that I could not, with propriety and justice to my engagements, give more than 12 pages octavo to the controversy—that is, 6 pages, each, per month.

However, I will do this rather than fall short of a discussion; but if, upon reflection, you would agree to meet me in Philadelphia or some central city, next spring, and have the whole matter canvassed to a point, I should think it more likely to be useful, and we should soon get through with the matter, and reach the end by a more certain, a more direct, and a more practical course.

I know that in these written, far-off, long-gun discussions, there is much sailing and generally a long voyage before we get to port. I have received so favorable an impression of your candor, ability, and erudition in all these matters, that I can the more freely communicate with you on the ways and means. I shall now, with all respect for your good sense and discretion, wait for an answer from you as soon as convenient. One reason of my naming Philadelphia, in addition to its being about equidistant and abounding in good accommodations, many Universalists living there, and having a large meeting-house, I have to attend in that city sometime next spring, in all probability (as you may learn from the accompanying number of the Harbinger I send you) in a trial pending between Dr. Sleight and myself.

An early answer upon all these points will be thankfully received by, dear Sir,

Your obedient servant, A. CAMPBELL

Utica, December 23, 1836.

DEAR SIR—Your favor of the 28th ult. in answer to mine of the 14th is just received, for which you have my thanks. Your reasons for delaying the contemplated discussion till February next, are sufficient and satisfactory to me.

I was aware that Mr. Montgomery had mentioned other names of Universalist preachers to you besides mine; but was informed that, provided you did not succeed in starting a discussion while at Boston, either oral or written, then the alternative was that the written discussion already commenced should be continued between you and myself, in yours and some Universalist paper.

You now suggest, as another alternative, the holding of a viva voce discussion at Philadelphia, and employing a stenographer to take it down for publication, etc. As one reason for this preference you mention that, as our paper is weekly and yours monthly, we could not meet on equal footing in a written discussion, unless I were to suspend hostilities for three weeks at a time. This, Sir, I should expect to do, provided I occupied as much space in one number of our paper as you did in one number of yours; but as one number of yours is equal to three or four of ours, you could in a particular emergency, occupy much more room in one number than it would be possible for me to do in one number of ours; so that I should be under the necessity, did I occupy equal space with you, of dividing my articles, and filling two or more numbers of ours, (i. e. what was not necessarily occupied with other matter) in reply to one number of yours. However, I do not apprehend that in general one article and the rejoinder to it will occupy more than 12 pages of the Harbinger. In some few instances it may, and then it could be divided into two numbers, unless you could spare more room than that at a time; and I should in such case have to divide it into still smaller divisions.

I should agree with Mr. Balfour in preferring a written to an oral discussion, inasmuch as the former is in my view the fairest method of eliciting truth, and would probably be the freest from personalities, from passion, and from rash, hasty, and inconsiderate remarks; and would certainly be most likely to obtain the true import and meaning of words in any critical verbal investigations. It is true that each mode of discussion has its advantages and its disadvantages. But for the above reasons, I shall decide, as you have left the alternative with me, in favor of the written discussion; and shall accordingly commence the publication of the articles in the Harbinger in the columns of the Magazine and Advocate some time in January, so that my reply to your last article will come out somewhere between the 1st and middle of February.

If, however, after we have carried on the written discussion to our hearts' content, or to our mutual satisfaction, you are still desirous of an oral discussion, I think I can safely guaranty that you shall be gratified. I have no doubt that Mr. Thomas of Philadelphia would gladly meet you in public debate. If he will not, I think I can find one who will, and who would at least be as acceptable to you and the public as myself. But if not, I will myself consent to meet you at any time and place where we can mutually make it convenient. Yours with all due respect,

Rev. A. Campbell.

D. SKINNER.

P. S. After the publication of the discussion is commenced, I will, in order to facilitate its progress and prevent any unnecessary delay, send you the copy of my articles in proof before the issuing of the paper, and wish you to send me yours in like manner.

D. S.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

There are several scraps of the letters we have received which we think worthy of preservation, and the sentiments they disclose, deserving of the perusal of our readers. So to do both at once, we transfer them to our columns, as is our custom. Some of them have been on hand a considerable time, but they will not grow too old to be used.

The following is but the fore-runner, we trust, of more from the same hand. Br. Crocker, it will be remembered is our agent—also the agent of "The Glad Tidings," of Pittsburg, Pa., in that region. It is also but fair to state that the "Glad Tidings" is doing a "good work" in all that region, and prospering greatly by its own labors, as it deserves to do—for it is an improvingly good paper. BRS. S. A. DAVIS, Chappell and L. L. SALLER its Editors.

"Elizabethtown, Marshall county, Va., January 10, 1837.

BRS. GROSH AND HUTCHINSON.—In justice to your paper, permit me to inform you, Messrs. Editors, that it has been the means, through a kind Providence, of doing much good herabouts. Before it was circulated in this section of country, there was, I am informed, hardly a believer in the Abrahamic faith to be found. All was mid-night darkness. But thanks to our Creator, liberal principles have found their way into this dark and benighted land, and are fast gaining ground. Many already rejoice that the scales of superstition and unbelief have fallen from their eyes, and that they are now permitted to behold, with faith's eye, the prospect of immortality, bright and cheering before them. Blessed be God, the Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, such can now behold in Jehovah, the Saviour of all men, the universal Benefactor of the human race! How much good a mildly conducted and able religious periodical is calculated to do—how much good the "Magazine and Advocate" has done here! True, the paper has had co-workers in "Marshall County Circuit"; co-workers who need not to be ashamed. They, together with the paper, aided by the Most High, have done, thus far, a good work. God permit, that the good work may continue to progress, until all the ends of the earth shall remember and turn unto the Lord, and all the kindreds of the nations, worship before him!

"In haste, I subscribe myself your friend and brother in the faith, E. R. CROCKER."

The following is from the same place—from our late faithful agent there. It is a farewell letter, and we received it with melancholy feelings, despite of the good news it contains. God be with the writer, and ever bless his endeavors to do good.

"Elizabethtown, Va., January 21, 1837.

"Dear Brethren in the Lord—We have great reason to rejoice in these parts, that times have changed since the Magazine and Advocate came amongst us, and changed for the better. Previous to its introduction here, the doctrine of God's impartial grace was without friends, and unknown by the multitude; and in order to disseminate the doctrine, I put the Advocate into the hands of every one who would read it, without regard to remuneration. I was assured that the bread cast upon the waters would be found again, after many days. Thanks to our heavenly Father, the promise hath been more than verified; for it hath already yielded its hundred fold. We can now support the preached word amongst us, and doubtless two or three societies will soon be formed in the range of country through which your paper hath travelled. Br. E. R. Crocker, is laboring with us to good acceptance, and much good is anticipated the coming year—and even now, when I contrast the present, with the time when your humble servant was the only person in this region who held the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, without respect to persons—he with a Magazine and Advocate in his hand, striving to obtain a reader, (almost without success)—the work appears to be of the Lord, and marvellous in our eyes.

"Finally, brethren, may the God of Israel continue to prosper the good cause through the medium of your paper, as he hath done, and more abundantly.

"Yours with due respect,
W. B."

The following has laid on hand for more than a month, we waiting for room to insert more of it, but in vain. It relates to the prosperity of the cause at Cayuhoga Falls, Ohio, (evidenced to us, by a list of twenty-four subscribers in that place!)—describes Br. Whitney's acceptable labors there, his settlement in Cleveland, and the probable settlement of Br. Loring, of Massachusetts, in that vicinity, next Spring. Then follows the account below.

"Cayuhoga Falls, December 23, 1836.

"The first lecture Br. Whitney gave us, at this place, was on the subject of faith. At the close of his remarks, he gave liberty for remarks.

The Rev. J. T. Holiway, a Methodist, who had taken minutes during Br. Whitney's discourse, arose and commenced in rather an ungentlemanlike manner, by undertaking to brow-beat and laugh off the discourse. He rehearsed some of his laughable farces as he called them—one of which I will name. He said a Universalist preacher had a contribution taken up at the close of one of his sermons, where he had preached the torments of hell away, and all he received was buttons, comb-handles, etc., which caused him to be enraged, and to address the congregation by saying, he had altered his mind in a measure—he thought if there was no hell, there ought to be one, into which to put such an ungenerous congregation! Mr. Holiway then closed his discourse, by saying it was a dangerous doctrine—but the best way to kill Universalists was to love them to death. Br. Whitney, replied in a masterly manner, so completely, that Mr. H. arose, and hemmed and hawked, and at last did make out to say, the only way he could get the devil out of Mr. Whitney, was to cut his head off! A pretty way of loving him to death, as he had said before!

"Some time after this, Mr. Whitney was invited to attend one of their meetings, at which time they took the opportunity of abusing him shamefully. He arose to ask an explanation, but they would not permit him to say a word. He afterwards asked an explanation out side of the house; and this reverend gentlemen could only say that the reason why Br. W. was not permitted to reply, was, he (Mr. H.) was afraid that some of his members were not able and prepared to resist the spirit!

"Yours respectfully,
B. R."

We have a few more in store, but must be sparing of them on the principle that "Enough is as good as a feast."

CONFERENCE AT CHARDON.

A Conference of the Western Reserve Association of Universalists, was holden at Chardon, Geauga county, Ohio, on the 4th and 5th inst. The Council was organized by choosing Br. E. Beals, Moderator, and Br. S. A. Davis, Clerk. Voted, that the visiting clergymen present, be invited to take seats in the Council.

On motion of Br. Bruce, it was resolved, that a committee of three be chosen to obtain correct information of the state of the denomination within the bounds of this Association, and report to this body at its annual session in June next, that the same may be forwarded to the publishers of the Universalist Register. Chose BRS. BEALS, BRADLEY and BOND, said Committee.

Voted, That when this Council adjourns, it adjourn to meet in Mentor, Geauga county, Ohio, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday in June next.

Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting be tendered to the Methodist society in this place for their Christian liberality in opening their meeting-house for the accommodation of this Conference.

Resolved, That the thanks of this Conference be tendered to Br. J. McKelvey, for his excellent sermon delivered before this meeting, and that he be requested to furnish a copy for publication in the Glad Tidings and Telescope, and that an edition be also published in pamphlet form.

Voted, That the Clerk be requested to prepare the minutes of this Conference for publication in the Glad Tidings and Telescope, with a request that they should be copied into the Magazine and Advocate.

The following resolution was introduced by Br. Joseph Bradley, and unanimously adopted:

Whereas, there is a periodical devoted to the cause of universal salvation within the bounds of our own State, called the Glad Tidings and Ohio Christian Telescope.

Resolved, That we recommend the same to the patronage of the Universalists within the bounds of this Association.

The Committee on fellowship and ordination reported that they had received requests to confer ordination on BRS. JAMES MCKELVEY and ENOS LEIDY. On the first, they reported in favor of granting the request. On the second, that in their opinion it would be proper to defer the request till the next annual meeting of the Association. Report accepted.

Adjourned to meet at Mentor, the first Wednesday in June next. EDSON BEALS, Moderator.

S. A. Davis, Clerk.

REMARKS.—Five sermons were preached on the occasion, as follows, by BRS. E. LEIDY, JAMES MCKELVEY, THOMAS DOLLOFF, AMI BOND, and S. A. DAVIS. The weather was fine, and though the travelling was very bad, the house was filled to overflowing, and devout attention was paid to the services of the occasion. The friends in Chardon threw open their doors, and received us with open hearts. Their kindness will long be remembered with thankfulness. It was truly an occasion of great rejoicing. The cause of universal salvation presents a more cheering prospect in this region than has hitherto been enjoyed. The Lord grant that the light may continue to shine unto the perfect day.

CLERGYMEN PRESENT.

Edson Beals, Cherry-Valley; Doct. H. Bell, and J. Alexander, Newbury; Joseph Bradley, Windsor; Ami Bond, Geneva; Thomas Dolloff, Orange; Enos Leidy, Parkman; James McKelvey, Paris; S. A. Davis, Pittsburg, Pa.; J. Billings, Centerville, N. Y.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, MARCH 3, 1837.

DR. ELY.

Under this head, in No. 4, current volume, I requested information or explanation from Br. J. B. W., a correspondent in the Star in the East. Will our readers please to refer to that article, and then read the following reply to it from the last Star!

"TO THE READERS OF THE STAR."

"Br. A. B. G. of the "Magazine and Advocate," has called upon me to inform the public when and where Dr. Ely declared that "THE ORTHODOX ARE ENDEAVORING TO UNITE CHURCH AND STATE IN THIS REPUBLIC." And also in language unrelieved by one word of good nature, to explain my conduct in attributing to the Dr. such statement. Not wishing to rest under the imputation of having unjustly made an injurious insinuation, I willingly comply with his request, and shall offer just so much evidence out of the mass that might be presented, as will suffice for my own vindication.

"It will be recollected by many of the readers of this paper, that some six or eight years ago, the Editor of the "Trumpet" proposed a number of questions to Rev. Dr. Ezra Stiles Ely, the champion of the "Christian party in politics," touching the proposed union of "Church and State." But not having at this time the papers which contain that interesting discussion, I present the following extract of an editorial article which appeared in the "New-York Gospel Herald" of February 27, 1830.

"The Dr. in one of the last numbers of the Philadelphia openly avows it to be the determination of the Christian Party—of which he is the mouth-piece—TO EXCLUDE ALL MEN FROM OFFICE, WHO ARE NOT SOUND PRESBYTERIANS—he even goes farther and declares openly and boldly, that THE ORTHODOX ARE ENDEAVORING TO GET THE GOVERNMENT OF THE COUNTRY INTO THEIR OWN HANDS.”

“I now ask the reader to look at Dr. Ely’s own words, and then at the quotation to which Br. A. B. G. alludes. And how does it seem? Does it appear that I intended to misrepresent the Dr.? What mighty difference is there in these two expressions? Just none at all. It is a distinction without a difference. I have now said all that is necessary for me to say to satisfy the reader, that I did not make an unjust insinuation. But before I take my leave, I would say to Br. A. B. G. that if he again calls me to an account for my conduct, I hope he will not exhibit a supercilious and angry temper. I pray him to imitate that Being whose name and nature is love. J. B. W.”

“South New Market.”

Really Br. W., you much mistake the spirit and intention of my article, as well as the subject itself. It contained a plain, unimpassioned, and, as I yet believe, a respectful request. If you wish to be daubed with honied accents, buttered words, sugar-plum epithets and molasses-candy compliments, I pity you, but must disappoint you. But that my language is “unrelieved by one word of good nature,” is not correct. What is “Br.,” and “please”—and, in short, what is the whole call, but a friendly attempt to enable you to explain or correct your misquotation—for such it proves to be? I consider that man my friend who corrects my errors. But not only have you mistaken the temper of my article, but its subject.

Read my request over again, Br. W. I did not doubt the result of Dr. Ely’s many declarations, if carried into effect—I told you I did not. But the Doctor denies the “union of Church and State” to be that result, or his intention. The question, then, is—not what will be the result of Dr. Ely’s plans—no; nor even what does the Doctor’s language mean—but it is, has Dr. Ely used the very words you first quoted as his? If he has, I wanted to know when and where, that the Doctor’s disclaimer might be set aside. If he has not, (I repeat it again), “J. B. W. is in duty bound to explain his conduct,” in ascribing those very words to Dr. Ely.

You first said, “Dr. Ely says, THE ORTHODOX ARE ENDEAVORING TO UNITE CHURCH AND STATE IN THIS REPUBLIC!” To prove that Dr. Ely said these very, quoted words, you now refer to a different statement—a statement explained by the Dr. to be, not “a union of Church and State,” but by a constitutional exercise of the elective franchise, to exclude what he calls immoral and irreligious men from office. If you have no other testimony for your first quotation, you have misquoted (I do not say misrepresented, though he may say so,) Dr. Ely’s language—indeed quoted as his, language he did not utter.

Your concluding advice is supererogatory. I have not felt, nor am I conscious of having exhibited, “a supercilious or angry temper;” but have endeavored to “imitate that Being whose name and nature is love,” and who requires us to speak the truth, in love, by correcting your misquotation, and freeing Doctor Ely from the charge of having uttered it. May we all learn caution in our quotations, charity in our judgments, and such universality in our affections as not to hate even Dr. Ely!

PSALM CIII: 10.

“He hath not dealt with us after our sins; nor rewarded us according to our iniquities.”

A ministering brother asks our views concerning this passage, pertinently remarking that if it means, as generally supposed, that God did not adequately punish the Israelites for their sins, nor fully reward their iniquities, we have no reason to accuse our Partialist brethren of calling God unjust when they pray unto him, that “if he had dealt with strict justice toward them, they would now be in the grave with the dead, and in hell with the damned.” That such is not the meaning of this passage will, I believe, be rendered evident: by a consideration of the context.

What is the subject of the Psalm? The loving kindness and tender mercy of God. With what is it contrasted in the text? With “our sins” and “our iniquities.” What are the ways of God in his loving kindness and tender mercies? He forgives all our iniquities, heals all our diseases, redeems our lives from destruction; he will not always chide nor keep his anger forever. Well, and what are the ways of our sins and iniquities? Precisely the reverse of the ways of God’s mercy and love. They lead us to be unforgiving and destructive; corrupt our health and peace; render us fretful and angry; and perpetuate, as long as in their power, every evil passion of our natures. The case is clear. Though we forget God, he remembers us in mercy; though we cleave to sin, he removes our transgressions far from us; though we wander from him, he follows after us with his mercies; though we are headstrong and froward, he remembers we are but dust, and pities our waywardness with paternal compassion—and, in short, acts directly counter to our sinful course and iniquitous doings. In the language of the text, He deals not with us after our sins, nor rewards us according to our iniquities—for then everlasting would be his anger and perpetual his chidings—but he punishes us to reform us—he removes our transgressions far from us, and restores us to our right minds, right ways and right enjoyments.

1 TIMOTHY V: 24, 25.

“Some men’s sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment; and some men they follow after. Likewise, also, the good works of some are manifest beforehand; and they that are otherwise cannot be hid.”

From the too common practice of restricting the meaning of the word “judgment” to a divine dispensation of chastisement, many seem to be extremely perplexed with this passage. The nearest approach they can make toward satisfying their minds, is to suppose that some men’s sins would be generally known before the judgment day; and others would be proclaimed only after they were brought up to the bar of God. Some Universalists, also, understanding the word “judgment” to mean divine chastisement, or else wishing to argue with our opposers on their own grounds, have explained the passage to mean, that some men were punished beforehand for their sins; and others only after their sins were committed—or, perhaps, (which is also most reasonable,) that some men were punished in the conception of their sins, and before the sins were consummated by action; and other men’s sins were punished only after they were actually committed. But neither of these views appear to be the meaning of the apostle, as will be evident by a careful perusal of the context—to which we will now direct our attention.

The 23d verse is a peculiar one, and does not appear to be connected with the sense of what precedes or what follows it. Benson (and other critics agree with him) says, “it should be read in a parenthesis, as a thought let in by the apostle, when he reflected on the state of the Christian church, Timothy’s great usefulness in it, and his present sickly condition.” Then follows the text, in which I have retained the italicized words, to show that they are supplied by the translators. Bearing these facts in mind, turn your attention to the subject of the chapter.

Paul instructs Timothy how to instruct, rebuke and entreat old and young—verses 1, 2. Then follow directions for the maintenance and employment of widows—verses 3-16. Then follow directions how to support, select, accuse, try and rebuke the elders of the church—verses 17-21. Then comes a caution to ordain no deacon or bishop rashly; for if he did not exercise his judgment carefully in selecting and ordaining persons to this office, he made himself, virtually, a partaker in their sins, and would be blamable with them, for the injury their bad conduct would inflict on the church. Then comes the verse in parenthesis—and then our text. What, now, is the probable meaning of Paul in verses 24 and 25? Is it not, evidently, a direction to guide Timothy in selecting persons for the sacred offices here named? Read the context.

“Lay hands suddenly on no man, neither be partaker of other men’s sins: keep thyself pure. (Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach’s sake, and thine often infirmities.)” Some men’s sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment; and some men they follow after. Likewise, also, the good works of some are manifest beforehand; and they that are otherwise cannot be hid.” Verses 22-25.

That is, to paraphrase the passage, (I give Macknight’s paraphrase, not literally, but in substance,)—Appoint no one to any sacred office hastily, (or,) without first ascertaining his character and qualifications; neither partake of other men’s sins, (i. e.) by conferring these offices on unworthy persons. Keep thyself blameless, (i. e.) in the whole of thy appointments. [Then the parenthetical passage.] Consider, in judging of those who desire sacred offices, that, of some men, the sins are very manifest, leading even before inquiry, to condemnation [decision or judgment concerning them.] Such men reject. [There needs no inquiry concerning them—you see, at once, what they are—their own conduct testifies enough against them.] But in others, their sins are so concealed, that the knowledge of them follows after inquiry. [You can form no correct judgment respecting them, without first acquiring a knowledge of their past lives.] In like manner, also, the good qualities and good works of some men are very manifest: [their good name precedes them, and enables you to judge concerning them, without the labor of inquiry:] such may be admitted to sacred offices without inquiry. And those good works which are not manifest, can not long be hidden, if an accurate inquiry is made into the character of the persons. A. B. G.

VISIT TO AUBURN.

By an agreement between Br. G. W. Montgomery and myself, we exchanged desks on the 2d and 3d Sundays in February ult., by which arrangement Br. M. supplied the desk of the Universalist church in this city to the very great acceptance and high gratification of the society; and I had the pleasure of visiting and preaching to the Universalist society in Auburn during those two Sabbaths. I was highly gratified to witness the very prosperous and flourishing condition of the society under Br. M.’s charge in that beautiful and flourishing capital of Cayuga county. Four years ago that society had not an existence—now it is a large, able, united, and prosperous society, embracing many of the most wealthy, influential and worthy citizens of the place and neighborhood, and possessed of a neat brick church completely paid for, and of respectable size. But so rapid has been the growth of the society under the judicious and well-directed labors of their present pastor, that they begin to think and talk seriously of building larger. And, indeed, if their ordinary congregations are anything near as large as those which attended while I was there, the measure would be immediately advisable. For the church was thronged to inconvenience above and below—and even the aisles and hall were filled on both days; so they will evidently have to “lengthen their cords” to accommodate any increase of numbers.

I had but little time to spend in Auburn on account of the multitude of my appointments. During that time I was accommodated in the hospitable mansion and family of Br. J. Barber, one of the contractors for the labor of State Prison convicts, who carries on extensively the manufacture of carpets and hearth rugs, some very elegant specimens of which were shown me. With him I visited the prison, where I beheld congregated nearly seven hundred criminals, sent there for various offences against the laws of the State, and busily engaged in various mechanical occupations, the profits of which, after deducting the expense of their keeping, go into the State Treasury. This system unites justice, mercy and economy, and is alike honorable, safe and profitable to the State. Among the convicts several clergymen were pointed out who had formerly been strenuous opposers of the doctrine of universal salvation and staunch advocates of endless misery. We saw and recognized among them the noted E. K. Dare, on what is called by the craft, "the stool of repentance, drawing the cords of affliction."

During my absence from home, I preached, besides six discourses at Auburn, one at Elbridge, two at Mottville, one at Genoa, one (funeral) at North Lansing, one at Scipio, one at Throopville, and one at Fayetteville on my way home, making fourteen discourses in nine days, besides considerable travel, some of which was in excessively cold, stormy and blustering weather. In all the above places the doctrine of impartial grace has some warm-hearted and zealous friends. Elbridge is at present destitute of stated preaching. Mottville and Scipio are regularly supplied by the acceptable labors of Br. H. Boughton. Genoa has no regular supply, and perhaps it had been well for our friends and the cause there if there had been none for the last year. At Fayetteville some peculiar circumstances occurred which we deem worthy of note. My appointment was known and given out more than a week before its fulfillment. Our friends, having no house of worship of their own in the place, applied to the Baptists for the use of theirs, and were refused. They applied for the Presbyterian house, and were refused—for the Methodist, and were refused—for the basement of one of those churches, and were refused—for the academy, and were refused. We think (but are not certain) they also applied for the Episcopal church and were refused. At length they obtained a spacious district school-house on one of the back streets, and were given to understand that that would hold more than all the people who would attend to hear such a doctrine preached. On arriving at the house which was at an early hour, I found it filled and crowded almost to suffocation, and multitudes standing at the door and in the street unable to get admission. I crowded my way into the house, and very soon commenced the service, knowing that delay would but increase the discomfort of the dense crowd assembled. After going through with prayer and twice singing, and being about to commence the sermon, the crowd without still continuing to increase, and the cry being urgent that I should take my stand in the door so as to be heard without as well as within; there being some Methodists present who had sagacity enough to see that public sentiment and feeling must be setting strongly against the bigotry and illiberality of a place where so many churches stood unoccupied, not one of which could be opened, to such an immense throng of men, women and children standing in the street on a Winter's night to worship in peace the God of the universe; at length concluded at last that they would open the Methodist church for our accommodation. This relenting of bigotry at the eleventh hour was announced in meeting. I inquired if the house was warmed. The reply was, "There are enough of us to warm it." Have you possession of the key, so as to be certain of admission, even now? "It is a responsible man who has promised the house, and his word may be relied on." But I would like to be informed who has the key; for I do not like to be turned into the street at this time of night with all that are in this house, upon uncertainties. Several voices replied, "He is responsible and has the key in his pocket." At length it was resolved, nem. con. to remove to the Methodist chapel. A dense army was then seen moving through the village to the place last named to hear a sermon in the mercy of the universal Father.

On arriving at the Methodist house we found the doors not open. Where was the key? No one knew. It was somewhere. But who has it? After much inquiry and talk, it was announced that the key was at Mr. ———'s, some quarter or half mile distant: and the throng of people of both sexes and all ages, filling the platform of the church and extending thence in one dense mass to the centre of the street, standing in the snow, were exhorted to wait with patience the coming of the key. After waiting in that condition, as I should judge over a quarter of an hour, during which I saw no symptoms in man, woman or child to leave the spot till after sermon; the key came, the house was opened and in less than eight minutes completely filled above and below. I then delivered my message to a very silent and devoutly attentive congregation, and after singing one more hymn, dismissed the meeting with a benediction. It was kindly intimated to one of our friends by the Methodist who had so liberally opened the house, that as he had "done the deed" on his own responsibility, he should expect a contribution taken up for his benefit, or rather to pay for cleaning the house, etc., etc. This intimation was no sooner whispered to a few of the congregation, than the sudden revulsion of feeling manifested by the few, determined the person proposing the thing to prudently waive his claim.

Nothing further occurred here worthy of remark, except that I heard it observed before I left the place, that the foundation of a Universalist church had been laid in Fayetteville that evening. One man offering the ground to set it on and another the timber necessary for the frame of the building; and it was presumed the necessary subscription for the rest could be easily obtained in the place and neighborhood.

I arrived at home the next evening, found my family, by the blessing of God, in comfortable health, but myself "much the worse for the wear," a severe cold, hoarseness and cough seated on my lungs, in consequence of which I have been mostly confined to my house since my return. I was aware, during my tour, of my too excessive labor for the state of my health: but the fault was not all mine, though mine is the penalty. I found on arriving at Auburn, that appointments had been given out for me without my knowledge or consent, especially those in the southern part of the county, and it was expected that I should fulfil them. I always feel reluctant to have people disappointed on my account, but I am now satisfied I ought not to have injured my health by fulfilling those appointments which I had not made myself. The funeral sermon too, I at first positively refused to preach, on account of my health, the distance, the weather and other engagements. I remembered too, being then at Genoa, the last public labors of the lamented Freeman, at a funeral which he was over-persuaded to attend in the neighborhood, when his health was entirely incompetent to the task. But, like him I yielded my judgment to sympathy, and though the forfeit be not as great, it is no ways trifling. We may transgress either against others or ourselves. But self-preservation is the first law of nature; and for one I am fully satisfied it is an imperious duty to yield to its dictates.

The above will account to some of my friends (who have lately written to me to obtain my services abroad) for my not complying with their urgent requests.

TWO WISHES.

We have two wishes which, if gratified, we believe would advance the interests of the cause, and are quite sure would advance our own interests. One is, to dispose of several full files of the last volume, which we have on hand; and the other is, to increase our present subscription list. As an inducement, therefore, to our friends, and particularly to those who commenced their subscriptions with the present volume, to aid us in their gratification, we offer the last volume, in numbers, as a to any one who will send us, free of expense, the advance pay for four new subscribers.

Can not many thus avail themselves of volume seven, and at the same time extend the circulation and consequent usefulness of the paper? Those who choose to avail themselves of this offer, will please state their wishes, and inform us whether we shall forward the volume by mail or otherwise. Those who prefer volume four or five, can be supplied with them on the same terms.

GROSH AND HUTCHINSON.

Well bound copies of volume seven can be had at this office for two dollars each—also of several former volumes at the same price.

G. and H.

Is it fair—is it even honest to delay discontinuing a paper until several numbers of a new volume have been received—and a year's file is thus broken—and then send in the notice without pay for (we will not say the whole file thus broken—$1 50, but) even the papers actually received? We put it to every such subscriber's conscience—is this right? We have had many dozen files thus broken by such conduct; and our loss, counting only the fragments of files actually sent, already amounts to many dollars on this volume alone. We do not wish to be tenacious for trifles—yet these trifles, in these hard times, swallow up more than these subscribers would be willing to lose, however wealthy they may be—and more than we can afford to lose. Brethren—think of these things, and do by the Printer as you would be done by.

G. and H.

Br. Tompkins—Charge me, and credit the following persons, for the sums here named, received from Br. T. D. Cook. Misses Eliza Underhill, Amanda Matthews, Elizabeth Peck, and Mesdames Irene Underhill, Mary Ann Underhill, Bethia Tompkins, and Elizabeth Sarzabee, or Larzalen, [the name is not legible,] of Wolcott, Wayne county, N. Y., and Miss Emily Cook, Canal, Onondaga county, N. Y., each $2—in all $16. Also, send the Repository to Hannah Gaylord, Magnolia, Putnam county, Ill., and charge me $2. paid for the same. Really, Br. Tompkins, I am becoming so deeply in your debt, I wish you would contrive to send us on a string of subscriptions and order us to charge you with the amount—never mind how much, only let it be enough to square the yards! Good luck to you, Br.

A. B. G.

AN ORGANIST AND LEADER OF A CHOIR.—Mr. Cornelius Woolnough, of Fayetteville, Onondaga county, N. Y., desires to obtain the above situation in some society, for which he is said to be competent and worthy. He would perform the duties of sexton, in addition, as he has several grown children, who, also, are good singers. Letters on this business, post paid, will be attended to by him.

ERRATUM.—In No. 7, p. 54, current volume, line 27th of first column, for "waved these same" etc., read "moved these same."

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. C. S. BROWN in Lisle—Br. BRITTON in Depauville at 10 A. M., near Br. J. Barney's at 2 P. M., and in Clayton in the evening—Br. Sias in South Champion, and in Copenhagen in the evening—Br. WAGGONER in Cedarville—Br. O. ROBERTS in Lewiston—Br. BODEN in Morrisville.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. C. S. BROWN in Otselic village—Br. GUILD in Walton.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. C. S. BROWN in Harford—Br. BODEN in Marshall—Br. BOUGHTON in Mottville, (and on every fourth Sunday until further notice.)

POETRY.

HAPPINESS.

BY ROBERT SOUTHWELL.

My conscience is my crown,
Contented thoughts my rest;
My heart is happy in itself,
My bliss is in my breast.

My wishes are but few,
All easy to fulfil;
I make the limits of my power
The bounds unto my will.

I fear no care of gold,
Well doing is my wealth;
My mind to me an empire is,
While grace affordeth health.

I clip high climbing thoughts—
The wings of swelling pride;
Their fall is worst, that from the height
Of greatest honors slide.

Since sails of largest size
The storm doth soonest tear,
I bear so small and low a sail
As freeth me from fear.

No change of fortune's calm
Can cast my comforts down;
When fortune smiles, I smile to think
How quickly she will frown.

And when in froward mood
She proved an angry foe,
Small gain I found to let her come—
Less loss to let her go.

EDUCATION OF THE SEXES.

"Man knoweth not woman's weakness, nor her strength."

Much is said of female education; and it is insisted on, that if the mothers of the land were well taught, the sons would be so. This is true; but in advocating this view, with a national reference, what is the object of speaking of female education alone? It is equally important with male education, but not more so. If men were better educated, the females would be compelled to take a higher stand. They are now as well educated as the males require. What the males ought to require, is another thing. The females please the males; we deem them fit to be our companions, and the mothers of our children. That is enough for them. To become superior to us is not their object. Man retires from superiority in a woman. She dares not make him feel it; she cannot attract him. He flies from her intelligence, her purity, her criticism, and seeks a more congenial home in the dependence of one who will love him without questioning him. Until men become themselves intelligent, discriminating and judicious—until they set up higher standards for their love, women will not rise. The education of women is kept down by the education of men. Both must rise together, but the latter must begin the work. What man requires, that woman will be.

Let us examine the relative responsibilities of the sexes. In all ages women have consulted the tastes of men. Upon that foundation they educate themselves. In one opinion all women agree—the absolute necessity of marriage. Of fashionable women, the phrenology is approbation. Love and wedlock constitute their thoughts. Like actors, they live, not by their own inherent strength but by the opinions of those around them. They must be conscious of pleasing, or they are unhappy. They neglect the future within them, for the present around them. Even of this they see not the most worthy objects; for nothing is actually present to them which does not concern their hope of pleasing. To all the great moral lessons and intellectual truths of which the present is full, they pay little attention.—Nature they seldom study.—Books they seldom read. But between compliments, dress, visits and what is called pleasure, they pass their time from the boarding school to the wedding service. One who had not observed closely, would be surprised to see how ignorant and selfish the devotee of fashion may become. On the other hand, a woman who is a slave to no fashion, who respects herself too much to depend on popularity, alone, who looks to truth and goodness as the grand objects of life, who regards marriage as of secondary importance, is as rarely found as she is rarely appreciated. She is above the comprehension of most men. She stands on an elevation which makes her superior to them. Her source of excitement, perennial and exelling, is within; the love of truth, its beauty, its novelty, its use; not without, not in the admiration of men, its insipid, common show, its unutterably flat manifestations, its stale repetitions, its inconsequence. She has within herself the elements of a joyful life, the passion for what is of itself noble. Observe her alone; she is not solitary, for she has a mind, a memory, a hope, for the True and the Beautiful. See her surrounded by the graceful and lovely of her sex; she is not envious, or jealous, or even meanly envious. She feels no ambition to outshine them; she is conscious of but one wish, the desire to do them good. This is the great secret of her ease and happiness in society, the benevolence ever springing from the heart towards all around her. If she is beautiful, wealthy, or popular, her kindness will disarm the envy which those advantages excite. Her very excellence will be made up of qualities so noble, that her own sex will love her while they yield her the superiority. There is a distinction between such a woman and those who in fashionable common place, are called "accomplished or amiable." The most frivolous and negative growls have had these terms applied to them—a growth reared in luxury, a pretty face, untouched by sorrow or pain—a girl in the bloom of beauty, is per force amiable, negatively, but not from principle. She is accomplished, but not wise. She has been at school a certain number of years, and has a certificate, or a Kentuckian diploma, that she has studied Latin, Algebra, and Mathematics, which diploma proves her to have been "thorough" in the sciences at the age of fifteen. She has learnt the "Calif of Bagdad," on the piano and will execute "Uno voce poco fa," without missing a note. The fashionable Mrs. —, at Philadelphia, has given her neck the required twist in waltzing, and imparted to her at great expense, those undefinable graces which distinguish the fashionable from the unfashionable woman. When she makes her first appearance in "company," she is about sixteen years old and she remains there until married. The circumstances by which she is surrounded during this time, are such as to engender vanity, coarseness, ignorance, and selfishness—and totally to unfit her for the duties of a wife or mother. To use a homely but forcible word, she has cheapened herself. But is it the fault of her sex, or of ours? What is the object of all this fashionable education? To render herself agreeable at the present moment—to whom? Enough; we require this of woman. She makes the sacrifice of all that is truly lovely and ennobling, to please our ignoble tastes. We foster her affectation—we flatter her vanity—we abuse her weakness—we laugh at her attempts to rise above her sex. We find her sufficiently agreeable, and we make no effort to improve her. We choose to seal up the living fountain of worth and beauty within her soul, and then cry out in some moment of chagrin, that she is not what she ought to be. Oh, wise and potent man! lord of creation, but slave of the passions, dost thou expect woman to raise thee? Let us hear no more of the "mothers" of the land, till its fathers become men, and learn their duty.

THE TITHES SYSTEM.

AN ANECDOTE.

When it was first proposed in England to tax the whole country a tenth part of their income for the support of the established church, one of the bishops wrote a book, in which he complained of the illiberality of the proposition, and amended it by inserting a tenth part of all the capital in the kingdom, arguing that as every person would be affected in the same proportion all would remain relatively as before, and in fact no person affected at all. This curious argument he enforced by as curious an illustration; he said that if the foundations of a great building were to sink equally in every part at the same time, the whole pile instead of suffering any injury would become the firmer. "True," said the celebrated scholar Gilbert Wakefield in his reply, "and you my Lord Bishop, who dwell in the upper apartments might still enjoy the prospect from your window; but what would become of me and the good people who live upon the ground floor? A fig did the good bishop think or care about that; it was the tithes he wanted, and as long as he had the power, it mattered not how weak were his arguments, or how unjust the claim on which they were based. The tithes system went into operation and has continued operating unto the present day, grinding the poor to pamper a haughty, aristocratic, religion-mocking clergy. In reading the recent accounts from Ireland, our sympathy was awakened for her distressed and suffering citizens, whose property to their last pig, is wrested from them to support a system of religion repulsive to their conscientious scruples, and which does them no possible good. Our indignation too, was inflamed against that living libel on Christianity, a church which can approve of such measures. Is it possible that men can still claim the Christian name, while their character so widely differs from the standard of morals demonstrated in the precepts and example of the adorable Saviour? Strange to say, the history of the church in almost every age furnishes melancholy evidence that such is the fact. Such a grasping after wealth, influence and power as is now seen in several branches of the Christian church, contrasts, vividly contrasts with the meek and lowly character of the divine founder of Christianity. Religion divested of love and charity, becomes the most hateful object in existence. It binds its possessor with bigotry, makes him ambitious of power, and having once usurped it he wields it with a zeal untempered with mercy. Of all tyranny, that which associates with it the name of religion, is the most cruel; of all oppression, the most to be dreaded. Heaven grant that the scenes of bigotry and intolerance which have already disgraced our beloved country, may never be acted over again; and above all, that the still more barbarous events of other nations may never have the sanction of our imitation.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, on the 22d ult., by Rev. D. Skinner, Mr. JAMES BREWER, of this city, to Mrs. ELIZABETH STRONG, of Albany.

In this city, on the 20th ult., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. JOHN SLATER, of Hamilton, to Miss PHIDELIA PERSONS, of Deerfield.

In New-Berlin, 12th ult., by Rev. W. M. Delong, Mr. BRADLEY C. BILLINGS, of Lebanon, to Miss HARRIET M. HALL, daughter of Caleb G. Hall, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Darien, Genesee county, March 10, 1836, Mr. QUARTUS LEE, aged 65 years, a kind husband, affectionate parent, intelligent man, useful citizen, and a free man in Christ Jesus. He died as he had lived, a Universalist. The funeral was attended by Br. Flagler.

In Hamilton, January 30th, Miss DIANA RICHARDSON, in the 22d year of her age. During a long illness she frequently spoke of her anticipated departure with composure, and fell asleep in the faith of universal salvation lamented by all who knew her.—Com.

In Butler, Wayne, county, N. Y., December 18th, 1836, Mrs. AMY YOUNG, consort of Isaac Young, in the 42d year of her age. In the death of this amiable woman society has lost a shining ornament, three lovely children have been deprived of a doting mother, and a kind husband has been robbed of an affectionate companion. While in health, she said but little on the subject of religion, whatever she may have thought; but when a wasting consumption was fully seated, and admonished her to prepare for death, she found peace in that faith which points to better worlds on high, where a ransomed universe shall ultimately meet to celebrate the praises of God and the Lamb, and chant the loud anthems of redeeming love. The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners, together with a large concourse of sympathising friends and neighbors, by T. D. Cook.

In Wolcott, on the 4th ult., THOMAS JEFFERSON, youngest child of A. C. and Adelaide Knapp, aged 3 years and 5 months. The bud had just begun to unfold its beauties, when death plucked it from the garden of parental affections, and transplanted it in a more friendly clime—in the paradise of God—to bloom, there, in the arms of the Redeemer, forever and ever. May the rich blessings of Heaven rest upon the afflicted parents and lead them into all truth. A discourse was delivered on the occasion, by the writer, from 2 Tim. i: 10. T. D. C.

In Venice, Cayuga county, N. Y., on February 3d, after a short but painful illness, Mr. SOLOMON BROWN—at quite an advanced age. He retained a sound mind and unwavering faith, until the close of life, and bore his illness with Christian fortitude—evidencing that Universalism will do in health, in sickness, and in the last mortal hour. The funeral was attended on the 5th by a vast concourse of relatives and friends, to whom the consolations of divine truth were tendered from Job i: 21, by Br. Boughton.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER VI.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATION.

Practical observation, or the habit of observing men and things, is of great value. There is scarcely an event that transpires around you, from which you may not, by critical observation, derive lessons of wisdom—there is not an object upon which your eyes can rest, when properly studied, that will not increase your information. But all those sources of knowledge are sealed up, without you take proper measures to open them. Unless you observe and reflect, wisdom may instruct, and knowledge lift up her voice, "but hearing you hear not, and seeing you do not perceive." Without the habit of practical observation, you may listen to the most profound instructions of wisdom, without being wiser, and examine all the curiosities of nature and art, without gaining any useful information. "Keep your eyes open," is an old and profitable maxim—not the eyes of your body only, but the eyes of your intellect also. And let your ears not only hear, but hear understandingly—with a discrimination that will enable you to appreciate and treasure up all that is instructive, and cast away whatever is demoralizing or useless.

In this respect, there is a vast difference among mankind. While one individual mingles with the world, and by thoughtful observation, increases his useful knowledge every hour—another mixes in the same scenes, listens to the same language, sees the same transactions and the same objects, without treasuring up one valuable thought. The former sees and hears to obtain information; the latter only to gratify an idle curiosity. While one person, in straying over the fields, beholds in every tree, in every flower and blade of grass, indications of the wisdom and goodness of God, and thus is led to reflect upon the characteristics of Deity; another views the same objects, and only thinks that the tree affords a shade from the sun, and of the flowers a fragrant nosegay may be formed. While one gazes upon the sky, and observes that it is decked with "pretty spangles"—another contemplates the heavens with mingling emotions of awe, astonishment and delight. He there discovers the hand of Jehovah—he there reads lessons of the majesty, power, and wisdom of the great "I AM." Filled with wonder, he inquires—

 What hand behind the scene,
What arm almighty, put these wheeling globes
In motion, and wound up the vast machine?
Who rounded in his palm, those spacious orbs?
Who bowled them flaming thro' the dark profound,
Numerous as glittering gems of morning dew,
Or sparks from populous cities in a blaze,
And set the bosom of old night on fire?"

The habit of practical observation, while engaged in your ordinary occupations, becomes not only a stream of knowledge, but also a safe guard to screen you from evil conduct. Do you observe in an individual, a mean, unmanly action? Reflect upon it. Observe how it degrades him—how contemptible it causes him to appear in the eyes of the generous, the just, the benevolent, and how unsatisfying must be his own reflections. Do you behold one at the bar of justice, called upon to answer to the laws of his country, for his crimes? Meditate upon the unhappy effects of sin—the degradation and wretchedness it entails upon his victims—and become satisfied of the solemn truth of the Scripture declaration, that "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished." Do you perceive neighbors, from some simple misunderstanding, that could at first have been amicably explained, engage in an unhappy contention, in which all the unholy passions are brought into action, to the mutual injury of the parties, and which involves the community in turmoil and themselves in wretchedness? Observation will satisfy you of the blindness and folly of such conduct—of the necessity of exercising a forgiving spirit, and of submitting to injuries rather than to engage in hostilities, that can at best but entail disquietude upon you.

Thus, by a constant habit of observation and reflection, you can turn even the failings, the blindness, the misfortunes of others, to your own account—you can be benefited not only by the knowledge of the wise, but also by the folly of the simple. When you perceive people in circumstances of difficulty, you can trace their ill fortune back to its origin, and by perceiving the cause of their failure, you are prepared to avoid pursuing a similar course. Even the most trivial actions, when properly considered, will sometimes afford valuable lessons of instruction. "Old fashioned economists will tell you never to pass an old nail, or an old horse-shoe, or buckle, or even a pin, without taking it up, because although you may not want it now, you will find a use for it some time or other. I say the same to you with regard to observation. Mark every thing you perceive—let your observations and reflections take in every object within your reach. For there is not a fact in the whole circle of human observation, nor even a fugitive anecdote that you read in a newspaper, or hear in conversation, that will not afford some useful reflectoin." From every individual with whom you converse, however unlearned and ignorant, something new and valuable can be obtained, by proper observation. Sir Walter Scott was one of those men, who draw information from every thing within their observation. One of the means by which he obtained his celebrity as a writer, was his habit of obtaining useful hints from sources to which others would never think of looking. It is said that he was once desirous to obtain a certain obsolete word that had escaped his memory. For a long time it baffled his researches; but at length in passing two men in the street, engaged in angry contention, he heard the desired word dropped, amid oaths and imprecations—and he immediately stopped and noted it down. This is practical observation. You should, like the above named individual, endeavor to learn something every where. Your thoughts should be at your command, to meditate upon every new object and idea that may be capable of imparting valuable information. There is not any thing in the world that is not worth noticing. How many are ignorant, and remain so, because although they see and hear, yet they do not observe.

The information obtained by observation, is often more valuable than that procured in any other manner. We frequently discover individuals unskilled in letters, with little acquaintance with books, who possess a large fund of useful knowledge, and are well informed on a great variety of topics connected with human welfare—while as frequently, scholars from our institutions of learning, are lamentably ignorant of the most valuable interests of society. How is this difference to be accounted for? In this wise. The former are men of practical observation—they have studied the book of human nature—they have become acquainted with "men and things," by actual contact. But the latter have obtained their knowledge solely from books—hence they are wise in theory, but ignorant in practice—wise in regard to the past, but ignorant of the present. Could each obtain the acquirements of the other, they would then, by possessing the advantages of both theory and practice, be enabled in a superior degree, to pass through life with usefulness to themselves and to their fellow-beings. To possess these combined advantages should be the effort of every youth.

I trust my readers will not suppose I would encourage an idle curiosity, or an inquisitive intermeddling with other people's affairs. In obtaining information, I would by no means, have you mingle with bad company, intrude where it would not be proper to appear, or take part in scenes where you are not personally interested. But wherever your intercourse leads you, I would have you attentive to things around. When you are engaged in business, you have numerous opportunities to observe the workings of human passions and human virtues—the influences upon man's happiness, of honesty, benevolence and generosity, on the one hand, and of avarice, fraud and crime, upon the other. In company, you can perceive and note the characteristics of different individuals, and observe the disposition and manners which renders one agreeable to all, especially to the virtuous and good, and the conduct by which others cause themselves to be disliked and shunned. Thus you can be a constant student, reading lessons which will afford the richest wisdom. This work of observation should, in most cases, be performed in silence. When you discover a fault in another, I would have you silently benefit yourself by reflecting upon its deleterious influences, but not needlessly trumpet it to the world. Improve your minds rather by meditating upon the imperfections of others, than by expatriating upon, and enlarging them, to the detriment of their unfortunate possessors.

TO BE REMEMBERED.

BY REV. T. J. TENNEY.

It is somewhat remarkable that, in all the directions of Jesus to his apostles and the seventy, he has not given them a single word on the subject of an endless hell.

He says in his instructions to the twelve, (Matt. x: 5-7,) "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any of the cities of the Samaritans enter ye not: But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. And as ye go, preach, saying"—saying what?—that the kingdom of hell is at hand? that they are in danger of endless punishment? O no, reader, this is not what they were commanded to preach, "saying, the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

Again, (in Luke ix: 2,) "And he sent them to preach"—to preach what? the kingdom of the devil? the endless existence of sin and misery? Was this to fall from their tongues, more fatal than the poisonous breath of the Bohon Upas? No—no; their directions were to "preach the kingdom of God."

And again, he says to the seventy (Luke x: 9,) "And say unto them"—What should they say unto them?—that there is a lake of liquid fire wherein the sinner shall burn and burn forever? that a God of love and mercy will resist the wicked with an infinity of holy wrath? that he will cast them off forever? that hell is gaping wide to receive its prey? Was such the command of Jesus, the son of God? No never—never. "Say to them," says he, "the kingdom of God is come nigh unto you."

How different is this from the preaching of the present day! It appears to us, that there must have been a deviation from the command, and instead of heaven, the burden of the preacher is hell. O that we might see men and teachers returning from their wallowing in mire, to the clean waters of the living God!

ROMANS VIII: 20.

"For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope."

Br. Grosh—I observed some remarks, over your signature, in reference to the above passage, in the second number of the present volume of the Magazine, in which you agree with Orthodox commentators that the words "not willingly" are spoken with relation to the creature, instead of, as some suppose, with relation to "him who hath subjected the same in hope," etc.

Br. L. L. Sadler, I noticed in the last number of your paper, does not assent to the correctness of this interpretation, but supposes that the expression "not willingly" has reference to God; and even goes so far as to remark that the common interpretation of the text, "to say the least, renders the words 'not willingly' useless and unnecessary."

Whether Br. Sadler was aware what he was doing when he made this declaration, I know not; but, certainly, if the common exposition is correct, St. Paul stands charged with the employment of language both "useless and unnecessary."

Although Br. Sadler thinks that his interpretation of the passage "seems almost self-evident" from the explanatory verse following, I am well satisfied that if he had taken the trouble to examine the passage as it stands in the Greek, he would have found it, not only "self-evident" that the common interpretation is correct, but impossible to make any other interpretation. The Greek of the text is as follows, Te gar mataioteti he ktisis hupetage, ouch hekousa, alla dia ton hupotaxanta ep' elpidi, which, translated literally, reads thus, For to vanity the creature (or creation, for the same word is translated creation in the 23d verse, which is here translated creature) was rendered subordinate, not of its own accord, but on account of him having subjected it to hope. The expression, "not willingly," in the English language, is adverbial. The Greek adjective, hekousa, when translated into English, is made by the Translators, I know not why, an adverb. The words in the Greek, which are translated "not willingly" in our language, are ouch hekousa. Ouch is an adverb signifying not. Hekousa is an adjective signifying voluntary, of one's own accord, willing, instead of willingly. As the adjective hekousa, meaning willing, must belong to some noun which it qualifies, what is that noun? The noun ktisis, signifying creature or creation, is in the nominative case and feminine gender—the adjective hekousa is in the nominative case and feminine gender—there is no other nominative case of any kind in the verse; and consequently hekousa, meaning willing, which, with ouch, means not willing, must belong to ktisis, which decides the matter that the words "not willingly," or, more correctly, "not willing," have reference to the creature. That the words ouch hekousa, rendered "not willingly," can not be made in any way to refer to God, is evident, because, as hekousa is not an adverb, it can not be used adverbially in relation to the Creator; and as it is an adjective of the feminine gender, it can not refer to God, for then it would be necessary it should be masculine.

"For to vanity was the creature (or creation) rendered subordinate, not of its own accord, but on account of him having subjected it to hope that the creature (or creation) itself shall also be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God"—a hope which God would not give, if he did not intend it should be realized. You will observe, I use the word "that" instead of "because" at the commencement of the 21st verse, which is undoubtedly the correct rendering of the Greek hotei in this place, and which makes the connection between the two verses more smooth and intelligible.

If Br. Sadler will look into his Greek Testament, and examine the passage there, he will be compelled to reject the interpretation he has given, as it is absolutely impossible that such an interpretation can be even forced upon the Greek as it now stands; and as to altering the Greek, that, of course, Br. Sadler would not wish. E. B. V.

A DREAM.

"Thoughts, words, and deeds, the statute blames with reason; But surely dreams were ne'er indicted treason."—BURNS.

Br. Grosh—After returning from the "Fair," described in your paper of last week, I retired to rest, and with my thoughts full of the subject, fell asleep. I had a dream. Methought the reign of religious fairs had fully come. All opposition was silenced, and they were no longer conducted on the petty, retail plan described last week; but partaking the general spirit of improvement peculiar to the present age, were pursued on a much extended scale.

I had landed in New York, and was proceeding up Chatham street, when my attention was arrested by a large hand-bill on a lamp-post. I paused and read as follows;

"GRAND NATIONAL FAIR.

For the Emolument and Glory of the Church,

Will take place on the — Inst., at 2 o'clock P. M., at the Race Course, on Long Island."

By a reference to the date, and a glimpse at my watch, I found I had arrived just in time to witness the performance. I hastened across the city, procured ferrriage to Brooklyn, and soon found myself at the scene of action. Seeing a multitude gathering around a banner that waved aloft, bearing the ensign of the cross, I wended thither. I was stopped at the gate, and ten dollars demanded for admission. Learning that I was a clergyman, however, the keeper admitted me gratuitously.

On arriving at the Race Course I discovered some half a dozen steeds, richly but lightly caparisoned, and mounted by as many Rev. D. Ds. The steeds were all of a milk white, labelled on the side, in large black letters, with certain abbreviated words which I could not understand. On the side of one was written "REL. PART. IN POL." This steed was mounted by a gentleman late of Philadelphia. On another was "AMER. TEMP. Soc." which was bestrode by a gentleman from Ohio, late of Boston. Two others were labelled, the one, "IMM. ABOL." and the other "MOR. REF.", and these were ridden by two gentlemen from the interior of the Empire State. Another which seemed somewhat old and broken, was labelled "FOR. MISS."

My attention was soon after attracted by the appearance of a new steed, about the color of the planet Mars, as seen through the telescope—a fiery red. He was shod with steel, and the shoes embossed with gun-flints; brandished a tail like the tail of a comet—carried his head like a sea-serpent, and reared and pranced around, jostling and annoying the Rev. gentlemen who bestrode the other steeds. He was mounted by a thin visaged, ghastly looking man who was very deliberately rolling a huge lump of opium in his mouth, as a substitute for tobacco. I inquired his residence; and was informed that he had "no certain dwelling place;" but was a most celebrated itinerant evangelist. Each rider wore a superfine, black, jockey coat, with a huge pocket in the right side, which I observed to be full of papers. "Some of these are fine steeds," I remarked soliloquiously. "Yes," replied an honest looking nian on my right—"pity they are not straddled by their right owners."

On a rostrum at one side of the course, stood the crier with his bell; and every few moments he impatiently exclaimed, "Riders all ready! Bets all made?" I looked around in the throng and saw hundreds drawing their purses and staking wagers on their favorite steeds, stipulating always, that the money lost or won, should be applied to the object specified by the label on the side of the winning steed. Among the bettors, two attracted my attention by the immense sums they staked. One I learned was from Peterboro. The other was a thin man, a distinguished silk merchant in New York. But the most numerous wagers were laid upon the fiery steed ridden by the opium eater.

The afternoon began to wane, when the bell rung long and loudly, and the word was given for the starting. The riders flourished whip and clapped spurs—the audience shouted and huzzaced, and the racers were off. I looked after them, and lo! beneath the feet of the flinty-footed, fiery steed, there rolled a train of fire, such as may be supposed to issue down the sides of Vesuvius during an eruption. The riders, ever and anon, as they pursued their flight, put their hands in the huge pocket in the side of the jockey coat, and scattered pamphlets among the multitude. I gathered some, and found they were stereotyped at Andover. The steeds were soon out of sight. I turned my eyes in the opposite direction, and in a few moments they appeared in sight again, having nearly completed the circle. Far ahead of all the rest, came the fiery-footed steed of the itinerant evangelist. Great shouts and acclamations followed; and the partisans of the fiery steed sent up rockets for half an hour.

The races were now finished. I looked at a small hand-bill I had procured, and saw, as next in order, "Eels in the mud, or Agonizing, by the celebrated theological Agonistes, Mr. L-j-hn." The performance soon followed, being similar to something I had seen in the circus, when a boy. The tumbler then passed his hat, and soon withdrew, laden with coin, which he informed us was designed for the Lord's treasury.

I was now directed to a small building inside the course, called the "Missionary Museum." The price of admittance was five dollars. Here were collected a great number of "graven images," said to be actual deities of the Pacific islanders. One of these I instantly recognized, having seen it carried from the shop of carver in New York, that morning.

The evening being now far advanced, I began to look about for lodgings. I soon discovered a stately building with a sign swinging, on which was written, "National Fair Depository, and Temperance Retreat." I entered, not doubting I should meet good company within. In the midst of a spacious room, I discovered a large circular table. In the centre of the table stood a demijohn of cold water, and around it, sat the Rev. gentlemen I had seen mounted on the racers, with cards in hand, busily engaged in some sort of game. The game was soon finished, and two of the gentlemen, drawing their chairs asunder, and placing a vacant one one between, politely invited me to "sit by and take a hand;" adding, that all monies won, would be faithfully appropriated to some of the religious objects specified on the back of the cards. I refused indignantly, and began to declaim with some vehemence against the whole system of religious gambling, swindling, and buffoonery. I was about repeating the Scripture in regard to Jesus driving from the temple, the money changers, venders of sheep, oxen, doves, etc., when they cried out, as with one voice, "Out with him! Out with him! He is a gainsayer, a heretic, an infidel!" I found myself suddenly and violently seized by a huge Kentuckian bully, whom I remembered having recently seen engaged in a religious discussion in Philadelphia. I struggled to extricate myself—awoke—and behold, it was a dream! APOLLOS.

THE SKEPTIC AND RELIGION.

"Religion will soon be numbered among the things which have been and are not."—Skeptic.

And must religion die? Must that prolific source of joy to its votaries, become extinct? Shall the "Holy Scriptures" at last prove to be a fable; and Christianity an unpleasant dream? Must that religion which gives its votaries such unspeakable delight in contemplating the glorious end of our existence, be banished from the universe, and those who have been so active in the cause, and have made such sacrifices for religion, be compensated for their pains with nothing but disappointment and blank annihilation? Must our religion pass away as the shadow of a cloud, leaving no traces behind it, and be numbered with the things which have been forgotten?

Reader, have you made up your mind upon this all important subject? Can you answer the above questions to the satisfaction of your own mind? Ponder well upon this subject, for perhaps no other is more spoken of, and less understood.

Blame not the poor skeptic, nor judge him rashly, although he vaunts over our religion and says it soon will be no more.

Take into retrospection the religious world, and behold the spirit of persecution, of bigotry and intolerance, fostered by the most zealous of religionists, let loose into the world, and the rivers of blood that have flowed for our religion. Our religion has been the "bone of contention" in all ages, and in every country where people have been over much righteous; and guilt and crime have characterized the founders of, or those who have attempted to suppress, almost every sect of religionists, down to the present day. Some religions, (for they are many,) have been established and perpetuated by the sword, and the rack, the torture and the gibbet have been called into requisition for the suppression of others.

Contrasting the religious persecution, and zeal in defence of religion, in past ages, with that of the present day, we find it to be a fact, that more toleration is exercised, less persecution is suffered, and consequently professors of religion are not under the necessity of making the same sacrifices, neither do they manifest the same degree of warmth on that subject, as formerly: And hence to the superficial and disinterested observer, it would seem that religion is on the wane, or, to use a skeptical term, "is consumptive."

And, to review our own day, we find it to be a fact, that those who have acted a conspicuous part in the scenes of modern revivals, and displayed the most activity in the proselyting business, are becoming cold in their professions; many of their converts have returned, like "the dog to his vomit;" and being disgusted with the conduct of their leaders, are now flinging their scandals upon the cause, and uniting with the scoffer, to bury religion in the dust of oblivion.

Therefore, taking the whole matter into consideration, let us forbear to blame the skeptic for judging thus, when he has no other guide but "blind leaders of the blind;" and no other light, than the darkened understandings of professors. For our own part, we seriously wonder that skepticism and infidelity are not more prevalent; for the name of God is every day blasphemed by those who profess to be religious, and our heavenly Father is dishonored by his children, who represent him in a character which would disgrace even a Nero. Would it not be well, then, for this state of things to be exchanged for something better? Ay! what could be worse than this? Is there melody in the hollow sounding groans of maniacs, or the heart-rending cries of mothers, who, in hopeless despair, have followed their "unconverted" offspring to the receptacle of the dead, expecting they have become the sport of demons, to wail in hopeless grief and ceaseless woe? or is there beauty in the distorted countenance of the youth, who is agonizing under the belief that he, or she, has committed the unpardonable sin? Far more to be desired is the dark prospect of annihilation. But shall these things be? shall religion die? or will it survive the wreck of bigotry, persecution, and overheated zeal?—As we said, religions are many, and we believe it to be a fact that there is such a thing as pure religion; so we shall conclude that one religion will not die; for man is naturally a religious being, and does and will worship something; but unaided by the light of revelation, he will worship he knows not what; as the records of all past ages testify: and as is the character which he attributes to the God he worships, so will his devotion be and his character will be assimilated to the same; for nothing is more natural or reasonable than for a man to be a follower of his God as a dear child.

St. Paul says, "after the strictest sect of our religion, I lived a Pharisee." It was a Pharisaic religion, then, which caused so much persecution; for when did the true Christians persecute the Jews? It was a Pharisaic religion that stoned Stephen. It was a Pharisaic religion that persecuted the disciples from city to city, scourged them in the synagogues, and dragged them to prison, the rack, the torture and the gibbet! It was a Pharisaic religion which erected the Spanish Inquisition and performed the "Holy Crusades." It was a Pharisaic religion that burnt Servetus and persecuted the Quakers at Boston! It was a Pharisaic religion that put in motion and drove the wheels of modern Orthodoxy, in revivals of fanaticism, and prosecuted Kneeland!! In short, a strait or narrow sected, Pharisaic religion has been, and still is, the prolific source of all religious intolerance, and persecution; and infidelity is its legitimate offspring. Then let every contracted, Pharisaic religion die; and may God in mercy speed its flight, upon the head of the scape goat, to the land of oblivion—that the universal, benevolent religion of Jesus may no more be despised on account of its enemy—that the genuine may no longer be rejected as the counterfeit—that the pure may no longer be charged with the errors and malpractices of the corrupt—and that love supreme and universal may be the law of mankind, and Christianity bloom in every heart and every life, now and forever. AMEN.

ELDER WHITCHER AND BR. LEWIS.

Br. GROSH—The following letter from Elder Whitcher, in reply to one which I addressed to him in last year's volume, was received by me some little time since, accompanied by the following note: "Mr. Lewis—Sir, I desire that this be published in the Magazine and Advocate immediately, and a copy sent to me, or the letter returned to me. H. W." I wrote him in reply, that though his letter might probably be published, (as indeed it is my wish that it should be,) there was no prospect of its appearing so soon as he seemed to desire, for that the whole would have to be re-written before it would be fit for the press, and that if I had this labor to do, I must be allowed my own time—that I felt under no very pressing obligation to do all this for him, for the principal purpose of enabling him more publicly and extensively to unchristianize me, when I knew it to be a fact that I had a great deal more faith in Christ than he professed to have, etc. He rejoined that he was convinced that the real cause of my not sending his reply for publication, was the fairness of his answer, and his plain exposure of my errors, and closed with the following alarming threat: "Now Sir, if it be not published in the Magazine and Advocate, it will be in a more extensively circulated paper." [Whew! A. B. G.] This being the aspect of affairs, you will please understand that I must have felt myself "moved by fear" to do something in the premises forthwith. I have therefore re-written his letter, in pity to the compositor, and send you a copy, which you will please publish verbatim, et literatim, etc.

J. LEWIS.

A REPLY TO REV. J. LEWIS' LETTER.

Mr. Lewis sir, I consider it my duty to answer your letter addressed to me in the Magazine and Advocate, No. 35, vol. 7th. You appear to be grieved with me for misrepresenting, (as you say) your sentiments. Now, sir, if I have misrepresented your sentiments, either in writing or preaching, I stand condemned, and acknowledge the sentence just. But sir, I plead, not guilty. To show that I am not, let us examine the points that appear in your letter. And First, you extract a part of my prefatory remarks to "Universalism renounced," etc. In the extract I asserted that, "universalism teaches that the Murderer, Thief, Liar, Robber, Drunkard, Swearer, Sabbath-Breaker, the Whore, and Whore Munger, the adulterer, the covetous, the Proud, and all other wicked men and unbelievers, shall go directly to Heaven with the righteous believer in Christ." You say that universalism teaches no such thing. One of us must be in the fault. Let us see which it is. And first I would say that the meaning which you attach to me in this extract, is not my meaning. You say that you are "compelled to understand me to mean that universalism teaches that there will be in Heaven both Wicked men and Righteous Believers and Unbelievers." My meaning was that universalism teaches that the Men and Women who sustained the characters above mentioned, in this Life, and died with the same, would "go directly to Heaven" etc. i. e. be saved in the world to come Just as tho' they had been ever so good people here. Now sir, it is well known to all that such persons, as above mentioned, live, and die as they live: The Drunkard has died in a fit of beastly intoxication. The Infidel has left the world denying the Bible and cursing Christ. * * * * * Many have fallen in battle, in all their sins and guilt. And it is also known that universalism teaches the salvation of all men, i. e. that all men, Women and children, will "go to Heaven" be their character what it may here, without suffering any punishment after death, for their sins. Therefore it teaches Just what I said it did in the extract. These wicked men and women must go to Heaven or to Hell, or be annihilated. And universalism says that all shall be saved. But remember, I do not say it teaches that they will be such there, All the difference that I can see between my declaration concerning the doctrine, and your own preaching, is—I present it naked, in which state all of its deformities are clearly seen. But you clad it in some plausible garb. In my quotation of 1 Chor. 6, 9, I did not mean that none, having sustained one, or even all of the characters there mentioned, could be "washed justified, sanctified and saved," But I meant that none living and dying, with such characters can be saved. For I am nowhere taught in the Bible that repentance and faith can be exercised after Death; neither am I any where taught in that Book that any adult person can be "washed, Justified, sanctified and saved," without the exercise of repentance and faith; Neither am I taught in the scriptures that any adult person can be saved in Heaven, without being washed justified, and sanctified. I quoted this text to show that universalism and the Bible, come in contact with each other.

Sec. You refer to "representations of this doctrine" which you call "disingenious and unjust," as it regards their disingeniousness I have nothing to say, for I do not profess much ingenuity. But I shall deny their being unjust, until I am convinced that they are untrue. 1. By setting universalism and christianity in opposition, as in the expression; "it is better to be a christian than to trust to universalism." The above expression was made under the conviction that universalism both in doctrine and practice, was, at least in this country, the opposit of christianity; and this conviction is the more deeply rooted, when I consider that in all my acquaintance (which is not very limited) I scarcely know an individual, professing to be a universalist, whom I can acknowledge to be a christian. Again, say you, "adverting to the rare fact that some had renounced universalism which fact you adduced as an evidence that the doctrine was untrue, not considering, I presume, that the many instances of People renouncing the contrary doctrine, would do quite as much towards proving that untrue also." You spoke of their "renouncing universalism and embracing religion." I would ask you sir, if the renunciation of universalism is a rare fact? I think you are some mistaken in the above. I adduced as an argument against the doctrine, the fact that many had renounced universalism, on a death Bed, and embraced religion, i. e. became believers in the importance of becoming christians, in order to be saved, and submitted to the requirements of Christ. But I never knew one to renounce the latter belief and imbrace the former in a dying hour. The above expressions were made because, as far as I am acquainted, those persons who have been christians, and afterwards become universalists have always forsaken that which I call christianity. And those who become cristians, who have been universalists have renounced universalists' principles. And I have never known one sinner to be converted from his sins to the service of God, by the preaching of universalists. But in the most of places, if not in all, where universalism is preached, the people become more vicious, and opposed to christianity. Therefore from the fruit it beares, I came to the conclusion that it is a fals doctrine, the same that the Serpent preached to Eve in the garden, which gave God the lie. Oh may God have mercy on you, and show you your danger, and all whom you are leading to ruin. Again, say you, "I cannot stop to comment upon the Popish arrogance displayed in these representations," etc. If plainly, boldly, and fearlessly opposing error, and defending the truth, be a display of "Popish arrogance," then I have been guilty of it. Again say you, "many of your representations and insinuations, if taken in any thing like the ordinary sense of language, are positively fals and slanderous." Sir, I would ask you if you will call a Liar and a Slanderer, BROTHER? Wonderfully friendly!!

I would Just say that I believe in honest, fair and true dealing between men especially in religious matters. And I believe that to misrepresent sentiments, is not fair. You recommend me to become acquainted with your sentiments before I oppose them. Sir, I think that I have read universalist's writings too much to be unacquainted with their sentiments.

And now in the conclusion sir, I would Just say, as you and I profess to be teachers, and probably exert an influence over some, if not over many, it stands us in hand to see that the doctrine we preach, is true, and will stand in the Judgement day. Of one thing sir, I am assured, that if my doctrine faile me, yours will catch me. But if yours fail what will you do? If a person be a christian he is safe any way. But the sinner—where is his safety? May the Lord guide us into all truth.

Yours in good will, HIRAM WHITCHER.

REJOINDER.

Elder WHITCHER—Upon the foregoing, I shall trouble you with but few remarks through a public medium—a private letter I deem best adapted to the subject.

Because I addressed you by the appellation of brother, and also complained of your misrepresentations, you ask in staring capitals, whether I "will call a liar and a slanderer brother." Answer. If I do, it will not be on account of his character. But I did not call you these names, as you would make the public believe—something nearer home may have done so, for aught I know—but it is not I that is your accuser in this; for after making the statement quoted by you, I took particular care to say, "Now do not misunderstand me—I do not accuse you of intentionally violating the truth." I called you brother on the same principle I would address any other clergyman by that appellation: You profess to be, what it is my privilege to be, a preacher of the Gospel of Christ; and it is not my prerogative or desire to judge "another man's servant."

As an excuse for setting Universalism and Christianity in opposition, you say you did it under the conviction that Universalism was (I suppose you mean is) the opposite of Christianity. And the proof you bring, or the principal part of it, is thus expressed; "I scarcely know an individual, professing to be a Universalist, whom I can acknowledge to be a Christian." Great I! in its most bloated dimensions.

You ask me if the renunciation of Universalism is a rare fact. I answer, that compared with the transit of Venus over the sun's disc, or even with a total eclipse of the sun, it may be considered as an event of somewhat frequent occurrence. But compare it with the renunciation of Partialism, (by which I mean the doctrine that only a part of mankind will ever be saved,) and it is certainly rare in the proportion of one to a very great many. The denunciation of Universalism is not so very rare.

You say that in the extract which I made from your writings, the meaning which I attach to you (I suppose you mean to your language) is not your meaning—that you did not mean that Universalism teaches there will be wicked unbelievers in heaven. If you did not mean so bad as you said, I am glad. How the public will view the matter, I am not prepared to say; but I should not be surprised if it were to be considered as an ingenious (not ingenious) way of getting out of a difficulty.

In the letter which I addressed to you, there was one typographical error. The word "disingenuous" was, by mistake printed "disingenuous." You therefore remark that you "do not profess much ingenuity." I reply that I think I discover in you much more of ingenuity than of ingenuousness, though I cannot say that you excel in either. I am sure that no person of good sense, who had ever heard of mistakes in printing, would seriously suppose that I intended to complain of you for your want of ingenuity. I should think that U and I are not very much alike, and I am sorry that the one should have been mistaken for the other; but the mistake has afforded you a fine opportunity to display your disingenuousness, and the use you have made of it gives me an opportunity to correct an error of the press.

You say it is "known that Universalism teaches the salvation of all men." I reply it is also known that St. Paul teaches the same doctrine. You tell me that the phrase "all men," as used in the Scriptures, is explained by Universalists, to mean "all men, women, and children." You are right in this also; but whether you consider this definition to be one among the anti-christian tenets of Universalists, you do not inform me. It is certain however, according to the Scriptures, that God "will have all men to be saved," whether the phrase in question includes the whole of our race, or only the male part of those adult persons you mention. And it is equally certain, in my mind, that as God will have this done, so Jesus Christ is the one that will do it; and that neither you, nor any one else, nor all opposition combined, can prevent his becoming "the Saviour of the world."

If I were to assert, in general terms, that the believers in endless misery hold that Christ died for only a part of mankind, that the remainder were irrevocably pre-doomed to an endless hell, and created on purpose to be endlessly tortured, you would probably say that I had misrepresented, or at least misstated, the facts in the case; for that although some might thus believe, the members of your denomination do not hold the doctrine of unconditional election and reprobation. But very analogous to this, is your statement, so oft-repeated, that Universalism teaches that there is no punishment after death. It is true that there are some Universalists who hold this idea, but there are very many who do not. Hence though you by dint of explanation, claim to have made it appear that Universalism teaches just what you said it did, and though you profess to be well acquainted with the doctrine, you still misrepresent it in one point, to say no more.

But why should you take so much pains to say that Universalism teaches that there is no punishment after death? If punishment be limited in duration, what matters it whether it be all received in this life, or partly in the next? Are you a secret believer in limited, remedial punishment after death? If you are, do not oppose Universalism; for in so doing, you measurably oppose your own sentiments.

You pray that God may have mercy on me, and show me my danger, and all those whom I am leading to ruin. I am obliged to you for your prayers, as inconsistent and ungracious as they are, for I think they may have been dictated by benevolence. Your object in having me see my danger, though not expressed, I suppose to be this, that I may be induced to try to escape from it. But what could have been the object of Deity in voluntarily placing an (to me,) unseen, though infinite and endless curse in my path, unless it were that I might be its victim? And if such was his object, why pray that he will show me my danger, and thus the ruin which he has prepared, be, as respects my case, useless? With as much propriety might we beseech the angler to show the fishes their danger of being ruined by the hook which he has concealed in the alluring bait.

Again. Do you seriously suppose that the great and good Father of all is actually permitting the ruin of many of his weak and ignorant offspring by blind and wicked leaders? If to become a Universalist, is to take the road to endless ruin, then, alas! are Universalist ministers the means of inducing many to become their fellow-travellers. And if they are exerting so ruinous an influence upon the ultimate destinies of mankind, yea so very ruinous as that they are thereby placed beyond the reach of infinite mercy, why are they permitted to exist from year to year? Have they not ruined souls enough yet? But perhaps it will be said that they are spared that they may repent and be saved. What! Can a man be the means of sending fifty, or one hundred, or one thousand of his fellow-creatures to an endless hell, and then be himself received to heaven? And can he then be happy, and that in the most perfect degree, and throughout a long eternity, while he knows, or even mistrusts, the fate of his victims? If so, who, was the best prepared for heaven, Nero, or Howard? But away with such stuff! 'tis absurd, ridiculous, preposterous, well nigh blasphemous! The ultimate destinies of mankind are in the hands of Jesus Christ. He is the Lord of the dead and the living. He will draw all men unto him.

I conclude by responding amen to your closing sentence, "May the Lord guide us into all (the) truth." And though you seem disposed to deny the relationship, I still subscribe myself your brother,

JASON LEWIS.

From the Herald of Truth.

TO ER. JOB POTTER.

DEAR BROTHER—In the October No. of the Mil-lennial Harbinger, edited by Mr. Alexander Campbell, are some remarks from the pen of that gentleman in regard to one of your meetings in Lockport, and to a short debate which he held with you. Fearful that he may have misrepresented the matter, for men who become overhearing from flattery may see through a distorted vision, I take the liberty of thus addressing you, that your version of the affair may stand with his exhibition. The remarks to which I allude, are contained in the following extract.

"Next morning, contrary to our expectations we had some twenty miles to go to Lockport meeting; for the stage in which we expected to proceed on Saturday evening had departed before we arrived at Lewistown. When we arrived at Lockport we ascertained that our appointment, by some fatality, had not reached the village. It was raining quite heavily, and consequently the disappointment was not very great. A Universalist church met in the court-house in the forenoon by regular appointment; and as our appointment was to have been made for that place, we went to hear this new doctrine, and to intimate our intentions concerning the afternoon.

"The meeting was not very full; but yet there was a quorum present. There were one bass viol, one old flute, two players, two singers, one reverend and venerable looking preacher, and some ten hearers, besides my company, which by adding the two brethren Bennetts and some females, counted seven. Soon as the reverend preacher ascertained I was in the house, he charitably invited me to take part in "the worship of the day;" but not exactly understanding what part might be assigned me, I conscientiously declined. Meanwhile a ruddy middle-aged gentleman began to tune the old fiddle, as the first solemn note of preparation; while his brother chorister screwed up his flute, and began to look grave. They played some preparatory piece; after which the parson solemnly read out his Universalist anthem suited to the occasion. The two musicians, supported by two pious females and some third voice, played their parts most symphoniously, while all the congregation stood in mute admiration of their spirit-stirring devotion.

"Then came the prayer, at which all sat in silent attention; and then the sermon on the words, "So we preach and so you believed." "Paul," said the preacher, "had been a Pharisee, but was now converted from that creed, and one of the dogmas of the Pharisees was the notion of future punishment; and inasmuch as Paul was now converted from Phariseism, he must have given up the notion of future punishment." This logical deduction furnished an occasion for a full display of the claims of the Universalist faith. He travelled, I presume to say, for our sakes, far out of the record of his regular course, and fortified his system on all points. Soon as he had made an end, arising, we asked the gentleman to explain one sentence which we did not understand, intimating that we intended to review his discourse in the afternoon, and wished to have a full exposition of his views that we might do him ample justice. The explanation sought was imperfectly given, and the appointment made.

"It continued to rain with increasing violence, and it appeared that we had exactly or nearly the same congregation in the afternoon as in the forenoon. We reviewed, and, as we thought, fully exposed the numerous misapplications and misquotations of scriptures, and detected a part of the false reasonings by which this preacher would secure the salvation of the world by annulling hell, perdition, the second death, and all the threatened destruction of the Bible. It soon appeared that the audience had no great love for a system that would jeopardise their hope of heaven while in their sins, by proving that there was some "sorer punishment" than death for those who despised the Gospel. It was evident they felt their title to heaven resting upon the assumption that there was no hell. I called upon the gentleman when I finished, to say whether I had misrepresented his views. He arose and defended his doctrine. I replied. He arose again. I replied and left him inextricably bound in the reasonings of Paul, 2 Thess. i: 7-10, and Heb. x: 26-29. "The sorer punishment" than death he attempted not to explain, and "the everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power" he could not dispose of with any thing like plausibility, inasmuch as "the coming of the Lord" here spoken of was shown to be after the present apostasy, and not at the destruction of Jerusalem, as all the Universalists most unscripturally, illogically and recklessly affirm."

In the first part of his remarks, he ridicules your choir—while, by italicising the word ruddy applied to the gentleman who played the "old fiddle," (Quere, bass viol!) he would have us infer, that said gentleman was intemperate, though we know not that Mr. Campbell had any other reason for his insinuation than mere ruddiness. This making sport of your choir, however, it is not necessary to notice—for words are inadequate to express the contemptible practice of that man, who will ridicule the worship of a society of believers. In this matter, Mr. Campbell has descended so far below the dignity of a gentleman, that it is unworthy of reply—and if I am not mistaken, the majority of his people will judge that in this case, he lost sight of that charity which thinketh no evil.

But his representation of the debate is not a subject to be passed unnoticed. He boasts in the above extract, as he did to me personally, that he completely wound you up, so that you could not answer his arguments. How is this, Br.? Will you let us hear from you touching this thing, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every truth may be established?

Yours in Christ, GEO. W. MONTGOMERY.

LETTER TO BR. MONTGOMERY.

SIR—In the 50th No. of the "Herald," I noticed an extract from the "Millennial Harbinger," edited by Alexander Campbell, in which he has pretended to give a description of a meeting at Lockport, in June last, on which occasion I preached in the morning, and he in the afternoon, in which you call on me for a reply to the extract. My greatest regret is that any notice should be taken of the man who has so far lost sight of, not only the Christian character, but of the gentleman—who on the above occasion gave evidence of entire recklessness to all decency, religion and truth—whose only object was to be noticed, and who was willing to stoop to any means for its accomplishment. And I challenge the world to produce an instance of a fanatic who ever gave a true version of any subject which was connected with the procuring cause of the monomania.

Passing over the rude and unchristian manner in which he ridiculed the introductory services of the above occasion—which, by the by, is in perfect keeping with the whole transaction—he assigned as a reason for declining my invitation "to take a part in the worship of the day, was not knowing the part that would be assigned him." I expressly invited him to make the introductory prayer—that's all—so much for "conscientiousness." My text was 1 Cor. xv.—part of the 11th verse—"so we preach." I first spoke of the Gospel which is "good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people;" and the author of the text in publishing it says, "it is the Gospel of the grace of God"—"the Gospel of peace"—"of salvation"—"glorious Gospel"—"the Gospel of Christ"—and "the Gospel of God." I next remarked that the author of the text was a Jew by birth, and by education a Pharisee of the strictest sect, and showed from Prideaux and Josephus that one of the leading doctrines of the Pharisees was the purchase of heaven by good works, and the punishment of the wicked in hell, and that being opposed to the "Gospel of the grace of God" was a reason why the apostle obtained letters from the high priest to persecute the advocates of the grace and salvation of God to all men; and that his conversion to "the Gospel of salvation" consequently produced a change of mind on that subject, destroyed the spirit of hatred and persecution, and mouldered his mind into the likeness of its divine author and inspired him with love to God and all men. I next quoted several passages in direct proof of the ultimate reconciliation of all men to God—such as Eph. i: 8-14; Phil. ii: 9-12; Col. i: 19-21, and others of like import, and added, "so we preach." I next showed that the apostle preached repentance and the remission of sins—which was not sorrow for sins without forsaking them—but that repentance and reformation are the same—that the Gospel never taught the forgiveness or remission of punishment, but of sin—and that forgiveness signifies to put away, and that the only means by which man can obtain forgiveness is to forgive all men, and then he will put away sinful affections, which brings man up to the standard of the divine requirements to love God and his neighbor—"so we preach." I next showed that the apostle preached a certain retribution or punishment for all sin, and as proof quoted Col. iii: 25. "But he that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done; and there is no respect of persons"—and much more to the same effect; and the apostle never preached that sinners would be punished in the hell of modern Christians, as that would prove too much, to punish every sin and every sinner in a place of endless woe; and since the apostle's conversion, he never preached the punishment of hell to either Jew or Gentile, and for proof referred to his writing and preaching; and showed from Dr. George Campbell and others that the definition of the Hebrew "sheol" and Greek "aites" means the state of the dead in general, and that "Gehenna" was the burning in the valley of the son of Hinnom, and that "tartarus" was of Heathen origin and simply meant the place of departed spirits, which were the only words that had been translated hell. In confirmation of the above doctrine, we quoted the apostle's words to the church at Ephesus, in Acts xx, where he says "I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God." The inquiry was instituted, (upon the position being admitted that the apostle believed that sinners would be punished in hell in the future world,) why he did not once mention it in all his ministry, and yet had "declared unto them all the counsel of God." I next brought to view the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, in which dishonor is made glorious, weakness made powerful, natural made spiritual—and corruption will put on incorruption, and mortal will put on immortality and death be swallowed up in victory. And without "travelling out of the record for the sake of Mr. C.," I concluded, "so we preach." Whereupon Mr. C. rose after I had given notice that he would preach in the afternoon, and inquired, "whether punishment would continue as long as men continued to sin?" and on receiving an affirmative answer, he declared himself satisfied in presence of the congregation, and then gave notice that he should review my sermon; and his dissatisfaction respecting the answer to his question did not occur to him until he penned his "spirit-stirring" article in the Harbinger.

Handbills were posted up in the village notifying his intended review of my sermon, but without effect.

The time at length came—Mr. C took his stand, and after much parade on his part, which brought to mind the case of Jehu of old who said, "Come with me, and see my zeal for the Lord," commenced by reading Ps. l. from the 16th verse to the end, Mark xvi. from the 14th verse to the end, and 2 Thess. i. to the 11th verse. Then came his introduction, which occupied forty minutes, in which he informed the congregation what wonders he had done, and what he was then about to do—finding fault with the present mode of preaching, which by way of distinction he was pleased to call "textuary preaching," and "sectarianism" came in for a large share—mystifying as much as possible, and dealing in his wonted low abuse against all denominations, not forgetting Universalists—claiming at the same time to be free from every sect. At length came the mighty effort. He commenced with an entire approval of the definition which I had given of the word hell, and as evidence of its correctness, he informed the congregation, that he had some time since published a treatise on that subject, and that my views were in exact accordance with his. The definition and illustration of the Gospel met his entire approbation; yet, said he, all men can not be saved, notwithstanding, for in the Psalm read, we find it written—"Now consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver." This, Mr. C. told us, "could not be got over, for it was the word of God," and that it was of no avail to hope for heaven on the destruction of hell, as he had shown the absurdity of a hell in the future world; and yet he did not believe all would be saved. For, said he, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned"—and spake of the number that had passed off the stage without being baptized, and that no man can be saved without faith and baptism; but did not show what kind of baptism the text required. Mr. C approved of the illustration given of repentance, but could not consent to the salvation of all men; for, said he, "when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ; who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power." That would put to silence Universalism at once, and he seemed to quote it with a kind of triumphant pleasure, and here he seemed also to shed the full light of his countenance upon us. The above text, he said, was all he wanted to completely silence every Universalist, which he told us he had done wherever he had met them in the West and South, even the most able, but would not inform who they were. The above text was beyond refutation, and needed not to be fortified, yet he would merely mention without comment the sorer punishment spoken of in Heb. x., and the "second death." And dealing out his unmeasured abuse, which was not noticed at the time, he sat down, when I rose and inquired what baptism was meant, on which he had placed so much reliance for salvation. He informed us it was water baptism. He had now occupied the time for an hour and three quarters, the greatest amount of which was foreign from and had no connexion with the subject in question, and did not, as he said, spend one moment in correcting my "misapplications and misquotations of Scripture;" but it fell to my lot to correct him instead of his correcting me, and which was done in more than one instance, getting his acknowledgment at the time in presence of the whole congregation.

I replied first to the passage in Thess., by attempting to show Mr. C.'s mistake as to the time when the Son of man should "be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels"—by showing from the passage itself, that it was an event which they had a right to expect as near at hand; for, says he—"you that are troubled, rest with us"—then, at that time, and not in eternity—"when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven," etc., which we corroborated from Matt. x: 23, xvi: 27, 28, and xxiv: from the 1st to the 34th verse inclusive, and as he should "send his angels," that both alluded to the same event. I also showed that the passage in Matt. not only alluded to the time of the gathering together "the elect," but the sun should be darkened, and the moon should not give her light, and the stars should fall from heaven, and then adds, "This generation shall not pass away, till all these things be fulfilled." I next showed that the destruction of nations and kingdoms was shown by ancient prophets, by the destruction of the heavenly bodies, as in Isa. xlii: 8, 10, and Joel ii: 28, to the end—and then showed the fulfilment of Joel ii, by quoting Acts ii: 14-21, where Peter said, "This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel," etc., and then, that the land of Canaan—the priesthood—the covenant—the duration of all of which was to be "everlasting," had terminated eighteen hundred years since, and that "everlasting," an adjective, could not of itself show any definite duration, without the substantive with which it agreed as expressed or understood. The word everlasting when applied to mountains must consequently be limited; but when applied to God means the whole duration of eternity. And a "sorer punishment" was inflicted on Jerusalem than on the man who was stoned for gathering sticks on the Sabbath day, who was despatched at once; but those who had trodden under foot the Son of God, experienced death with all the accumulated miseries, to wit: war, pestilence and famine. They had to sip of all the above named cups at one and the same time, and finally drained the last dregs, which made the punishment "sorer" than that of him who died at once by the hands of his brethren. And when all shall be made alive in Christ who died in Adam, then "there shall be no more death"—for when "Christ shall destroy him that hath the power of death," then both the cause and the effect will cease together.

Mr. C. then rose and said, that I was altogether under a mistake respecting the passage in 2 Thess., and although I had quoted abundant proof in reference to the coming of the Son of man, "it had not touched the passage in question, for the coming of the Lord Jesus spoken of in the passage above, was not to take place till after the present apostacy." The above was all the proof offered, and I have no doubt in my mind that he supposed he had sufficiently established the fact, as there were those in the apostle's time who had become "vain in their imaginations." There was no attempt at proof of the position but from his own mouth. Mr. C. admitted that the definition which I gave of the word "everlasting" was correct when applied to the Jewish church, and he could subscribe to all

I had said on that subject, with one exception, which was—when the word "everlasting" was applied to any particular thing it meant endless."

As time was exhausted and the congregation impatient, I made a few remarks on his grammar and logic, when we separated, and thus ended this mighty affair. Leaving the subject with the candid Christian public to judge of its merits, I now close this article—ever praying for the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus Christ our Lord.

JOURNEY TO THE SOUTH.

Ere this paper goes to press, I expect to be on my way to the South. My object in going is the benefit of my health. For several years past my lungs have been very irritable, the slightest cold producing hoarseness and a violent cough, and especially for the last year this difficulty has considerably increased. I was desirous of going to a warmer climate in Autumn last, and of spending the whole Winter at the South; but could not well arrange my business affairs so as to leave home; and had almost concluded to defer it till another Autumn. But recent exposures and an increase of the difficulty have determined me to go now and spend the months of March and April, (two of the worst months in the year for lung difficulties in this region,) in a milder climate. I should thus shorten my Winter and lengthen my Summer. I do not myself feel alarmed, nor wish any of my friends to, on my account. I take this step as a precautionary one, deeming the adage a pretty good one, that "an ounce of preventive is as good as a pound of cure." Moreover, the experiment may serve to inform me somewhat in regard to the influence a warmer climate would be likely to exert on my general health and constitution. The season, however, is now so far advanced that I shall not probably go very far South nor make a very long tarry. Most likely I shall go as far South as Virginia and be gone till about the first of May.

Any business pertaining to this paper, or the settlement of any old accounts for former volumes may be transacted with Brs. Grosh and Hutchinson with equal facility as with myself. They are fully authorized to receive and receipt any monies due me on old accounts; and, by the by, I hope to find on my return, many of those said accounts settled and balanced; as I think at least, it is high time they all were.

Our readers will, most likely, see occasional traces of my pen in these columns though I may be at a distance herefrom.

MR. WHITCHER'S LETTER.

At the request of Br. Lewis, and not for the merits of the production, we give this letter a place in our columns—excepting a few words, which do not affect the argument on which the gentleman prides himself so highly (!!!) and which their own indelicacy render rather doubtful in propriety for publication. I can not refrain from adding, as I pass, that it is rather a laughable specimen of self-importance—and an exemplification of the fact, that we may see a mote in another's eye, even while we overlook the beam in our own. Our readers will certainly smile at the idea, that Br. Lewis should refuse to publish it, for fear of its arrangement and argument—but still more, when they reflect that all the difference between the faith of Mr. W. and Universalists, on the very point at which he expresses so much horror and astonishment, is simply the following. Universalists and Mr. W. both believe that the vilest of mankind, when saved from sin, will be made holy and happy in the future world. Mr. W. believes that the sinner can be saved just one moment before death, without being punished for his evil deeds; and Universalists (he says) believe that the sinner can be saved one moment after death! Horrible, to think that there is absolutely but two moments of difference between the faith of Mr. Whitcher and Universalism, even in the worst form in which Mr. W. can state it! Every candid mind, however, will give Universalism the preference on the score of reason, and of moral tendency; for it teaches that the sinner will be punished before this salvation, whereas, Mr. W. believes the sinner escapes his just punishment, and goes to glory and bliss scot free. Thus, if he has found a mote in our "eye of faith," he has overlooked the beam in his own.

We regret the typographical error—though in a word where no one would mistake its meaning, especially as there is no such word as "disingenuous," while there is such a word as "disingenuous." But, a word in Br. Lewis' ear—consider the power of Mr. W.'s arguments, the depth of his penetration, and his literary qualifications, (I mean not to reproach Mr. W. for unavoidable ignorance) and I am persuaded you will agree with me, that Mr. W. does not really know the difference in meaning between "ingenious" and "ingenuous," and is therefore perfectly excusable. 1 TIMOTHY IV: 2.

"Having their conscience seared with a hot iron."

How frequently our opposers allude to this expression, to prove that sin is not adequately punished in the earth. They tell us, the greater the sinner, the less the remorse; and intimate that if a man will but persist in sin, he will feel no compunction whatever—forgetting, that even if this is the case, there are other punishments annexed to sin, than remorse of conscience. Br. Montgomery's Sermon in No. 8, ably notices this fact. Let us now attend to the objection so far as the passage above quoted is concerned.

1. It is now generally admitted, that the punishments of the wicked in the immortal state are not outward, nor consist in literal fire and brimstone—but that they are internal, being wholly composed of mental agonies, darkness, the throes of reflection and remorse of conscience. This, I say, is generally admitted by our Partialist brethren. Now, if by a long course of iniquity the conscience becomes so seared that it can feel no remorse, how will it be able to feel these immortal punishments—especially as a longer continuance there, must sear the conscience to a perfect callous! Hence this objection is as strong against the punishments taught by Partialism in its present enlightened state, as it can be against the punishments taught by Universalism.

2. Admitting that a seared conscience cannot easily feel, it is evident that it must also lose its delicacy of perception—consequently its refined knowledge of right and wrong—of good and evil. Now, as sin exists wholly in the motive, and guilt is proportioned to the evil intended, and punishment is proportioned to the guilt, it is evident that, even on this ground, alone, even-handed justice commends the due proportion of her bitter medicines to the lips of her sin-sick, sin-deluded patient. For no just being would wish punishment inflicted in any other ratio, than according to the knowledge of good and evil, and the intention to benefit or injure, possessed by the criminal at the time of performing the action.

An idiot, who has no knowledge of right and wrong—an ignorant child, that has but a partial knowledge of good and evil, and an enlightened man and Christian, should be dealt with, for performing the same bad action, on very different grounds of severity. So a mind pure in innocence and free from guilt—awake to the most delicate perceptions of good and evil—should be severely punished for violating its clear and perfect knowledge of right and wrong. But the mind lying in partial darkness and obscurity—clouded with ignorance or transgression—dead to all but the grossest perceptions of right and wrong—may do many acts without remorse, which would fill the tender mind with all the agony of compunction. And it is just it should be so; for the remorse is proportioned to the guilt, and the guilt is proportioned to the light and knowledge possessed by the criminal.

But, it may be asked, what advantages are possessed by the enlightened, to counterbalance all this fearful responsibility and weight of anguish attendant on ill-doing? For those who advocate the delightful enjoyments of sin, may declare, that if the seared and tender conscience were equal in all other respects, they would choose the seared conscience in preference to the tender one. This brings us

3. To consider the negative punishment of the hardened offender.—I will do it by a supposed case, in illustration. My friend has a most delicate, tender ear for music—I have none. The slightest discord in singing, or jar in an instrument will convulse his features with agony, and send a shiver of horror through every part of his frame—I am perfectly indifferent to chords or discords, and can laugh at the most grating sounds—nay, the filing of a saw is as sweet as music to my senses! Now, whose sense of hearing would you prefer? Consider well before you answer. My friend, so delicately, keenly gifted with a most discriminating ear, finds music in every sweet sound; yea in every beautiful sight in nature. The breathing zephyr, the murmuring rill, the humming insect, the rustling leaf, the responsive low of oxen at a distance, the varied music of airy warblers, even the roaring storm and the rolling thunder—nature's organ and Jehovah's voice—all speak to him in melody and harmony—all fill him with sweetest bliss, acutest joy, and fervent thanksgiving to the Great Author of all. To my duller sense, no music breathes in nature's wide expanse. The croaking of frogs gives no pain, the singing of birds no pleasure. Shrillness and hoarseness—alike move not my soul with aversion or joy. Not having the relish for sweet sounds within—no sense of harmony in my soul—I find no sweet sounds without. From the sweetly murmuring sound of waves rolling over the golden sand, up to the rolling music of ten thousand thunders in nature's vast Cathedral—all is noise, heard alike without entrancement, joy or relish! Who, then, so foolish as to reject a musical ear because it hates discords, and sometimes suffers pain by hearing a grating jar? Who so unwise as to prefer a dull ear, merely because it can bear dissonance without wincing? And who, still more unwise, would prefer a seared, blunted sensibility to right and wrong—to virtue and vice—merely because it deprives you alike of acutely feeling the joys of goodness, or the anguish of evil? Especially when there is so much more concord than discord in nature—so much more happiness than misery—virtue than vice—good than evil in the world! Oh, how has resistance to temptation been weakened, and stripped of its armor, by the ungodly delusion that there was more happiness in sin than in virtue—that the transgressor had more enjoyment than the obedient—and that a seared conscience was better than a tender one!

The conscience is to the soul, what the senses are to the body—the source of all our enjoyments—the guide to all our knowledge. It is evident that the better, purer and clearer are our perceptions of taste, sight, touch, smell, or hearing, so much the more offensive will be any things not in accordance with those senses. A hideous deformity will not offend a blind man—will affect but little a dim-sighted one—but will much shock a keen-sighted person. So a fetid odor will not offend one who has no scent—will affect but little a dull sense, and will convulse with disgust and loathing a keen sense of smelling. And so with all the senses.

So with a tender and a callous conscience. A hideous crime will not affect an idiot—will but little affect a dull sense of right or wrong—while it will strike with deepest horror a pure, a tender and delicate sense of virtue and vice—of good and evil. Yet as no one wishes to be blind, deaf, tasteless, etc., or to have any of these senses blunted, merely because a wrong use of them, or wrong objects, gives greater pain in proportion to their perfection and acuteness; so should no person desire a blunted or dead conscience, because a wrong use of it, or improper acts, give it pain in proportion to its purity and clearness. For as there are more objects of enjoyment for our senses than painful ones, so there are more sources of deriving pleasure by the medium of our consciences, than there are sources of pain. It follows then, that a man with a seared conscience is no more, nor even as much, an object of envy to the virtuous, than is a blind man to us who have our sight—or a deaf man to us who have our hearing.

4. But negative punishment—or the punishment of deprivation—is not the only evil visited on the hardened sinner. To see this assertion fully exemplified, let us attend to the very figure used to describe a callous conscience—"seared with a hot iron." Surely—surely this language conveys no pleasing idea to the mind. How much anguish and torture must the body suffer before it can be seared to callosity!

Time after time must the heated iron sear and shrivel the skin—time after time must the painful inflammation cool and heal—until the skin becomes hard and dry, callous to feeling, and deprived of all the pleasure derived from its sensibility. Nor is the work then perfected. When cased in the armor of a seared skin, a sense of discomfort must ever attend you. The flexibility of the body is exchanged for stiffness, and security is gained at the expense of ease. So, but far worse and more painful, with the conscience. Bodily pain, discomfort and agony are not to be compared to that of the mind or soul.

And time, and again, after the conscience is thus seared—after it is thus stiffened and diseased—will its dormant powers awake, and dissolve, and throw off the callous in which it is enrobed, with throes of keenest remorse. Just as the body will put off its calloused skin, leaving barer and more tender than ever, the quick flesh beneath it. Surely here is a series of tortures sufficient to satisfy the most eager desires of the sinner's enviers—of the lover of justice, and the enemy of all transgression. Worse punishment need no man have than is found in the process by which the conscience is seared—in the discomforts it yields when seared—in the pleasures it loses by being seared—and in the pain it must yield when its callosity is exchanged for renewed tenderness and feeling. THE DISCUSSION.

Some of our readers are anxiously awaiting further numbers of the Discussion with Rev. A. Campbell. They should be informed that before another number can appear in our columns, my reply to Mr. C. published in this paper of the 10th ult. must have time to travel by mail to Bethany, Va., Mr. C. to publish and reply to it in the Harbinger, which could not possibly be till the March No. of the Harbinger comes out, (the paper being but monthly) and the February No. having been already issued,) and then to travel back to Utica and be copied into our columns. We are in hopes the Harbinger of this month will contain my reply and his rejoinder. If not, we must wait till April.

Some may also apprehend still further delay on account of my journey to the South. I have however taken and shall continue to take, all necessary precautions to prevent any long delay. I have written to Mr. C. requesting an extra copy of the Harbinger containing his rejoinder, to be sent to me at the South, as soon as published, so that by the time or soon after, our printers get his article before our readers, my reply can be prepared and sent, so as to follow immediately. THE RECORD.

CONFERENCES.—One was held in Swanzy village, Mass., on January 19. Sermons were delivered by Brs. T. K. Taylor, J. M. Spear, and W. S. Balch, and addresses by Brs. Spear and Balch. A concert of praise, interesting in its character, was also held. The public services were well attended. The Essex county Quarterly Conference was held at the house of Br. J. M. Anstin, in Danvers, Mass., on January 18, Br. S. Brimblecom, Moderator, and M. H. Smith, Clerk. Ten ministering brethren were present—sermons were preached by Brs. M. H. Smith, O. A. Skinner, and S. Streeter. An interesting praise meeting was held in the evening, in which addresses were delivered by Brs. M. H. Smith, O. A. Skinner, S. Brimblecom, S. Streeter, and prayer by Br. L. Willis, and benediction by Br. T. F. King. Adjourned to meet in Lynn, on the third Wednesday in April next.

A new society was formed in Bridgeton, Me., in January, under the labors of Br. William Frost.

REMOVALS.—Br. L. Willis, intends removing soon from Salem, Mass., to Washington, N. H. He found the society in Salem, in a very low state, and leaves it flourishing and prosperous. Br. S. Hull, wishes all letters and papers for him to be addressed to Oberlin, Ohio. Br. A. L. Arnold, will soon remove from Sandy Bay, Me., to Essex, the neighboring town. Br. E. Leidy has removed from Palmyra to Parkman, Ohio.

The ordination of Br. S. A. Sneathan, late of Salem Mass., took place in Brunswick, Me., in January. Sermon by Br. Gardner—Brs. C. C. Burr and D. D. Smith taking parts in the services.

The installation of Br. Z. Thompson, as pastor of the second society in Lowell, Mass., took place on February 5th, in the Town Hall, before a crowded audience. Sermon by Br. T. Whittemore—Brs. Beckwith, Gurley, O. A. Skinner, T. B. Thayer, I. Brown, and J. B. Burt, taking parts in the services.

Since our last Record, we have received the gratifying intelligence that Br. M. A. Chappell, one of the Editors of the Glad Tidings, of Pittsburg, Pa. has commenced his labors as an evangelist.

The Universalist new meeting-house in Marblehead, Mass., was probably dedicated on the 1st inst. Sermon by Br. T. Whittemore. Sermons during afternoon and evening, by Brs. B. Ballou and M. H. Smith. The dedication of the meeting-house in Oxford, in this State, will be noticed at length in our next number. It took place on Washington's birth day. The dedication sermon by Br. S. R. Smith will soon appear in our columns.

The First Universalist society in Boston, under the pastoral care of Br. S. Streeter, have resolved to erect a new meeting-house, at a cost, exclusive of the ground, of $20,000. Their present house is a very old one, having been purchased by the friends of Murray, in 1785.

A public debate on universal salvation and the annihilation of the wicked, took place in Castile, Genesee county, between Br. Alfred Peck and Rev. Mr. Morse, a Campbellite. It lasted during the day and evening of January 28. Mr. M. is not represented as having conducted very mildly or courteously—and the whole affair is stated as producing an effect on the public mind adverse to the cause of the destructionists. A. B. G.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching in this city, every Sunday, as usual, during the absence of Br. Skinner, by Brs. WHITNEY and GROSH.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. C. S. BROWN in Otselic village—Br. GUILD in Walton—at Norwich corners, Litchfield—Br. SIAS at Perch River, and at Jenk's school-house in the evening—Br. WAGGONER in Newport in the evening.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. C. S. BROWN in Harford—Br. BODEN in Marshall—Br. BOUGHTON in Mottville, (and on every fourth Sunday until further notice)—Br. WAGGONER, at Salisbury Centre—Br. SIAS near Br. Wright's in Ellisbury, and near Br. Sealy's, on the Ridge, in the evening.

POETRY.

THE AVARICE KING.

We extract the following from Dennie's Port Folio, for 1815. It is greatly superior to its fellows, the "Erl King," "Water King," and "Fire King," of German origin—and as it appears as original in the Port Folio, may fairly be claimed as American. Who is the author? A. B. G.

Who is he with the golden wand,
And eyes of diamonds bright,
With mines of riches in either hand,
And around his head an emerald band,
And his teeth of crystal white?

'Tis the Avarice King in his brilliant form,
'Tis the Lord of the Burning-hill,
He rides on the lightning amid the storm,
And his heart is cold, though his hand be warm,
When the flashes glance at his will.

His throne is formed of the ruby red,
And the marble white and fair,
And the pearls that glisten around his head,
Are the bright sparkling tears by Beauty shed,
Preserved in triumph there.

And a glittering temple flashes high,
Where orange jacinths shine,
And the amethyst, and the sapphire vie,
With the jasper, agate, and porphyry,
And emerald laurels twine.

But who is he with the face of wo,
And the hollow, blood-shot eye,
Which glances on all, as if man were his foe,
And red matted hair, interspersed with the snow,
Of many a year gone by?

'Tis the Avarice King in his mortal form,
'Tis the lord of the Burning-hill,
But want has palsied his fleshless arm,
And his soul is torn by the canker-worm,
And his heart is cold and chill.

But his hand is warm, though his heart be cold
As he presses the miser's brow,
And sweet are the golden tales that are told,
And bright are the mines of wealth they unfold,
And rich the streams that flow.

But the swelling form of the speckled toad,
Or the rattlesnake's hiss in the ear,
Or the fetid horrors of Death's abode,
Or the slimy trace of the earth-worm's road,
Or the midnight groan of fear,

Are not so dread to the noble soul,
As the sound of the monster's voice,
For the softest songs of melody roll,
And the miser bends to the dark control
Of the idol god of his choice.

"See ye the temple that flashes high
On the top of the Burning-hill—
Where the amethyst and the sapphire vie,
And a million gems of the purest die, Obedient to thy will?"

"And see ye not the sun that shines,
And glitters in endless day?
'Tis the purest topaz of Indian mines,
And the gemmy wreath that round it twines,
Must guide thee on thy way."

"And sparkles not on thy dazzled sight
Yon soft, transparent rill?
For every drop is a diamond bright,
And every diamond a fire to light
Thy steps to the Burning-hill."

"Thou haste away to the Burning-hill,
The rocks and the precipice brave,
Ere the winter of age thy blood shall chill,
And death bid the pulse of thy heart be still,
And thy form be laid in the grave."

"The slaves of the Avarice King shall guide
Thy footsteps on the way,
And frugal Penury be thy bride,
And Poverty cheer thee side by side,
Throughout the live-long day."

Thus he breathes in the miser's ear,
But poison lives in his breath,
And the miser's veins are chill'd with fear,
And the thoughts of danger are ever near,
But afar the thoughts of death.

He follows along the narrow road (Where all but Wo is still,
And the groans of the starving freeze the blood),
To abandon the altar of Nature's God,
For the king of the Burning-hill.

But the feeble limbs of the traveller bend,
The temple glitters in vain,
For the storms of Want and Hunger descend
And the burning fires of madness rend
The chaos of his brain.
And now the storms of Winter grind
The relics of his form,
His bones are bleached by the passing wind,
And within his skull the lizard doth find
A refuge from the storm.

FEAR OF GOD.

The Scriptures frequently command us to fear God; and they represent this fear of him as one-half of the code of moral and religious duty. Thus the wise man says, "to fear God and keep his commandments, is the whole duty of man." But there are different kinds of fear—there is a slavish fear and a reverential fear. The former is the fear which the subject has for an unjust and unfeeling king, or a servant for a cruel and tyrannical master.

That this is the fear which many have of God, is a fact too evident to be questioned. The very character generally ascribed to the Most High, is calculated to engender it. He is looked upon as a tyrant, as hardly restraining his wrath from breaking in an endless storm upon the heads of the guilty, and as punishing with a view to torment. This fear, with many, is the great motive for religious duty; and because we have it not, we are often asked, why we worship God, as though this slavish fear were the only incentive to a Christian act. It is this, which causes people to tremble before God like an aspen leaf, or like a frightened servant, before his unfeeling master; it is this, which often fills our churches with cries of despair and groans of agony; it is this, which sometimes induces people to imagine, that the door of mercy is forever closed against them.

That this is not the fear required of us in Scripture, is evident.

1st. From the character uniformly ascribed to God. The inspired writers represent him, "as a God of truth, without iniquity, just and right;" "slow to anger, full of compassion, and of great mercy." They tell us, that he has a father's love and compassion, a mother's affection and tenderness; and that the most striking figures in nature, are but faint emblems of his love. Then God is not a tyrant, and should not be feared as such. He is said, it is true, to be angry with the wicked, and to hide his face for a few moments in a little wrath; but he is never called anger, or wrath, or hatred; but he is called love. Love is his nature; and when he punishes, it is to accomplish the great designs of his love.

2dly. People were never led by the apostle's preaching to consider God an enemy, and to despair of grace. We have examples of strong threatening used both by the Saviour and his apostles. Jesus spoke of the "damnation of hell," of a "wrath to come," and of a "worm that dieth not." The apostles, in their burning eloquence, threatened the people with "tribulation and anguish and wrath," with the "vengeance of Jehovah," and with a "just recompense" for all their evil deeds. And yet, there were none driven to despair, and no case of insanity. Now the conclusion is irresistible, that these threatenings were differently understood in the days of the apostles, from what they now are; and that a different doctrine was preached by them from the popular doctrine of the day. A slavish fear, then, is not the fear required by Jehovah.

3d. This is evident also from the fact, that it cannot be accompanied with love. God requires the heart; his language is, "My son give me thine heart;" and when he requires an outward form or threatens a punishment, it is to improve and reform the heart. But if he were a tyrant, it would be impossible to love him. The unfeeling king is never affectionately and tenderly beloved; and while he is outwardly revered, the soul is filled with aversion and hatred.

Now the same God, who commands us to fear him, commands us also to love him. Moses says, "Fear God, walk in his ways, and love him." Samuel says, "Only fear the Lord and serve him in truth;" not with a slavish outward service, but one accompanied with the heart's best affections. David says, "ye that fear the Lord, praise him," "ye that fear the Lord, trust in his name," "ye that fear the Lord, say that his mercy endureth forever;" "ye that fear the Lord, bless the Lord."

From these passages we see, that true fear hath not torment, and engendereth not bondage—it is like the fear which an obedient child has for a good parent—a fear accompanied with reverence and love. Those who have this fear, will depart from evil.—Gospel Sun.

REPARTEE.—An elderly gentleman travelling in a stage-coach was amused by the constant fire of words kept up by two ladies. One of them at last kindly inquired if their conversation did not make his head ache—when he answered with a great deal of naivete; "No ma'am, I have been married 28 years."

MARRIAGES.

ERRATA.—In the second marriage published in our last, for "Phidelia Persons," read Fideia Percival. In the first marriage notice in number 7, for "daughter," etc., read "niece of E. Cary, Esq."

In Royalton, by Sherman McLean, Esq., Mr. JACOB DIERICH, of Victor, to Miss OLIVE COLWELL, daughter of Joseph Colwell, of the former place.

In New-Berlin, February 6th, by Rev. Mr. Jones, Mr. JOSIAH LOOMIS, Jr., of St. Johnsville, to Mrs. MARY SLEEPER, of Utica.

In Sangerfield, February 23d, by Edmund Terry, Esq., Mr. ELI CHEESEBROUGH, to Miss ELIZA BLANDING, daughter of F. Blanding, Esq., all of Brookfield.

DEATHS.

In Otselic, on February 17th, Mrs. ANN WARNER, wife of Timothy Warner. By this dispensation of Providence, Mr. Warner is deprived of a most amiable wife, five small children of a tender mother, and society of one of its brightest ornaments. She died in the full fruition of that faith once delivered to the saints.

A. KINNEY.

In Middletown, Susquehanna county, Pa., December 15, 1836, after a severe illness of four days, EMMA L. BOSTWICK, consort of Perry Bostwick, and eldest daughter of Pliny and Martha Birchard, aged 21 years. She lived and died a Universalist, manifesting by her amiable character in life, that it was good to live by; and by her resignation and composure in the hour of death, that it was also good to die by.

* Trumpet and Union, please copy.

In Hamilton village, February 7th, Mr. JOSEPH WILLIAMS ALDRICH, formerly of Cazenovia, aged 39 years. His bereaved widow lost her youngest child, a daughter, about 19 months old, only 18 days before the death of her husband.—Com.

In Sheridan, Calhoun county, Mich., November 6th, 1836, VALERIA AMANDA, eldest daughter of Martin and Margaret Ticknor, aged 18 years and 24 days, formerly of Mentz, Cayuga county, N. Y.

In the death of this young lady, society has lost one of its brightest ornaments. In early life her mind was directed to the subject of religion, and she experienced its most holy and benign influences. Her manners were much refined by that spirit of deep and fervent piety, which so uniformly pervaded her youthful heart. Her theme was religion—her delight, the prosperity of the Redeemer's cause. When nature was nearly exhausted, she raised her feeble hand to wipe the crystal tear of sorrow from the cheek of her devoted mother, who, in all the fulness of maternal love, was bending over her debilitated form; and as she replaced it upon her bosom, casting a look of resignation into the face of her weeping parent, she calmly said, "Ma, dry up your tears and weep not for me." Soon after, calling for drink, she was raised from her pillow—the cup was presented to her lips—she drank and died—yes, without a struggle, she fell asleep in the arms of Jesus.

The funeral was attended by a large concourse of sympathising friends and neighbors, and a discourse delivered on the occasion by Rev. Mr. Harrison, from Ps. cxxvi: 5, 6. May the rich blessing of Heaven rest upon the bereaved family—console them in their present afflictions and under every dispensation of divine Providence enable them to say, "Thy will, O God, be done."

T. D. C.

In Canadea, February 7, HENRY CLAY, son of Col. S. R. and Betsey Crittenden, aged seven months and one day. The funeral services were attended on the following day by a respectable congregation of sympathising friends, and the hopes and consolations of the Gospel were tendered to the mourners by the writer in a discourse from Isa. lxi: 1, 2.

SUBSTANCE OF A SERMON,

Delivered extemporaneously, at the Dedication of the Universalist Meeting-house in Oxford, N. Y., February 22, 1837.

BY REV. S. R. SMITH.

"Neither do they which goby, say, The blessing of the Lord be upon you; we bless you in the name of the Lord." Ps. cxxix: 8.

When David became the acknowledged king over Israel, as well as Judah, the nation for the first time, after its proper establishment in Canaan, became formidable to the surrounding kingdoms. The more powerful had always regarded the Hebrews with contempt—the weak grappled with them without fear. The former considered them as too feeble and inefficient, to offer any serious obstruction to the accomplishment of their own policy; and the latter found no difficulty in maintaining their position in the "tug of war."

But when the twelve tribes—the whole Hebrew family, were united under an active and enterprising leader—one who had already performed exploits which had won the admiration and confidence of every class and every individual of the kingdom, it was at once perceived that the hitherto despicable Israelites were taking a new position among the nations. They were no longer to be treated with contempt—no longer to be successfully assaulted by every petty tribe. International animosities were done away, or merged in the controlling influence of existing power; and the usual resort of subduing them in detail must be now abandoned.

Under this state of things, the jealousies of rival States were hushed, and war commenced on every hand, against Israel—Philistines, Moabites, and a host of others, determined at once, on asserting and maintaining their superiority; and if possible, to suppress the rising power of the descendants of the patriarchs. Every where, the Hebrews presented an undaunted front—and in nearly every contest were victorious. And they not only sustained themselves, and their social and religious institutions, but in a few years completely humbled all their enemies. The more powerful nations—Egypt, Syria, or Assyria, entered into alliances with them, and for previous contempt, they now enjoyed the respect of the most potent empires.

In view of these facts, the Psalmist introduces our subject by noticing the previous humiliation of Israel, "many a time have they afflicted me"—"many a time have they afflicted me from my youth, yet have they not prevailed against me." The praise of their triumph is then sung, and the honor of their deliverance ascribed to the righteous Lord, who "cut asunder the cords of the wicked." By him, Israel had been blessed, notwithstanding those who passed by, had never once said, "the blessing of the Lord be upon you."

To ask the divine blessing on others, is to desire and invoke the favor of God—that God would prosper and succeed the work of their hands, and the lawful enterprizes which they have conceived, or in which they may be engaged. And from a number of reasons, it is certain that the enemies of Israel could not do this. Their policy, habits, interests and religion—all forbade a desire for the national well-being of the Hebrews. And the latter could not—and probably did not expect such benevolent aspirations in their behalf. Nor could they expect to receive and enjoy the blessing of God, except under certain circumstances. Their own principles and conduct secured the privileges, rights and blessings which they attained—and these were founded in union of purpose, co-operation in action, perseverance in prescribed duty, and zeal and fidelity in the adoption of suitable measures for securing the end proposed.

Such, in a moral and religious sense, are the circumstances of the denomination of which this religious society constitutes a part—and of this community in particular. The time was, when the more prominent and influential sects affected to hold in contempt, the few scattered and unorganized believers in the doctrine of a world's salvation—when they treated as the presumption of ignorance, or the dream of folly, the germs of those efforts which have brought down upon you the blessings of the living God—and which have already resulted, in giving you the stability of a people, and all the precious privileges of conscience and religion. Like Israel in the midst of the nations—you have stood, and you stand alone. You must not expect, for you have no right to hope for, the assistance of any other religious community. Your prosperity always has been—always must be, as adverse to theirs, as was that of the Hebrews to the national interests of the surrounding States. You must, as you have heretofore done, fight your own battles—and carry on the war single-handed against the whole host. For you have no common interests, no sympathy in faith, no community of principles with any religious sect in all the world. Turk and Jew, sectarian, infidel and Pagan—all are your opposers, or your enemies. From none of them can ever come the hearty benediction, as they pass by—"the blessing of the Lord be upon you: we bless you in the name of the Lord."

A moment's reflection will satisfy you of the correctness of our position. What Christian sect entertains your views of human nature—its capacities, responsibilities, and affinities? What one recognizes the paternity, the benevolence, the grace in God, which constitute so rich and enduring a theme of gratitude and joy to your hearts? Who among the millions of Christian worshippers, hold your opinions of the certainty, nature and duration of punishment? Which of the multitude of sects, look forward as you do, to the period when all moral beings shall be rendered holy, happy and immortal? There doubtless are individuals who do this, in several denominations; but as a community—none. And in reference to your creed as a whole, if it is, as it is believed to be, true; all others in contradistinction are untrue. Of this they are well apprised, and do, and will act accordingly. Your actual prosperity then, will be universally regarded as unfavorable to the interests of all other denominations; and hence not one of them will "bless you in the name of the Lord."

Your prosperity—the evidence that the Lord has blessed you—has depended thus far, and will continue to depend—

1. On your union and co-operation.

It is only necessary to recur to the state of Israel, prior to the accession of David, to find an ample illustration of this particular. Some of the tribes were tributary to different petty States, while others were exerting themselves to sustain the remnant of the nation against their enemies. At times, there does not appear to have been a common feeling of their condition, or a common interest throughout the several parts of the nation, to struggle for the acquisition of their rights. An attempt was sometimes made, but the hand of oppression was too heavy or the personal animosities and jealousies among different individuals or families, rendered them abortive. And it was not until the whole nation thought and acted in concert, that they were triumphant.

Similar obstructions have long been in the way of the progress of the great truths which you maintain. Many were—perhaps are, the willing servants of sects, that greatly tax their friends, and can not fail to render their system oppressive to those whose views are so exceedingly dissimilar. But like the Hebrews, they find, or think they find indemnity for their pusillanimity in some point of interest—some unattained policy—some weight of influence or refutation. How greatly do they mistake! In the political world—in the every day affairs of men, they never argue, and never act in this manner, without some immediate and obvious danger which they wish to avoid.

But to be united in sentiment and wishes, is not enough in this case—there must be a joint effort, a hearty co-operation in the use of means. It was not sufficient, that the members of this society were united in their opinions, and in their wishes for a convenient place in which they might worship the God of the whole earth, according to the dictates of their own consciences. It was necessary that they should act in concert—apply their means and their energies to one given, paramount object. And had not this been done—had they listened to the siren song of those who never did, and never can wish the blessing of God upon them, where had been this beautiful and convenient sanctuary? Where? Its stone foundation had yet slept in the quarry—its timbers had been towering among the primitive forests of yonder hills, instead of adding another ornament to this thriving village. And thus it is, and thus it ever will be with all the physical, social and moral interests of mankind. They must have both the will and the energy to carry their determination into effect, or nothing is done worthy of intellectual and religious beings.

Never was this truth so fully illustrated in its application to the pure religion of Heaven, as in the primitive Christian disciples. They were not only of "one heart and one soul," but they became "co-workers" with Christ. They left no labor undone within the compass of their means—no place unvisited, where a door of utterance was opened; and esteemed no sacrifice too great or too precious to be cheerfully made, so that they could keep a "conscience void of offence," and spread abroad the knowledge and the blessings of the Gospel of peace. These pioneers in the march of truth, held in abhorrence the sickly simperings about ease, and wealth, and reputation, and power, by which some showed that they loved the praise of men, more than the truth of God—and with honest disgust, they left such to bow in the idol temple, and to "crucify the Son of God afresh," at their own peril.

It was not, therefore, in consequence alone of what the first Christians felt, and believed—but of what they did in the propagation of their views, that so soon gave triumph and influence to Christianity. It was not alone what Luther thought, that gave the mighty impulse to the reformation; but what he and his coadjutors did, in the manful integrity of their hearts. They braved the tempest of ecclesiastical indignation; preached, wrote and published, and aroused the sleepers from the tomb of sloth, ignorance and vice, to a sense of their duty and their wants. And though far behind these in their exertions, it is by similar endeavors that the believers in the restitution of all things in and through Jesus Christ, have taken their place among the Christian denominations—and by these must they prosper.

2. Another means of securing the blessing of God, is perseverance in duty.

What is well begun, must not be abandoned. For what it is duty for me to do—will continue to be my duty, until actually and faithfully performed. There are probably few things in which the listlessness of indifference is more palpable, than in the want of perseverance which marks so many human undertakings. "I am weary, and must give over the affair, or the labor to other hands. I am doing too much, and am not so well sustained as there was reason to expect. I do not feel the interest, nor perceive the necessity of doing all that I once did." But to give the work over to other hands, is to expose it to an entire suspension. Others may not, and frequently do not appreciate in all its bearings, the full amount of its importance. And if they do, they may neither possess the will, nor the ability to carry it on to a successful termination.

You may not have been sustained as you deserved to be, nor according to your reasonable expectations. But is another—one who newly comes to the work, more likely to merit, or to receive public support? How often is it the case, that such transfers of an important object, prove ruinous to the undertaking! But this attempt to cast the burden from your shoulders, and the labor from your hands, implies that you will now take your rest—that you will do no more! And is this the way to accomplish a desirable end? Men seldom abandon their pecuniary enterprises in this manner. They are generally quite willing, in defiance of all the impediments and disappointments which the counter interests of men can place in the way, to push their endeavors to the last—to rise from every conflict with fresh courage, and to strive for the victory while strength and hope remains.

But if possible, the relaxation of efforts, because men do not feel the same interest and engagedness in any given cause, is more absurd than any other supposable reason. It implies that the undertaking is wholly unworthy of effort—or that it was rashly and unadvisedly commenced—or that it was begun merely on the strength of feeling instead of the convictions of the mind. What is not worthy of being done, should not be undertaken—what is deserving of exertion and accomplishment, should not be engaged in without "counting the cost," and no reasonable man should ever suffer excited feelings to run away with his judgment. Few, however, are disposed to think, or to believe that religion is unworthy of their attention, or that its promotion is an object unworthy of their persevering endeavors.

How does it happen, then, that persons who sincerely and devoutly believe in the Christian system—a system which involves their dearest earthly interests, as well as those of eternity, should become impatient of the known and acknowledged duties which it imposes. Few, very few of the human race, ever think of abandoning the labor of employing some means for securing their daily bread. And is not that "bread of God which came down from heaven, and giveth life to the soul," as worthy of our attainment? That glorious and redeeming truth which would make us good and happy—which wipes away our tears in sorrow, binds up the broken heart, and carries us triumphantly through the valley of death, must be incomparably more important than any other subject. And it must, when appreciated, engage, not our feelings alone, but our better judgment, as that of all other things, most deserving of the best services of our whole lives. So thought, and so acted the apostles. The loss of possessions, of personal friends, of cherished privileges—to be expatriated, hunted, persecuted, tortured and finally to suffer the most violent and cruel death, presented no obstacle to their perseverance. They would no doubt, have been well pleased, to have enjoyed our privileges, imperfect as we may think them. But they anticipated the result of their labors and sufferings—saw the moral benefits of the Gospel diffused over benighted regions, and felt the sustaining blessedness of performing their duty.

Suppose for a moment, that after having first announced the Gospel on the day of Pentecost, and witnessing the power of their endeavors to enlighten mankind, the apostles had become discouraged in consequence of the little support they received from others. Suppose, also, that after toiling and suffering some two or three years, they had concluded it was high time they took their ease, and had turned over the work to such hands as might be prevailed on to accept of the charge. And finally, that they had said, as many of their professed followers have said, that they did not feel so deep and ardent an interest in the cause as they once did, and would risk its success in other hands—what would have been at this time, the condition of the Christian world? What would have been its condition? Why, it would have been just where it then was, in a state of utter darkness, Paganism and pollution. Instead of becoming the religion of the Roman Empire in about three centuries, the Gospel would not have controlled as many individual minds as it did millions. And instead of the philanthropy and refinement which it has every where promoted in its progress; we should have groaned under Gothic tyranny, or Druidical superstition. All then, that Christianity has done for mankind, is directly or indirectly the result of perseverance in the primitive disciples. To that we owe as much under God, as to the fact that they preached the Gospel, or understood and enjoyed the truth. Had they halted in the race—had they become discouraged, and given the cause into other hands, the glory of Christianity had been reserved for other times, and its advent had been matter of history rather than of experimental enjoyment.

But we need not seek for illustrations of our position—they are at your doors, and before your eyes. This house—this society, and the whole denomination of which some of you constitute a part—all carry conviction to every mind, that it is not only necessary to act, but to persist perseveringly in doing every known duty. And every man, when assured that he is acting for himself, his family, and for the well-being of the human race, can not fail of feeling that he is bound by his duty to man, and his obligations to his God, to persevere in his exertions. He should look forward to other times—view in prospect the mighty influences of the most humble efforts, and estimate the sum of blessings accumulated by his labors. And as to actual sacrifices—what are they? Who now is outlawed for his religion? Who among us, and in our own country, suffers the confiscation of his goods, the perils of persecution, and above all, an ignominious death for his religion? None—what then are the mighty sacrifices demanded at our hands? That we honestly avow our opinions—that we use all lawful and honorable means in their promotion, and that we continue to do so while satisfied of their truth. And of this we shall generally be satisfied as long as we live, if we bring our minds as well as our feelings into their examination before we take upon ourselves the responsibilities of a profession. Persevere then—let every one remember that it was the perseverance of the Hebrews under one head, that gave to them the glory of the reigns of David and Solomon. Remember, that mere union of sentiment, however good, may be supposed to evaporate in abortive attempts—but that unflinching perseverance in a good and well understood cause, brings down the desired benediction—the favor of the Lord.

3. In the last place, the adoption of proper measures, and their zealous and faithful application to the contemplated object, is of the highest consequence to the success of every undertaking.

It is obvious, that in the selection of means for the attainment of any given end, it is important that the right ones be discovered and employed. So that it is not enough for the different individuals of any community to be united, and to co-operate perseveringly with each other; they must use precisely such measures and means as are adapted to the end. Thus, steam-boats are adapted to the navigation of rivers, and the builder never thinks of applying them to the purpose of travelling on a common high-way. Stage coaches and rail-road cars are very convenient for the purposes to which they are applied; but are useless for a sea voyage, or for immediate employment in an uncultivated country. Things that are proper and useful in themselves, and in their own sphere or department, would become both improper and worse than useless in another. The world is full of the most plain and comprehensive illustrations of this truth. And an occasional ill-assortment of means and measures, show how important it is, that men should adopt none but the right ones to accomplish their plans.

This religious society have evidently appreciated this subject, in their efforts to accommodate themselves with a suitable place of worship. The place, the materials—the whole structure indicate a due attention to this particular. And thus far, all is manifestly regulated by a judicious application of suitable means and measures. A praiseworthy zeal has been exhibited on every hand; and one very interesting object has been completely attained. The doors of your tabernacle have been opened—and you enter this day, upon the enjoyment of your labors, and on the reward of your sacrifices.

But—the objects for which all that you have done, is designed, must neither be forgotten nor overlooked. This house of prayer, and praise, and worship, is erected with a view to the advancement of the principles and power of Christianity. This is the professed purpose—this is the positive intention, as is abundantly proved by its structure as a whole, and by the arrangement and adaptation of its parts. All this being conceded—it may now be asked, how and by what measures it is proposed to accomplish the end in view? With what fidelity and zeal are those concerned, prepared to act in the application of such means as experience has approved, and which reason and revelation alike demand?

One of the means of promoting the knowledge and practice of Christianity, is the employment of a public teacher—a minister of the Gospel of Christ. For whatever may be the prejudices of some persons against it—the world is fairly indebted for a very large share of its religious knowledge, and for a corresponding portion of moral virtue, to instructions from the pulpit. It is not necessary to inquire in this place, into the reasons of this important fact. Our concern is with it, as a fact; and the interest of this, and of every other Christian congregation, is involved in its proper application. And that this is understood and appreciated, appears from the arrangement of this house. This pulpit—that orchestra—those seats, all imply that here the speaker is to utter the truths of holy Heaven—that from that gallery is to rise, and swell upon the ear, the full chorus of the hymn of praise—and that those seats are to be occupied with devout worshippers, who desire to hear; and understand, and obey the truth.

But it may be asked—what is meant by a minister of the Gospel? In this age, when sects are so greatly multiplied, what must he preach—what sect must maintain his creed? In answer—it is plain that every sect will suppose its own ministers are Gospel teachers, and each preacher, that his own creed is truth. To this, each has a full and perfect right—and this is therefore conceded to all. But we ask what we give. And we believe that he who preaches most of the love of God to men—the most of the saving efficacy of the mission of Jesus Christ on earth, and who lives like his Master but to do good, is the true minister of the Gospel of grace. And to be plain and consistent—such a minister believes and feels, that God loves the whole world, sinful as it is—that Jesus Christ came to save all men from all iniquity, and that he will accomplish his work—that it is the duty of every man, to live "soberly, righteously and godly in this evil world," and that in due time, the whole human race shall become holy, happy, and by the resurrection, glorious and immortal. For the services of such a minister, this house is fitted up; and from the labors of such, it is hoped that many will learn the truth, believe in Christ, and spread abroad the knowledge and power of salvation.

Another means of advancing the knowledge and enjoyment of the Gospel, is, for those who employ a minister, to hear and attend to his instructions. You can not spread Christianity, by permitting your preacher to address these empty walls. Nor can you and others, improve in the knowledge and graces of the Gospel, by suffering your places to be vacant on the Sunday. Neither yourselves nor others, can derive the legitimate benefits of the Gospel by such cold indifference and wanton neglect. Let every one interested, remember, that he is neither too old to learn, nor too wise to be instructed, and this house will become the place of rational and pious resort—"the house of God and the gate of heaven."

Another means of promoting the truth, is, in becoming endeavors to induce your families, your friends, and the strangers among you, to attend upon your religious meetings. There is an offensive officiousness respecting this particular, exhibited by some professors—while there is a most unwarrantable indifference to it in others. It is not necessary or proper, that the temple of God be rendered a show-room, in order to win the attendance of children—nor is the utmost stretch of authority required, the terror of a vindictive creed, or the sickly fawnings of affected apprehensions for the safety of souls. Let it be known that you have an able, a faithful, and a virtuous minister; and show by your own attention and practice that you think him to be so, and the work is nearly done. But there are those who can praise their preacher, and perhaps pay him, who seldom hear him—who take his reputation upon trust, and had rather die in ignorance than seek instruction at church.

But there is one other means of spreading the principles of the Gospel, which comprises several particulars; but which must never be omitted, by any people who would enjoy prosperity. It is to make your place of worship comfortable, and agreeable. The delicate and the feeble will never make their home with you, if they are made to suffer in consequence. Suitable warmth in Winter, and a well aired room in Summer, are accommodations easily obtained—and add as effectually and much more perceptibly to the comfort of the meeting-house, than to the private parlor. The associations which the mind forms, are greatly dependent on the appearances which strike the senses. And the indications of neglect or carelessness which the interior of your sanctuary may exhibit, will, in many instances, force the well-meaning from your ranks. And among the obvious means of rendering your services—the ordinances of your house agreeable, few are more certain, than attention to your music. Every voice that can be tuned to harmony, should be cultivated—and all the aids calculated to add solemnity, strength and efficiency to the song of praise, should be called in requisition. To the youth nothing can be more interesting—to all who have an ear for music, nothing is so soothing, inspiring and delightful as good singing. It has an influence upon all that concerns public worship—upon the attention and interest of the hearer, and upon the spirit and power of the preacher—it is an apology for a feeble discourse, and sends home with double effect, the mighty truths of a sound and practical sermon.

Such are the principal external means of prosperity. But union, and joint effort, and perseverance, and zeal in the adoption and application of even proper measures for the advancement of Christianity, are not alone sufficient to ensure the blessing of the Lord. All these things may be done,—and well done, and yet, like the young man that came to our Lord, something may be wanting. The worshipper who would enjoy the blessing of God—the congregation that would see prosperity, must come to the work of truth with good principles and good practices. Nothing can atone for the absence of these—without these, all other things are but splendid ornaments which folly uses to conceal deformity, and which will sooner or later "perish with the using." Those now addressed have seen too many attempts to hide the enormities of rotten hearts, behind the cover and the mummery of imposing forms. And let that sight seal to them this truth—that certain and lasting blessings descend upon, and can be enjoyed only by, the good.

With an abiding faith in the boundless salvation and grace of God through Jesus Christ—with a cordial co-operation in every means and measure worthy of the cause of Christianity—with a becoming and temperate zeal, and a manly and uncompromising morality, nothing need, or ought to be feared. To such God has given, and will always give peace of mind, and prosperity in the truth.

BRETHREN OF THIS SOCIETY, AND PROPRIETORS OF THIS HOUSE—You receive our felicitations on the attainment of your praiseworthy object, in seeing its doors opened for the worship of the living God "who is the Saviour of all men." The schemes and machinations of your enemies have been confounded, and God has given you his blessing in crowning, thus far, your labors with success. And the same spirit of concord, the same joint exertions, perseverance and zeal in the use of means, which has heretofore characterized your endeavors, will, when applied with equal fidelity to the advancement of the great truths in which you believe, be attended with equal triumph. Do not suppose, then, that your work is done, in the cause of truth and humanity. And never suffer it to pass into other hands, so long as you have a known duty to perform. You can properly avail yourselves of all the aid that others may be disposed to grant—and remember, that by so doing, your strength, your numbers and influence are doubled. Let your minister be sustained, not only by a portion of your pecuniary means, but by your attendance in your seats. Bring your families and your friends to church—and encourage by your example, the public to feel an interest in your prosperity. As you love the truth, and as you would have others believe and love it too, let all you say, and all you do, be strictly just, merciful and upright. This is the only way to diffuse around you the light of Christianity—to improve the moral condition of your fellow beings, and lead them to love, obey, and glorify their Father in heaven. Bear with the "ignorance of foolish men,"—be patient under the misrepresentations and misdoings of inveterate enemies—go on to do your own duty, irrespective of the praise or blame of opposers; and be assured that though you stand alone—though those who "pass by" never say "the blessing of the Lord be upon you," God himself will prosper you with his own blessing. And here may you and your households through successive generations, learn righteousness, and enjoy the fruits in peace.

To the "only living and true God" we now dedicate this house—this pulpit to the reading and illustration of his word—these seats to the use of his worshippers—that orchestra to his praise in the hymns of triumph, gratitude and joy. And we pray that his truth may enlighten—the saving power of his Gospel, reform—and the hope of the resurrection, comfort all those who worship in this place, both now and forevermore. AMEN.

TEMPERANCE,

AS RELATED TO THE USE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

If we discovered that the use of any article, except in cases of sickness, always tended to the destruction of health and happiness, in the exact ratio in which it is used, I apprehend that we should abstain from that article. That intoxicating drinks do destroy happiness and health, as proved by numberless instances, is beyond all question. Even when an individual does not fall into intoxication, but still is in the habit of frequently using ardent spirits, his constitution suffers as a consequence. It is true, that his constitution is not destroyed suddenly, as the tree is blasted by the whirlwind; but yet his frequent tampering is like a worm concealed at the roots of a tree, which causes the whole mass of foliage to wilt, producing blighted fruit. Any intelligent physician will inform us, that when such an individual is sick, they can not calculate upon a proper operation of medicine, for its effect is rendered almost powerless by the previous habits of the person—and in some cases, even when the physician succeeds in mastering the disease, he finds the patient's constitution so shattered by repeated use of ardent spirits, that he can get no foundation upon which to restore his strength, and in consequence, he falls into consumption and a premature grave. These are physical facts, as true as the sun above us—and I need not ask an intelligent people if these facts do not form powerful reasons for us to pursue temperance.

There is another fact connected with what has already been stated, which is also worthy of consideration. Though an individual may not be an habitual sot, yet the frequent use of intoxicating drinks gradually paves the way for entire destruction. I have not the least doubt, but that many persons have acquired love for strong drink in youth at the family circle, which love has increased with their age, until habit has so fixed them in intemperance, that like the fated fly in the web of the spider they are lost in ruin. The unreflecting mind can not realize the steady growth of a minor habit into a determined foe. How many young men in days past, who have looked upon intemperance with horror and have described its ruinous consequences in burning eloquence, and would have deemed themselves insulted had they been told that their sun would go down in darkness, still have fallen. Occasional drinking, adding drop after drop to a burning desire, increasing in power and habit; the gradual undermining of pride, shame, gentility, virtue, until the dam of propriety entirely gives way; serve to consummate final ruin, for the page of society affords many instances of this character.

When the cloud suddenly heaves itself upon the sky in threatening, when the lightnings vividly flash and the thunder terrifically roars, man is warned and escapes to shelter. But when the evening airs of Summer play around his brow and gratefully fan his temples, he has no suspicion that there may be in them the damps of death to fix in him the fatal fever, which marks him as an early victim of the tomb. So if the ghastly form of intemperance should stand suddenly with all its horrors in the presence of the creature, he would flee from it with affright—but it too often comes in gentle whisperings, gilded over with fascination, a stealthy pace to deceive, lulling fears to sleep, when, like the cancer, insatiable monster, it throws out new shoots of power, until it has entwined the affections, chained the moral sensibilities, and made the poor victim a drunkard past redemption. I feel well aware, that this statement is known to be true. Is it not then a reason why we should follow temperance?

It becomes us to watch ourselves, lest the destroyer fall upon us. I know that we may feel strong, especially those of our denomination who are young; but we must not be self-confident. Do we not remember what Peter said to his Lord, when told that he should deny him? "Though I should die with thee, yet I will not deny thee." Matt. xxvi: Ah, he was headstrong and knew not his weakness, for afterwards did he with curses ungratefully deny his Saviour who bled for him. Well did Jesus say to him, "watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation." Matt. xxvi: 41. Like Peter, our confidence may be false—we should watch and beware how we tarry at the "mixed wine."

But all the inducements to make temperance our practice, are not yet stated. The vast amount of evil which intemperance produces, frightfully monstrous in the aggregate, is enough to bring the most careless mind to reflection. And when once the torrent begins to roar, how swiftly the victim is hurried to complete destruction, how soon the mind becomes debased, how the affections dry up, how all manhood flees away. In the little span of my days, I have seen a young man whose youth was bright, whose days were prosperous and the pathway of whose prospects were unclouded. I have seen him married to an intelligent, worthy and affectionate companion. I have seen parents smile upon him, friends dote upon him, wealth favor him and business strengthen him. But on the fair and broad forehead of prosperity I have seen the plague-spot suddenly appear in its faint outlines. I have seen him yield to dissolute companions, until the shame of disgrace has fled from him; until the gaming table has been the place of his nights, and the bowl his constant partner. I have seen the storm lower upon him, customers depart, business fail, friends grow cold, and manly integrity fade. I have seen the comfort of his home destroyed, and himself irreclaimably intemperate. I have seen him ruined, driven from his native place a drunken gambler, and his companion returned to the home of her parents, a heart-broken woman, and worse than widowed wife—and the scene has been closed with ignominious death.

This is not an isolated instance, however. Could all the wives whose prospects have been ruined, whose lives have been passed in wretchedness, poverty, want, neglect, abuse and even blows—could all the children, who, instead of growing up ornaments of community, have been neglected to rags and theft, whose moral culture has been no better than profanity and intemperance could afford, and whose days have been ended in the prison or on the gallows—could all the interesting families that have been broken up and made dependent on the cold charity of the world for support—could all the poor victims of sin, whose minds have been destroyed, whose bodies are changed into loathsome receptacles of disease, whose mornings are a series of retchings, loathings and stings of conscience, whose days are miserable contempt, profane debauchery and staggering intemperance, who are the misery of their families, the pests of society, the miserable apologies for men, who finally inhabit the poor-house and die of tremendous madness—oh, could all the horrors which mingle in that army of drunkards who pollute a land of freedom, stand at once before us—could we see them reeling rank after rank into a premature grave, with an incessant stream—we should at once be united to the duties of temperance and feel it our Christian duty to use our exertions in the removal of the evil. If we contrast the condition and feelings of an individual who is the slave of strong drinks, with another individual, who, when he retires to his dwelling, does it with the consciousness that he is ministering to the wants and happiness of his family by his freedom from intemperance—and if we connect with this, the strong denunciations of the Scriptures against drunkenness or excess—we have still greater motives for practicing temperance, and assisting others to practice it.

In regard to this subject, we have a clear duty to perform—not in a fanatical and a denunciatory spirit, however, but in love and in kindness. It can not be, when we consider the great evils of intemperance, that we shall sit in silence and view our fellow-beings fall to ruin without an effort on our part to save them. It matters not that others have brought the cause measurably into disrepute by harsh imprudence and by coercive operations—there is a truth in the cause itself. We should as much be cautious that we are temperate in acting against intemperance, as we are in the use of strong drinks. There is no manner of doubt but that much intemperance has been manifested in advocating temperance, which has created the very evil it has sought to destroy—but this should not discourage us; it should only caution us to be watchful that we fall not into the same sin.

Do you ask what temperance is? I answer; we are temperate, when we can look into our own hearts, and in the sight of God, can receive assurance that we are not by our conduct strengthening the hands of the intemperate. It then is our duty to see that our example is good in the sight of all men, and that our consciences tell us we have not sinned in this matter. Then we are temperate. Our next duty is, whenever we discover an individual encouraging men to enter the paths of destruction, or when we discover a person descending the steps of intemperance, to go to him, affectionately expostulate with him, point out the evils which spring from his conduct and the misery he is inevitably bringing upon himself and others, all the while so treating him as a friend, that he will be convinced we consult only his welfare.

With these facts before us, let us all solemnly give ourselves to the guidance and practice of temperance.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER VII.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

INDEPENDENCE OF MIND.

There is no characteristic more worthy an intellectual being, than independence of mind—that principle by which opinions are formed and adhered to, from the convictions of our own senses. Some people are very fluctuating in their conclusions—seemingly unable to form any settled opinion—and more willing to trust to the decision of others, than to the dictates of their own minds. This is an unfortunate failing—it renders those under its influence, liable to many evils. They have no foundation upon which to base any opinion, and no strength to maintain the teachings of their own good sense. On religious, political, and other subjects connected with their welfare, they are liable to be driven from point to point—from system to system—without testing either sufficiently to ascertain their real merits, or their defects. Every wind that blows, faces them a different way. To-day they know not what they may believe to-morrow. Ever doubting and never satisfied, like public paupers, they depend upon others for a supply of mental food. Individuals of this character, are especially sought after by the crafty and the designing. They are material of which they can readily make any present use. Thus they are at the mercy of unprincipled plotters, “who lie in wait to deceive”—they are like children, straying amid a multitude of paths, without being able to determine which leads to the desired destination—as liable to walk in the way of error and unhappiness, as in that of truth and peace.

The young very much mistake their interest and happiness, when they permit habits of indecision and vacillation to creep upon them. By the frequent change of principles or opinions, they lose the confidence of community, and soon are looked upon, only as fit tools to be used by the unprincipled demagogue. Those who shuffle about from sect to sect—from party to party—are eventually deemed worthless by all. To avoid being held in this estimation, it must be your endeavor to acquire an independence of mind, that will enable you to form fixed principles, from which trifling considerations can not move you.

It is necessary, however, that you fully understand the characteristics of a truly independent mind. In the first place, an independent mind is not rash. Many pride themselves on immediately forming their opinions on every subject to which their attention is directed, without the trouble of reflection. But this is foolish rashness, and not independence. Those who pursue this course, rush needlessly into many unpleasant predicaments. Opinions thus formed, are far more liable to be wrong than right—and thus their authors are compelled either to support positions palpably erroneous, or retract the rash grounds they have assumed. In either case, they lose the confidence of the judicious and prudent.

Neither does the independent mind despise the opinions of others. There are some who deem it derogatory to their character to listen to, or adopt the views of others. It matters not how important is the subject, or how experienced are those who express their sentiments; if the proffered advice does not coincide with their preconceived opinions, they consider it very manly and independent to reject it. But the mind possessing true independence, will seek the advice of others—will listen to whatever varying views may be expressed—and from such suggestions, adopt whatever appears reasonable.

Equally far is true independence of mind removed from obstinacy. After an opinion has once been formed and expressed perhaps publicly, some people will permit pride or obstinacy, to prevent their renouncing it, even after being fully convinced of its fallacy. And thus they will continue to hug error and support principles they know to be unsound, through fear that a renouncement of them would be attributed to weakness or imbecility. But such a course is far from being an independent one. It discovers rather a weak and servile mind, than a free and firm one. It shows a mind filled with a slavish fear of popular opinion—a trembling apprehension lest some persons as puerile as themselves, should deride them. And from a fear of being considered weak, by the weak, they will remain under the influence of a real weakness and slavery, that the firm and upright scorn. The mind can evince as much independence in renouncing an erroneous sentiment, despite all influences of an opposing character, as in supporting a just one, against every disadvantage. But there is an important distinction between changing an opinion from firm conviction, after deep research and mature deliberation, and rashly vacillating from one view to another, at every trifling impulse, without forethought or reflection. The former is to be commended and imitated—the latter to be despised and avoided.

True independence of mind, consists in candidly and maturely examining every subject which engages your attention—impartially and faithfully searching its foundations, and all the evidences of its truth—and then forming such opinion in regard to its merits, as unbiased reason shall dictate, without being influenced by any extraneous circumstances. The mind of real independence, adopts only such sentiments as it believes to be true—and only because they are true, in its estimation. And, consequently, it will adhere to them firmly, until convinced by superior evidence of their falsity.

It is to be deeply regretted that in every community, “there is a class who will sacrifice mental freedom and the right of judgment, at the shrine of popularity. They will believe any thing that is popular, and oppose every thing that is right, if it is unpopular.” But such a truckling and imbecile course, the individual of a firm and manly mind most heartily scorns. He does not inquire, is this sentiment popular, or fashionable, or believed by the multitude, by the proud and the wealthy? But he simply asks, is it true? And upon the affirmative decision of this question, alone depends its reception into his belief. In selecting their place for public worship, those whose minds are independent, do not inquire, who attend this meeting or that? where do the multitude crowd? where does popularity centre? where is the most fashionable resort? Such questions indicate servility and bondage of the deepest character. But they only ask, where can I listen to the truth?—and there, fashionable or unfashionable, popular or unpopular, they deem it their duty to attend. Neither do they conceal opinions honestly formed and faithfully believed. Those who pretend to believe one sentiment, and yet in reality, cherish another—who give their public support to doctrines which they at heart abhor, can lay no just claim to moral freedom. They are to be pitied as involved in a slavery which degrades them in their own estimation, and in that of a discerning public. But independent minds, freely, frankly and openly express their sentiments, upon every proper occasion, with a just detestation of hypocrisy and dissimulation.

Those who possess mental freedom, do not allow fear to bias them in forming their opinions. Fear, or cautiousness, is good in its place—it has a proper office, and that it should fulfil. But it has nothing to do with selecting sentiments for belief, or with decision upon the truth or falsity of opinions. The Creator has bestowed upon man more enlightened, elevated and ennobling faculties for this important purpose. He has given us reason and judgment, to preside over the emotions of the mind; and to the decision of these high umpires, should be brought every question pertaining to our opinions. Those who neglect their mental faculties, and go down to the low passion of fear, to inquire whether they shall adopt or reject sentiments, not only degrade their nature, dishonor their high powers, and reject the proper exercise of the most valuable of God's gifts, but also throw down the bulwarks that have been reared for their mental protection, and lay themselves open to the assaults of every dark error—every degrading superstition! Only agitate their fears—arouse their apprehensions—and no error is so inconsistent or monstrous, that they can not be made to receive it—inasmuch as reason, which alone can reveal error, is distrusted and trodden under foot.

I trust these remarks, young reader, are of sufficient weight to awaken you to the importance of establishing your principles on a foundation characterized by firmness and independence. It is a neglect to exercise these qualities, that has involved so many youth in the embraces of error, vice and misery. Where this qualification of an independent mind is lacking, you are exposed to the dangers of youthful temptations, to the deleterious influences of pride, fashion, popularity, and fear, which can not add one improvement to the mind, or impart a single emotion of true happiness. But armed with this noble characteristic, the assaults of these powers will be as vain as the empty chaff, blown against a firm seated rock.

A proper independence of mind will preserve you from the inroad of many debasing influences. Are you in the company of the atheist? It will not allow you to fall in with his derision of things sacred and divine, but will influence you ever to acknowledge and defend your belief in the Gospel of Jesus Christ. In reply to his cavillings and his witticisms, you will present the broad panoply of reason and the unimpeachable testimony of nature. Are you in the presence of the profligate, who scoff at religion, morality and virtue? Independence of mind will enable you to withstand their temptations, to reprove their sinful follies, to rebuke their licentiousness, and to point them to certain evil consequences which follow the transgressor. Do you hear the religious sentiments which you entertain, misrepresented or ridiculed? An independent mind will enable you, boldly yet courteously, to remove misrepresentation, and to show that ridicule is poor substitute for sound argument.

A proper independence of mind will administer much to success in all the avocations of life. It will influence you to depend more upon your own energies, than upon the fluctuations of chance; and your capabilities will, in this manner be developed and drawn into activity, with a good assurance of prosperity. It will also gain for you the respect of community at large. Nothing more sinks an individual's value in the eyes of others, than a fickle, unstable mind. No confidence is placed in his judgment—no weight attached to his advice—no respect paid to his opinions. But whoever evinces a firm mind, connected with a good character, will invariably obtain the confidence of society. However others may differ from him in sentiment, his counsel will be sought after, his opinions respected, his advice followed.

This characteristic is also necessary to self-respect. Fickleness of mind in others, you pity, yea, almost despise. But when conscious that you possess this weakness yourself, or that you give way to it on important occasions, the reflection will abase you in your own estimation, and lead to an improper distrusting of your real powers. In these circumstances, it will be in vain truly to respect yourself, from the depressing conviction that you do not possess the confidence of others. But an assurance that you possess fixed principles, and that you have sufficient firmness to assert and maintain them, will impart the proper amount of confidence in your own capabilities, which is one of the important ingredients of success in all undertakings. It will give an efficiency and firmness to your deportment that will render your exertions easy and unembarrassed.

Be it your endeavor, therefore, to cultivate a judicious and manly independence of mind—an independence as far removed from stubbornness as from fickleness—an independence which leaves you at liberty, yea, urges you, to listen respectfully and candidly to all proper suggestions, and to seek out information wherever it may be found, and enables you from all your means of knowledge, to form your own opinions, irrespective of those entertained by others, and to assert and maintain those opinions, until convinced of their fallacy. Thus will you exercise the ennobling prerogative of your nature—bring into exercise the high faculties with which you have been endowed, and in a good degree, participate in the many blessings which they are capable of imparting.

THE CHAUTAUQUE CONFERENCE convened on the 18th and 19th of January, at Panama; and the happy expression of interest in the cause, by the liberal attendance and the anxiety manifested, showed a strong disposition to maintain the Conference.

The services of the sanctuary were very pleasant—measures were adopted whereby the interests of Zion may become effectually secured, and which will contribute to its good. By it, the society there lately organized, received an impulse, we trust, and an inspiration of zeal and diligent activity, which will contribute in no small degree to its prosperity. It has already enlisted the feelings and influence of the influential brethren—and notwithstanding its members are few, yet more are ready to connect themselves with it. They have made arrangements to employ the labors of Br. L. Paine the ensuing year. Our desire is, that they may grow in grace—in moral worth, and abound with all needed blessings.

The Conference adjourned to meet with the society in Chautauque, the last Saturday and Sunday in May next.

Yours fraternally,

ACTS XX: 28.

"Take heed therefore unto yourselves, and to all the flock over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood."

A brother requests an explanation of this passage, used by trinitarians in proof that Jesus was the supreme God. That some may believe that the blood which coursed in the veins of Jesus, was really the literal blood of that God, who is a spirit, and who, as a spirit, has neither flesh nor blood, I am well aware, and therefore remark on this passage—

1. The best and most ancient copies of the Scriptures, with but few exceptions, read "the church of the Lord"—as Griesbach has fully shown in his generally approved edition of the Greek Testament. The same may be said of Wetstein, Griesbach's able predecessor.

2. The writings of the fathers, as they are called, quote it variously—the "church of God"—"of Christ"—"of the Lord"—"of God and the Lord"—"of the Lord and God" Even Athanasius accuses the Arians of impiety in using the phrase "blood of God," and asserts that such a sentiment is no where contained in the Scriptures.

3. But even admitting the common version correct, Wakefield shows that the phrase "his blood," may mean a near relative—a Son—and advances many examples in proof of this fact.

4. The apostle Paul, having spoken of Christ, in verse 24, and having him in mind, may allude to him, without naming him, by the word "he." A similar instance may be seen in 1 John v: 20, where "This is the true God" refers to the distant or prior antecedent of verse 19—also in 2 John, 8th verse.

5. Gerard in his "Biblical Criticism," page 255, No. 788, although he gives preference to the common version, thus candidly sums up the evidence on both sides. I fill out his abbreviations and elisions, to make his notes more plain and easy to be understood by the common reader. "To feed the church of Christ." "Of Christ"—supported by the Syriac version, and quotations from some of the Fathers; but is wrong. "Lord and God"—supported by twenty-one manuscripts, and some quotations; yet wrong. "Lord"—supported by the Alexandrian and five more very ancient manuscripts—by quotations from Irenaeus, Armenian version and others; and is preferred by some for the antiquity of its authorities. "God"—in most manuscripts, in the Vulgate, Ethiopic, and many quotations of the Fathers; and is generally preferred for the number of its authorities." Horne, in his Introduction, Philadelphia edition of 1835, vol. 1, p. 291, gives a long statement of various authorities, many conflicting with each other, and being an Episcopalian, decides in favor of the common version of course, but on grounds inconclusive to my mind.

Lastly—it can not mean the literal blood of Jehovah—for it would then prove, that even the body of Jesus was not humanity, but divinity—or that God is not a spirit, but has flesh and blood.

HEBREWS II: 14, 15.

Mr. SKINNER—Will you have the goodness to satisfy a reader of the Evangelical Magazine and Gospel Advocate, by giving an explanation of the following passages recorded in Hebrews ii: 14, 15. "For as much then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them, who, through fear of death, were all their life-time subject to bondage."

If you deem this communication worthy of notice, I request your particular attention upon some points that present themselves to my view, on which I want to be better informed. I wish to know when and where that deliverance spoken of, in the 15th verse, will take place; and what the apostle means when he says, "through FEAR OF DEATH." I shall also ask your attention for an explanation of the phrase, "LIFE-TIME," and likewise the "BONDAGE," here spoken of.

Minden, February 2, 1837.

A BELIEVER.

ANSWER.

By the bondage above spoken of, we understand that vassalage and slavery in which the minds of unbelievers, and of mankind generally, are held before the light of the Gospel is shed upon the understanding. The fear of death is the tyrant that enslaves. An apostle hath said, "all fear hath torment. He that feareth is not perfected in love." The bondage-creating and torment-giving power of fear is so generally known and so well understood, as to need no explanation. Hence it is common to call it a slavish fear, to distinguish it from that filial reverence due to God, which in Scripture, is said to be "the beginning of wisdom."

Few or none are exempt from bondage through fear of death, without a well established faith in the Gospel of Christ, and a fixed and permanent hope in that glorious immortality which was brought to light by his resurrection from the dead, through which he vanquished the powers of darkness, and swallowed up death in victory. This bondage, too, lasts the unbeliever during his whole life-time, or all his natural existence on earth, unless he becomes a believer and embraces that system of faith which will remove the fear of death. If any are exempt from this bondage, it must be through apathy, or utter stoicism.

The time and place of deliverance. This, in reality—in point of fact, will be when “our earthly house of this tabernacle shall be dissolved,” and we shall enter into that “building of God, that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.”—“For in this,” says the apostle, “we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven. Not that we would be unclothed but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life.” But mental deliverance, or deliverance of the mind from the fear of death by the anticipations of faith, takes place with every true believer when he embraces the faith of the Gospel. As Paul says, “We which have believed do enter into rest.”—“We are more than conquerors through him who hath loved us.” “O death, where is thy sting! O grave, where is thy victory!” “I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.” Thus the mind of the believer is emancipated by faith: and any faith which does not have this tendency to emancipate the mind and free it from the fear of death, cannot be the true faith of the Gospel. Still, says the apostle, “We groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body.” Here is the anticipated deliverance, or emancipation in mind, by faith which is present, and the real deliverance in point of fact, by Christ who is “the resurrection and the life.”

WOMAN.

The following frank, blunt, and we believe friendly letter, with the advance pay for two subscribers to the present volume, was received some months since, but was mislaid. I love plain dealing, but think the writer deficient in it toward the fair sex, though he deals plentifully in what some mistake for plainness, rough dealing. But, read the letter first, and I will give my remarks as you proceed.

“The grave is never full,” and in case publishers are to be believed, their pockets are in the same condition, never full. Your paper needs none of my praise; it speaks for itself, and takes great care of the rights of women. Such things savor much of electioneering for patronage, by their aid. (1) I think that the women as a body have full plenty of vanity about them already, without any further aid from publishers and editors; and in case you can not get the cause of women out of your minds, pray publish the last chapter in the book of Proverbs, from the 10th verse to the end of the chapter with a smart comment thereon, for the benefit of both men and women. Women are good in their place, and they are rather troublesome when they are out of their place. (2) Solomon will point out to you, the very spot where women ought be, and also what business they should follow. (3) If it be true that the woman is the weaker vessel, then that comparative degree of weakness in her, must consist in her mind, or in her body, or else both in her mind and body. (4) It has been pretty generally agreed on all hands, (5) that a considerable part of a woman's weakness consists in the vanity of being fond of flattery, and of course, of being easily carried away with it, often to their own detriment. Therefore, he who flatters a woman is the most dangerous enemy to her, that she can possibly meet with on the face of the earth. (6) Tell her the truth, and it will do her good, whether it will please her vain fancy or not—no matter; it will become both natural and sweet to her taste, by and by.

Vanity causes a sort of giddiness, near a kind of rum drunkenness, and full as bad in its consequences; and I could most heartily wish that our temperance people would extend their views a little, and teach mankind temperance and moderation in all things, and prevail on the ladies not to feed so much on vanity, as to get giddy thereby, but in lieu thereof to find out wisdom's ways, and to busy themselves, with things useful—never forgetting the eleventh commandment, i. e. “Every one mind his own business.” (7) So by the same rule, you will say, that I ought not to meddle with your editorial business. In one sense it is so. But, remember, it will take two to make a bargain. You are the seller, and I am the purchaser; you have a right to make your paper just as you please, and I have a right to buy it or not, just as I please. And I give you this friendly notice, that in case you do not, in the way of truth, endeavor to correct the foolish notions of the female part of community, (do it in your own way, but do it without your mittens on, or let it alone,) I will buy no more of your papers. (8) So may we both always remain independent and happy.

Yours in health and in haste,
December 27, 1836

(1) We advocate the rights of men, also—does that savor of “electioneering for patronage by” the men's aid?

(2) I will—for I think that same chapter gives an excellent chance to prove that men are also troublesome when out of their place.

(3) That is the point in dispute, I suspect, between me and our correspondent—I think Solomon was of my opinion, as I will show when I publish the comments.

(4) Her weakness is physical, not menal. Had her physical strength been equal to man's, she had never been degraded to an inferiority to man during the dark ages. And should mind continue to advance to supremacy over mere physical power, she will soon be what God, and nature, and Christianity intends her to be, the equal, the help-mate of man, in all that elevates mankind above the brute creation.

(5) “All hands”? Doubted. The contemners, revilers, and haters of the sex, and those misled by their clamor, may agree to it—but give woman the same advantages man now possesses, and in a very few generations, I verily believe, there would be no mental difference between the sexes, which would render woman inferior to man. Women's vanity, as it is called, would then be equal to what man is pleased to call his ambition.

(6) True—very true. Man has wreathed the cords of degrading bondage with the roses of flattery, until he has bound his victim to the horns of the altar, and robbed woman of her equality in mind, while he degraded her personal charms with heartless encomiums, until, enfeebled and enervated, she is made to dread as a blighting reproach, any tribute to her mental qualifications—to fear being called masculine, healthy, vigorous, bold or courageous! Such have been the debasing effects of flattery on woman. It would have been—yea, is and has been the same on man—for many have become the veriest fools, fops and puppies to merit the same encomiums on their personal beauty and delicacy!

(7) Really, I know more men who need this reproach, than women.

(8) Well done!—it is not every subscriber that understands this as well. Be it then known to all, that while my mind is open to remonstrance, argument and advice on my course as an Editor; and our columns, to any well written refutation of my opinions; I will examine, judge and decide for myself, and never, to gain or retain any number of subscriptions, will I advocate what I believe is false; or cease to advocate what I deem true, and right, and necessary. I flatter neither man nor woman, and as I contend for the rights of each—not to curry favor, or electioneer by their aid, but because I deem it my duty—so will I not desert the rights of either, to curry favor with the opposers of either sex, or electioneer by their enemies' aid. I may be persuaded or convinced, but I hope I can not be either bribed or bought.

With this understanding between us and our honest and frank subscriber, (whom I heartily thank for his advice, even should I act counter to it in his opinion,—and who, I am certain, will not like me the less for dealing so plainly with him, however he may think our paper not worth his money,) I take my leave of him in all good will—and of the subject until I can furnish the comments on Proverbs xxxi: 10–31, herein promised.

A. B. G.

THE PRIMITIVE CHRISTIAN.

Our friend Shepard, of Auburn, the Editor of the above paper, takes great exceptions to the notice we took of him in the second number of the present volume of this paper. He complains bitterly that we did not copy his article to which our remarks related, seems to think we were afraid to let our readers see both sides of the matter because we found it easier to call him “a mere tyro,” etc., than to “prove that grammatical which is ingrammatical and that Scriptural which is anti-Scriptural,” etc. Query—Where does Mr. S. find the word ingrammatical? To what Lexicon or Dictionary will he refer us for a definition of the word? For as he has set himself up as a critic, he ought to know.

But really, friend Shepard, did you expect we would copy all your irrelevant matter into our columns, merely because you chose to copy and remark on an article from this paper, written not to you, nor for you, but in answer to a correspondent in Ohio? We never solicited nor sought a controversy with you. It is entirely a business of your own. And even if we were to engage in a controversy with you, we should beg to be excused from inflicting on our readers the long tirade of your remarks, that have no more bearing on any point of difference between us than they have to the inhabitants of the moon. And as for your verbal criticisms, I should as soon think of writing a labored essay to prove that Deacon Homespun's theory of the earth was incorrect, as to spend any time to show that they were perfectly ridiculous.

The Editor of the Primitive Christian finally expresses considerable solicitude to get into a controversy on the subject of Baptism. We must however for the present, decline the acceptance of his proposal in our own person, for the following reasons.

1. By the number of his paper now before me it appears doubtful whether the paper will be continued for another volume or not. If it should not, the controversy must fall through in the first onset, or fail of reaching his readers.

2. I am (or shall be before this goes to press,) on my way to the South for an absence of some length of time; and having already engaged in a controversy with Mr. Campbell on what I deem a subject of infinitely greater moment, I do not feel inclined to engage in any other controversy calculated to draw my attention from that, at least till I return home.

3. Mr. S. seems very happy at present in riding the particular hobby which he has chosen, and I should regret to take away the only one he can ride with any satisfaction, it being in itself an inoffensive and harmless animal.

In conclusion we would observe that, if Mr. Shepard should continue his paper another year, and still insist on the discussion of his Baptismal question in his and this paper mutually, and will confine himself to the question, we doubt not but he will find a willing and ready opponent in some of our correspondents, who will be ready and willing to meet him on his own ground.

N. B.—ADVANCE PAYMENT.

A few weeks more, and those whose subscriptions commenced with the year, will find the time for advance payments expired. Let all who have not already paid and do not wish to pay more than one dollar and fifty cents for their papers, pay us, or some one of our agents (which is the same thing), before the expiration of the first quarter. The times, and our wants and circumstances, are such that we are compelled by necessity to be strict in this matter, extraordinary cases excepted. Let no one wait to see one of the Editors or Proprietors at some Convention or Association in the Spring or Summer; for we want the money paid within the time named in our tem, to us or to our agents—we have use for it even now—and having given this fair warning, we shall feel justified in adhering to the terms. Let those who feel disposed to complain that fifty cents, or a dollar is too high a tax for the delay of a few months, in paying one dollar and a half, state the case thus:—"The Magazine and Advocate is worth two dollars and fifty cents per annum. But by paying in advance, the Proprietors (who want the money to aid them in publishing it) will allow me one dollar for the use of my one dollar and fifty cents during the nine or twelve months." This is the fact. We pay the tax of one dollar; and if the subscriber does not choose to pay us on those terms, we wait till the end of the year, and we then receive our pay in full—two dollars and fifty cents, without any deduction. Or we pay fifty cents for the use of two dollars paid any time within the year, instead of waiting for the two and a half dollars at the end of the year. Remember this, and by paying in advance, invest your money profitably for yourselves, and for us, too.

AGENTS will make remittances by private conveyance when they can; even if they should delay a few weeks more or less. If no private conveyance offers, select the next best, safest and cheapest mode.

Remember—Payments are in advance, if made in three months from the time of subscribing, even where back numbers were then taken. G. and H.

DEDICATION AT OXFORD.

On Wednesday, February 22d, the new Universalist meeting-house in Oxford, Chenango county, N. Y., was dedicated to the worship of the only living God, who is the Saviour of all men. The following services were held:—

1. Voluntary by the choir. 2. Reading select Scriptures, by Br. O. Whiston. 3. Hymn. 4. Introductory prayer, by Br. G. Messinger. 5. Hymn. 6. Sermon, by Br. S. R. Smith. 7. Voluntary. 8. Dedicationary prayer, by Br. N. Doolittle. 9. Voluntary, "How beauteous are their feet," etc. 10. Benediction.

A discourse was also delivered in the afternoon by Br. M. B. Smith, and another in the evening by Br. Whiston.

The day was pleasant and mild—the sleighing good—the singing with the organ accompaniment, such as they should be, and the congregation numerous and attentive—probably not more than half the number of persons in attendance, could obtain seats.

This is the first and only meeting-house in Chenango county, owned exclusively by Universalists. It is of wood, fifty-five by forty feet, and surmounted by a tower of some ninety feet in height, fitted to receive a bell and clock. The site is favorable, and the building is finished in good taste—in a neat and plain style. There are stoves for the comfort, and a well-toned and well-played organ for the gratification of the congregation. The slips and gallery will seat about eight hundred persons. This is the scene of the faithful and successful labors of Br. Nelson Doolittle.

The tried and faithful friends who have persevered to the accomplishment of their wishes, in the erection of this house, deserve great praise for their exertions. For no means that a determined opposition could devise, have been omitted to prevent the Universalists from building in Oxford. And strange as it may appear, that opposition has been shown almost exclusively by Episcopalian—a sect which takes great credit to itself for its professed liberality. Once or twice, was the Universalist society induced to change the site for their house, in consequence of the machinations of Episcopalian—and the Court of Chancery is yet to determine the right of property to one of the lots, selected and purchased by the Universalists. To avoid all interference with their house, they purchased and built on a site, deemed beyond the pale of controversy.

It is believed that public opinion will do ample justice to both parties in this unprovoked assault upon the rights of Universalists. S. R. S.

BEWARE OF IMPOSITION!

"The 'Southern Pioneer' having been transferred to Rev. L. S. Everett, its former owner, all those indebted therefor will please hold themselves accountable to him. They are specially cautioned against sending money to the private address of ROBERT SMITH, one of the partners of the late concern of 'Andrews, McCune and Smith,' in compliance with a slip issued recently by said Smith during the absence, and without the knowledge and consent of his co-partners, and with the palpable design of fraudulently appropriating funds so received to his own private purposes.

L. F. W. ANDREWS.

Baltimore, Md., March 6, 1837.

With alacrity we hasten to give the above notice a place in our columns, only regretting that Br. Andrews' confidence in, and support of Robert Smith, was not better repaid. Any service I can render Br. A. will be performed cheerfully. Though differing from him on some important topics, and regretting his connexion with Robert Smith, I believe I did justice to his motives and feelings, and now sympathize in his disappointments and losses. So much I deem it necessary to say under his misfortunes, and unused to flatter as he knows I am, I trust he will believe that even now I have not said half of what I feel for him. A. B. G.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Amicus is well written—a good shot, or he could not hit such a wriggling eel—but really the object is not worth the ammunition. Besides, should Mr. Lee ask for room to defend himself, it would seem ungenerous to refuse it to him, though it is well known that the length of the noise does not depend on the size of the bird.

No communication from W. E. M. on a T. S. was ever received—he wrote about sending it, but we did not know he had sent it until Br. A. G. inquired respecting it. We think it unnecessary—i. e. that our readers will not desire to see more on the subject unless something new can be offered; and perhaps not even then—for in all probability it would call forth a reply—then a rejoinder and a sur-rejoinder—then a rebuttal and a sur-rebuttal, and so on, through the interminabilities of a newspaper controversy.

Br. J. Martin is informed that we have received no communication from the Trustees of the Hamilton Society, the only persons who can properly and officially act in the matter.

BOOKS.—We have but a small quantity of Hymn books and of Williamson's Arguments on hand, and no Almanacs and Registers for 1837. We are making arrangements to open a Bookstore next Summer, and keep larger supplies than heretofore. G. and H.

SMALL BILLS.

The readers of this paper will bear us witness that we have never meddled with political subjects, and we assure them that we have now no disposition needlessly to interfere with the legislative proceedings of this or any other State, or the plans or measures of any political party, in our columns. We speak not as bankers—nor as politicians—but as publishers—as mere individual citizens. We believe that the means by which alone we can ever pay the debts we have contracted, and by which we earn a subsistence, are in danger of being taken from us, without any substitute being provided in their stead, and feel it to be reasonable, right, even our imperious duty to speak for once on this subject. And we are emboldened to do so, by knowing that papers as little political as our own—papers wholly literary and neutral in politics—have spoken freely of the same measures.

We have a subscription list of about 7000 subscribers. Of these, 2600 residing out of this State and in almost every State and Territory of North America, and a large number in this State, depend on making their remittances by mail. Our Legislature proposes to stop the circulation, by heavy penalties, of all notes under ten and even under twenty dollars—thus rendering it impossible, should it succeed, for these subscribers to procure our paper, or us, our pay. This measure must depreciate, to our great loss, the list we purchased at a great expense, when there was no expectation that laws would ever be passed to deprive us of its benefits.

Now, we humbly and respectfully ask, if we and these numerous subscribers, (not to speak of more than ONE THOUSAND other periodicals, and their many thousands of subscribers—all of whom will suffer with us and ours,) are not entitled to the same protection and advantages, with other business men? The wholesale dealer or the wealthy generally, who are known far and wide, can send orders to their correspondents, for small sums, and have them cashed; or, dealing in larger sums, will be well accommodated with bank notes for twenty, fifty or one hundred dollars each—but the laborer, farmer or mechanic—the great mass of the people—who are known only at home, and whose business abroad is confined to sums under these amounts, will be forever excluded from procuring their needed and desired periodicals from a distance—and the publishers of those periodicals will be deprived of these, their most numerous, prompt and substantial supporters." Such we think, will be the case, if the circulation of all small bills is prevented—unless some practicable and general substitute for them is first devised and established. Is it right then—is it politic to oppress so large a class of our citizens by the passage of laws which are, at best, but experimental? True; we may be told that the few should be willing to suffer for the benefit of the many. We are willing, in such a case—but is this such a case? Is it only the few who will suffer? Will clipping the wings of the press—impoverishing publishers, and limiting the circulation of special periodicals among the mass of the people—will this be for the benefit of the many?

But we forbear more argument. If the banking system is corrupt, reform it. If too bad for reform, gradually supplant it with something better. But preventing the circulation of small notes, will neither reform the abuses of the old system, nor create a new one. If the banks are made perfectly responsible, they will accommodate more people by issuing "fives" than "fifties"—and if not responsible, why not first abolish the largest and least needed bills, instead of beginning with those most generally used?

Some say, point out no evil without suggesting a remedy.—Let government authorize Postmasters to receive money, and give checks for the same, payable to order by the Postmaster of the place where they are sent—let these post checks be charged, besides postage, with a reasonable premium to pay the risk of the government and the trouble of the Postmasters—and at once we have a substitute for small bills and a good one. Duplicates of these post checks may be given for greater security—they may be accounted and allowed for in the quarterly settlements of the Postoffice Department—the bail of Postmasters be made security for them—and in short, every precaution may be taken by the government, that the nature of the case requires. Give us this, or some similar substitute, first, and then small notes, if no longer needed by community, may be abolished as soon as our legislatures please, without injuring any class of our citizens.

We have thus humbly remonstrated—not with a design to interfere, or to induce our readers to interfere, with our State legislatures, save as mere citizens—and then only as love of the public welfare shall dictate. To prevent any misconception, we head this as an Advertisement—make these disclaimers—and sign it as publishers.

ALSO—to prevent any mistakes, we say, that as long as there are any small bills on good banks in circulation, we will be prepared to receive them, and to send them where it will not be unlawful to dispose of them for the full amount, and to credit our subscribers with the cash received for them. Our subscribers need not fear to send them to us as heretofore.

THE GOSPEL FEAST.—ISAIAH XXV: 6-8.

On Zion's fair mountain, by promise divine,
A feast shall be given of fat things and wine;
The promise to all is extended and free—
All people shall come and partake of the glee.

Rejoice all the earth, for the Lord will destroy
The face of the covering to heighten the joy;
The veil that is cast o'er all nations, he'll rend,
That praise universal the feast may attend.

Then death with its terrors, we no more shall fear,
And God from all faces shall wipe every tear;
His kindness and mercy to all will extend—
His care and protection his people defend.

The Lord he hath promised in his holy word,
His people's rebuke never more shall be heard,
But blessing and honor to Jehovah be given
By every creature in earth, sea, or heaven.

How cheering the hope of a life beyond this!
Where all shall partake of the fountains of bliss—
Exempt from all sorrow, temptation and pain,
With God, we forever in triumph shall reign.

Most welcome the Word which such tidings doth bring,
Robs hell of its terrors, and death of its sting,
Extending to all the rich gift of God's grace—
Salvation and mercy to man's sinful race.

So onward its course—its beauties displayed—
To sinner and saint be its promise conveyed,
Till darkness and doubt from their thrones shall be driv'n—
Till God alone reigns, on earth as in heaven.

TRUE GREATNESS.

BY JEROME B. WOOD.

To an inquirer into the causes which influence the conduct of man, there appear to be, at first view, innumerable springs that are perpetually working at the heart, and arousing to action his physical and mental energies. But on examining them more minutely, and investigating their several bearings and relations, he finds them mostly tending towards desire for distinction as a common centre, and to be mostly subsidiary to the furtherance of this desire, and obedient to its dictates.

Does an individual devote all his powers, both of mind and body, to the attainment of wealth? It is for the influence—the distinction which its possession brings with it; for money has no intrinsic value, nor is it desired when its influence is unknown. Does he bend his pale and emaciated form o'er the midnight lamp in search of classic lore, and waste his health and strength, the vigor of youth and the maturity of manhood, in arduous pursuit of literary acquirements and professional knowledge? There may be in the various studies which it is necessary for the scholar to pursue, much that is interesting—much that is lovely; but there is also much that is dark, cold and revolting, and very much which, if it were divested of the charm that it may be the instrument of preparing us to act a distinguished part on the stage of life, would not only be intolerably insipid, but absolutely hateful and repulsive. Does he expose himself to danger on the battle field, and with the firm resolution to conquer or die, engage with herculean efforts in the mighty contest of conflicting hosts? Though the liberty of his country was at stake, yet was he deprived of the stimulus that his deeds will meet with at least future approbation, paled would be that arm which spread such havoc in the ranks of the oppressor, the sword would fall from its nerveless grasp, and the tiger-like ferocity with which he rushes into the thickest of the jarring conflict, would relax into timidity, if not into perfect apathy and total indifference as to the result.

And so it is in all the various concerns of life. Whatever may be the assigned motive for our conduct, on examining it with a scrutinizing eye, we almost always find that desire for greatness is the main spring to action, the power which propels the great machine of human exertion, by whose impetus such various results are brought about. This desire displayed itself in the bosom of an Alexander, a Caesar, a Bonaparte; it has displayed itself to a greater or less degree in the breast of every son of Adam; it has existed since the period when man was made lord of creation; it exists now and will continue to exist, while time lasts and man continues to possess the feelings, the sentiments, the affections, the mind and the heart which he now possesses. And this is as it should be; for without this stimulus to action, man would be a miserable drone, little superior to the beasts of the forest, and never would have been made those sublime discoveries in every branch of literature and science, which have kept the world in a state of continual progression.

Yet I would not be understood as approving the evils which have resulted from an immoderate exercise of this thirst for distinction; for it is a lamentable fact that, however indispensable this faculty may be to the well being of our race, it has been the source of much and lasting evil. It has not only been the means of giving more enlarged scope to the intellectual faculties, and elevating the mind to its present exalted condition, but has also deluged the earth with human blood, devastated her fertile fields and laid waste her fairest territories, and caused many a widow and orphan to commingle their tears of wretchedness and wo with the crimsoned gore of a husband and a father, who has fallen amid the carnage of battle. Yet these evils do not result merely from the existence of this faculty, but in consequence of its being diverted from its proper channel, by the wrong ideas which have been entertained in regard to what constitutes true greatness. The splendor of royalty excited admiration; the glitter of a court, the dignity of the conqueror, bravery and success in the field of battle, all these have dazzled the mental vision, and misdirected and misguided this thirst for greatness.

Defecation was often the reward of him who was distinguished for military prowess and who could bend in abject submission to his will the necks of millions of the human race; while he who devotes all the talents of his mind to ameliorating the condition of his fellow-man, and rescuing him from the thralldom of ignorance and error, was sometimes even persecuted, and often unrewarded until posterity, enlightened by his exertions, paid him a tribute of grateful remembrance. Urged on by an intolerant thirst for the homage paid to the former, Alexander girt on the sword of the conqueror and pursued his triumphal march over the prostrate necks of the inhabitants of the earth. Blood marked his footsteps, as blinded by ambition and a slave to his passions, he went forth at their bidding, and conquered. For this he obtained the name of "Great;" yet how much more truly great was the Roman Cincinnatus, who when he had driven the enemies of his country from her borders, could convert the sword into the plough share and the spear into the pruning hook, and retire to his small possessions, there to pass the remainder of his days removed from public care and political strife, an example of patriotism, of integrity, of true greatness.

As time rolled on, a change began to take place in the opinions of men in regard to this point. The world as it became more enlightened, began better to appreciate the merits of those who had contributed most to its advancement; the brilliancy of the military chieftain lost its lustre, and the wreath of honor which had adorned the conqueror, began to be thought more worthy the brow of him who should aid most in emancipating the mind and remove the bonds imposed by tyrants. At length a Bonaparte arose, a second Alexander, and shot across the face of Europe like a meteor, treading down in his rapid march, kings and potentates—shaking to their very centre the thrones of despots, and performing deeds which posterity will ever look upon with wonder and astonishment. But though he commanded armies so superior, and achieved victories so much more numerous and distinguished, yet how poorly does he compare in point of real merit, of true greatness, with our beloved and immortal Washington. Had Bonaparte been a contemporary with the heroes of ancient times, he would probably have been honored, like them, with the homage of adoring subjects. But the world had begun to learn the important lesson, that true greatness does not consist in prowess in war alone, but the most useful as well as talented man is much more worthy of admiration, much more worthy the application of great, than the military despot whose every act is pregnant with ill, though it but tend to his own exaltation.

As the tide of civilization rolled onward, still more and more correct views were adopted in regard to merit; but no where has this advancement arrived to as great perfection, as in our own land of freedom; where every individual inhales the breath of liberty, pure and uncontaminated by the noxious vapors of tyranny and oppression; where usefulness and talent are the only road to distinction, and where the wreath of honor and confidence adorn the brow of him who combines the qualities of the patriot, the statesman, the philanthropist—in a word, of every thing that constitutes the truly great man. Here, then, is a field where this desire for distinction, this thirst for greatness, may be gratified without a departure from the path of rectitude! How peaceful and happy must pass the life of him who sees himself beloved and respected by his fellow-beings, and who can look back upon a life of usefulness spent in the service of his God and his fellow-man. The billowy surges of life roll past such an individual unheeded, and when the cold hand of death surges him in its withering embrace, and weeping relations and friends are gathering around to catch the last glimpse of that eye which once beamed intelligence, and to behold the departure of that loved spirit just preparing to take its flight to the bosom of its God, all within is calm and unruffled as the bosom of the deep, when not a breath of air flits across its glassy surface. No widowed mother, no orphaned child, no miserable being oppressed with the chains of slavery, lifts his voice to Heaven in gratitude at the completion of his career; but all unite, as did the matrons of Rome at the death of Brutus, in deploring his loss as that of a common parent.

Would you, young friends, become such? Learn to govern your own passions, and prepare yourselves for usefulness to the world. In the language of another, "become learned and virtuous, and you will be great; love God and serve him, and you will be happy."

DEATHS.

In this city, 6th inst., after an illness of only two days, MARGARET, daughter of the late Watkin Roberts, in the 19th year of her age.

She was calm and serene, even in her last moments, and expressed a desire to be with her Saviour.

In Middlebury, Genesee county, N. Y., January 3d, of consumption, Mrs. LAURA SMEAD, daughter of Jesse Sprague, in the 31st year of her age. But a few short months after her marriage to Mr. Leonard Smead, she was called to drink of the cup of grief in his death, by which lover and friend were taken from her, and her fond anticipations of prosperity and earthly bliss were cut off. But her widowhood, like her girlhood, manifested her an amiable woman, and an ornament to her sex.

With a patience, composure and cheerfulness, almost unexampled in the history of our race, she bore her long confinement and endured her illness and pain. She talked with the utmost freedom on her approaching dissolution, and selected the preacher to officiate at her funeral, and the glorious subject for discourse and consolation which closes this article, together with the psalms for the occasion, and even the place of burial. She seemed not only resigned to her fate, but to enjoy that confidence in the grace of God, which afforded her spiritual pleasures in the absence of those of earth. She left one posthumous son, of about 6 years of age. May God bless all those who participate in this bereavement, and teach them the important lesson, "My grace is sufficient for thee."

P.

In Lawrence, St. Lawrence county, February 3, Mr. DAVID MUNGER, aged 30 years. He has left a wife and infant daughter to deplore their loss. Br. Munger was a useful member of society, and unwavering in his faith in universal salvation. His protracted illness was endured with Christian fortitude, and his end was peace. At his request, Br. F. J. Briggs attended his funeral, and administered the consolations of the Gospel, from words selected by the deceased, (Phil. i: 21,) to a large concourse of mourners and sympathising friends.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER VIII.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

POLITENESS.

In all communities of intelligent beings, there are certain rules, regulations, or customs, adopted by general consent, to govern the intercourse of one with another. They are termed in our language, politeness. It is true, these usages differ much in their character. A custom considered very polite in one country, is deemed extravagant and ridiculous in another. But however these practices may vary, certain forms of politeness prevail in every class, from the polished circles of the highest ranks of civilization, down to the barbarous and untutored tribes of the forest. Your attention, however, will be directed exclusively to the general subject of politeness, as understood in enlightened countries, and as applicable to youth of both sexes.

Singular as the remark may appear, it is quite evident to my mind, that the Gospel of the Redeemer, understood in its proper sense, is the only perfect source of true politeness. What is politeness? It is not an air, a simper or a strut—it is not the mincing of words, or the formal manner of expressing sentiments. Politeness is an exhibition, through words, signs or tokens, of kind and friendly emotions towards those in our presence. These emotions can not be exhibited properly in the conduct, unless they really exist in the bosom. But they can not exist in the bosom in their full extent, nor exert their influences, unless warmed into life by the spirit of Christ's religion. Those individuals whose hearts are steeped in the influences of the Gospel—who view all mankind as their brethren—who love them all, (even their enemies,) as directed by the Saviour, and who allow these emotions to influence their conduct will be truly polite. And although their manners, from want of opportunity, may not be as polished as those of others, yet they will exhibit that spirit of universal kindness and good will, which is the spirit of politeness, and without which politeness can not in reality exist. Hence the first step in the acquisition of politeness, is to imbibe the noble, generous, liberal and kind feelings, which flow from an enlightened appreciation of the Saviour's teachings and examples. These emotions will form a proper foundation, upon which a polished demeanor can be based, and which will render its acquirement easy and natural.

As this subject embraces an extensive range, I shall be able only to glance briefly at a few of its most prominent features. And first your attention will be directed to a few things that are impolite.

Profane or irreverent language is improper and wicked in any place; but when uttered in company is very impolite. It exhibits a low, gross and uncultivated mind. Every young man—I need not say, every young lady—who would be considered polite and well bred, will avoid such language as highly derogatory to genteel manners. Refrain from low and vulgar anecdotes, and indelicate allusions or innuendoes. Nothing should be uttered in company, that violates the simple rules of modesty. Every thing of this nature is both improper and impolite.

Do not speak loud and long in company. This is a fault that young people are liable to commit. In the exuberance of their spirits, the voice is often raised to a high key, and some favorite topic is extended to an immoderate length, to the exclusion of all other conversation. This habit should be strictly guarded against. Those who indulge in it are liable to utter many things ridiculous and absurd, and to lay themselves open to the just censure of the wise and prudent. Loud laughter is also impolite; and is considered by many, as an indication of an empty mind. I would by no means banish sociability and pleasantries from the social circle. But there should be a proper medium observed. The good sense of youth, should teach them not to surpass, in these respects, certain bounds prescribed by propriety.

In a mixed company, avoid, if possible, all contentions and disputes—especially on exciting topics. If carried to any extent, they lead to the exhibition of improper feelings; and generally cause the disputants, and the whole company, to become unhappy. There may be cases where this rule should be departed from; but such instances are exceedingly rare. As a general practice, the rule should be strictly adhered to.

Do not permit yourselves, in company, to speak disrespectfully of one who is absent, if you can consistently avoid it. This practice is not only impolite, but it is ungenerous and unjust. If it becomes necessary to express opinions derogatory to the character of the absent, speak in guarded language, and with all the palliations that charity and forgiveness can suggest.

Avoid any exhibitions of anger or petulance. They are impolite and immodest—especially so in females. They throw you off your guard—cause you to utter expressions extremely improper, and often ridiculous—and place you in circumstances very unpleasant. A guard should be placed upon the temper. Nothing is more to be avoided than the outbreaks of rage. Under their influence evils are often committed, for which a whole after life of propriety can hardly atone.

Be cautious not to interrupt others when speaking. This plainly indicates a want of good breeding; and yet it is a very common practice with many. However anxious you may be to utter your views, remain silent until those who are speaking have concluded. Respect to them, and a desire to avoid confusion, as well as the rules of propriety, dictate a strict adherence to this precaution.

Do not bluntly deny the truth of the opinions expressed by those with whom you are conversing—and more especially if they are aged, or if their opportunities for obtaining information have been superior to yours. If you differ from them, express your views in modest and respectful language, and with due deference to their mature experience. You should rather suggest the propriety of a different opinion, than pertinaciously assert it.

Never indulge in ridiculing others in company. It is a vulgar and ungenerous practice, and indicates a narrow, uncultivated mind. All have their weaknesses and imperfections—even those who possess the most shining talents, have their blemishes. "But what an absurd thing it is, to pass over all the valuable characteristics of individuals, and fix our attention on their infirmities—to observe their imperfections more than their virtues—and to make use of them for the sport of others, rather than for our own improvement."* "The littlest feeling of all, is the delight in contemplating the littleness of other people." Persons addicted to ridicule, are not usually distinguished for their own wisdom or good sense. Like critics who cut up a good publication, without being able to produce one themselves worth reading, so those most given to the ridicule of others, are generally themselves deficient in many of the valuable characteristics of human nature. "If the talent of ridicule were employed to laugh men out of vice and folly, it might be of some use to the world; but, instead of this, we find that it is generally made use of, to laugh men out of virtue and good sense, by attacking every thing that is solemn and serious, decent and praiseworthy in human life."* If young people must indulge in ridicule, I pray you, act upon the reverse of this observation of the great English scholar. Let your talent of ridicule be exercised only against immoral and vicious practices—against pride, folly, and every species of extravagance and sin.

Avoid ridiculing others, on account of their appearance or their plainness of dress. Some are naturally more awkward in their demeanor than others, and any ridicule on that account, will be at the expense of your good sense, in the eyes of the discriminating. All tastes do not agree in regard to dress. You claim the liberty of arraying yourselves in such habiliments and style as your fancy dictates. You should be willing to grant the same privilege to others; and should no more imagine that you have the right of ridiculing them for not following your taste, than they have of ridiculing you for not imitating theirs. And by all means, avoid ridiculing those who from poverty, are unable to appear in attire as costly or fashionable, as that of community in general. This is a cruel, ungenerous, unmanly practice. It is not only impolite, but is blackly inhuman. It displays a selfish spirit, a shallow mind, and a heart devoid of the gentler susceptibilities of our nature. No individual—male or female—can justly lay the least claim to politeness or generosity, who exhibits a feeling so mean and brutal. Instead of basely indulging in the ridicule of the poor, you should be inclined to drop the tear of pity over their misfortunes, to commiserate their condition, to soothe them and reconcile them to their situations, and, if possible, to do something, or say something, that will shed a few rays of enjoyment into their hearts. Individuals possessing true politeness, will exhibit towards people in low circumstances as to property, none but emotions of a kind, humane and generous character. And they will not judge of their worth by their poverty. But looking beyond the outward circumstances, to the qualities of the heart, they will honor and commend integrity, virtue and purity, as readily when clothed in worn and humble garments, as when arrayed in "purple and fine linen."

We will now briefly examine the affirmative of this subject, and notice a few characteristics that pertain to politeness. I have once remarked that true politeness, is an exhibition, through outward signs and tokens, of kind and friendly emotions towards those in your presence. Or in other words, politeness is a desire to make those around you happy. A disposition to be pleasant and agreeable, therefore, is one of the first requisites of politeness. It is impossible for those who are morose and ill tempered, to be polite. They may assume the outward form, the shadow, but the spirit of true politeness will be wanting. If from misfortune, disappointment, or vexatious difficulties, or illness, your feelings are in an unhappy or irritable state, you had far better refrain from mingling in company, while such is your condition, than to make others wretched by a display of your ill feelings. Strive, therefore, while you are in company, to be good humored, cheerful and kindly disposed. With these feelings in full activity, you can not well avoid being polite. And it is encouraging to know that with every effort to entertain and exhibit these emotions, they will increase in stability and extent, until they become a second nature, and habitually pervade your minds.

Gratitude is another ingredient of politeness. What can appear more dishonorable or selfish, than an insensibility to proffered kindness?—what more ill bred or impolite? The uncultivated boor, will, under the dictation of nature, return thanks for favors. And it surely becomes those who would improve their manners, not to be unmindful of this subject. Every attention which you receive from others, is an indication of the kindness which they cherish towards you. In this light should they be received and properly acknowledged.

As Washington was once walking with a distinguished gentleman, they met a negro, who, in passing, saluted them. The General gracefully returned the salutation. His companion expressed much surprise, that he should return the bow of a black man. "Sir," said Washington, "should I permit this poor negro to exceed me in politeness?" This was an instance of genuine politeness. While the impolite man would have passed stiffly and haughtily by, without condescending to notice the African's indication of respect, the noble minded personage, who then occupied the highest station on earth, acknowledged, by a suitable return, his sense of the negro's attention. To be grateful for all, even the smallest favors granted you, the smallest indications of respect, and to express your gratitude by some word, or in some intelligible manner, is imperiously demanded by politeness. While it is gratifying to have acts of kindness noticed and appreciated, it is exceedingly painful to have them coldly received, with no indications of thankfulness.

In entertaining a mixed company, much depends upon the host or hostess. It should be your great object in such a situation, to make all your company, if possible, feel pleasant and agreeable. You should not, therefore, confine your attentions or conversation to one, or any select number; but they should be equally directed to all. And in your conversation, you should discriminate between the different degrees of information, and the different occupations of your guests. Each individual should be addressed on subjects in regard to which they are considered the best informed; and your conversation with them should be so directed as to relieve them from embarrassment, and bring out their peculiar excellencies and acquirements. From these impartial attentions, all feel that they are duly appreciated, all are gratified, and all enjoy themselves. You should, in one sense, forget yourself, to make those in your presence agreeable. And yet all these attentions should be executed in so delicate and artless a manner, as scarcely to allow them to perceive that your object is to make them appear well, and to minister to their enjoyment.

Respect to the aged, is another trait of politeness. It is extremely indecorous to make those advanced in years, the subject of ridicule, derision or laughter. Gray hairs should ever be treated with deference and respect. The aged have long borne the burdens of life—they have administered to the welfare of society, and to the prosperity and enjoyment of those who are now young. It becomes your duty, as the palsy of age creeps upon them, incapacitating them for active duties and for labors, to honor and reverence them—to cherish and support them, and render "the downhill of life," as agreeable and pleasant as possible. No sight is more delightful, than to behold the young assiduously engaged in respectful attentions to the aged—while there is no greater lack of politeness, no plainer indication of an unfeeling heart, than to treat the aged with neglect, disrespect or harshness.

Before closing this subject, I can not refrain from again directing your attention to the real nature of politeness. People, generally, are too ready to judge of its existence by exterior appearance and manners. When persons enter a room with ease, make a graceful bow, and are very formal and ceremonious, they are called polite. But although a due attention to formalities, is proper, yet they do not constitute all of politeness—they are, indeed, as has once been said, but its shadow, and may be, and often are, assumed where no genuine politeness exists. True politeness, I repeat, consists in entertaining kind and friendly feelings towards others, and in exhibiting those emotions in your manners. Therefore, to be polite, in the just acceptation of that word, you must cultivate the generous feelings of the heart—you must see that this fountain of human emotions is purified, and that nothing there exists but good will towards all your fellow-beings. With the affections in this state, politeness, almost without effort, will shine in your intercourse with the world. There will be no cold affectation, no heartless hypocrisy; but with a moderate degree of outward cultivation, the manners will be graceful and polite.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.

BY REV. S. R. SMITH.

INTRODUCTION.

That the questions—Is there a God? and if so, Do the Scriptures contain a revelation of his will, his purposes and our destiny? are the most important which can engage the attention of the human mind, seems incontrovertible. On them is suspended the propriety and the proper direction of the religious feeling—the brightest motives to a life of integrity and virtue, and the dearest hopes of the human heart. That the truth in relation to these subjects, though generally professed, is not always as well understood as might be desirable, admits of little question. Indeed, it is comparatively very recent, that any general attention has been given to the subject. The mass of mankind—the general reader, took no immediate part in its discussion. Its merits were the matters of consideration in a world above them—among the literati, polemics and theologians.

Several praise-worthy and very successful attempts have been made within a few years past, to bring the evidences of the truth of a divine revelation, more directly in reach of all classes of society. Labored and standard works have been condensed, published in a cheap form, and thus rendered more generally accessible. Various new publications embracing all the common arguments, have also been added to the means of public information. Among these—those of Messrs. Pickering, Thayer and Williamson, deservedly hold a distinguished place. And from the size of their respective publications, as well as the familiar style in which they are written, they have probably reached the public mind, more effectually, than any other kindred productions.

The subject, however, is far from being exhausted; and the field is rather opened than fully improved. Not that new and unknown arguments, or proofs, remain yet to be adduced—but their bearings and results may perhaps be rendered more simple, more obvious, and their effects more certain. The probable, and perhaps manifest reasons of the popular infidelity* which prevails to some extent in our own country, may yet be better understood—and should be understood, for the same reason, that it is important to both physician and patient that the nature of the disease be well ascertained. The best medicines may otherwise be useless, or productive of little benefit—while the disease is protracted beyond all reasonable duration.

The arguments and evidences in favor of Christianity have been abundant, and would, under other circumstances, have been satisfactory. But while Christianity itself, is unexplained, or so presented as to make all the finer and better feelings of the heart revolt at its forms or influences, the unbeliever will persist in its rejection. He may be convinced of the superior force of your arguments; but he will impute that conviction to any cause but the true one. He will not even suspect, that it is because you are right and he is wrong. He will impute his own failure to inattention, or want of skill—and will refer your advantage to greater learning, higher talents, or habits of controversy. Strip Christianity of the encumbrances and corruptions which ignorance, or superstition, or fraud has incorporated with it—let the unbeliever see, that instead of aspersing the character of a benevolent Deity, its nature, and principles, and requirements all harmonize with the best conceptions of the Divine nature—that all its doctrines are consistent and reasonable, its purposes benevolent, and its influences moralizing, and he will find new reasons for appreciating your arguments, and new motives for adopting the Christian profession.

The writer of this, has neither the vanity nor presumption to suppose that he shall perform the work of simplifying the Christian doctrine, or rendering it more particularly acceptable to unbelievers. He aims to add his mite to the accumulating treasury of Christian knowledge, and to the proofs of the heavenly origin of the Gospel—to aid, if possible, in the diffusion of those great truths on which the moral well-being and happiness of his fellow-men so much depend, and to assist in removing the darkness and sorrows, which forever brood over the mind of the unbeliever.

Under the existing circumstances of the Christian world—such, in fact, as it has been for many centuries—it is, rather a matter of wonder, that skepticism has been so rare, than that it has occasionally attracted attention, or numbered a few men of the first talents among its votaries. For to the most revolting dogmas, maintained by every artifice that power could employ, has been added a practice every way incompatible with a system designed for the moral improvement of mankind. The dispassionate looker-on is scarcely culpable for his doubts respecting the divine origin of a system so recommended. Nor is it matter of surprise, that these doubts have seldom been removed, when it is also recollected, that the skeptic, or unbeliever, has been treated as criminal, ignorant and obstinate—that he was avoided as an enemy, reprobated as a child of wrath, and denounced as a malicious disturber of the established order of civil society. The most that can be expected from such a state of things, is a covert working and stealthy propagation of infidelity—a silent under-current sapping the very foundations of the visible religious fabric; and cautiously waiting its time of development. France saw and felt the horrors of that time—and probably other nations have escaped its terrors, by the nature of their institutions. With us, public opinion is free, and the unbeliever is invited, in common with the various sects, to the frank and manly avowal of his principles. And the consequence probably is, that while there are more known infidels among us, there are fewer in fact, than in almost any other Christian country.

In view of these general facts, the conviction has been forced upon the writer, that, with very few exceptions, unbelievers have not generally received the courtesies to which they were entitled. The harsh and contemptuous treatment to which they have been subjected, was neither politic nor kind. It has had great influence in preventing their attention to the subject of religion; and has neutralized the force and effect of many convincing proofs and conclusive arguments in favor of Christianity.

We have been much gratified, that our brethren who have preceded us in these investigations, have greatly improved upon the former method, with unbelievers. As men, they should not be denied the usual privileges of men—to believe or disbelieve, without responsibility to man. And we have too much experience of the feelings and operations of human nature, to suppose that opinions of any kind are to be honestly abandoned or renounced, merely because they may provoke the disgust, the ridicule, or the reproach of others. Nothing in the form of coercion ever did, or ever can have any useful effect upon the mind of the supposed heretic—nor is there any good reason for believing, that its influence would be more salutary when tried upon the unbeliever.

It shall be our endeavor therefore, to lay before the unbeliever, a view of the prominent causes of his infidelity—to argue with him as a man—and to present him such motives and reasons for the belief of a revelation in general, and of Christianity in particular, that he shall do violence to his feelings, his reason and responsibilities to reject them. And we greatly err in our estimate of the plainest grounds of human conduct—if, when the true character of God is known, it is not loved—if, when the moral nature of man is duly appreciated, he is not thought worthy of the care of Heaven—and if, when the destiny of man is perceived, the unbeliever does not rejoice in becoming a Christian.

And as several doctrines and practices of certain Christian sects, will be examined, for the purpose of showing that they can not be maintained in an argument with unbelievers, it is deemed proper to apprise those concerned of the motives for so doing. It is confidently believed, that those doctrines and practices are the fruitful causes of that very unbelief, which all Christians are so desirous of removing from the human mind. Hence, what is supposed to be untenable and absurd in the creed of any class of Christians, will be frankly stated; and as far as consistent with our general plan, the reasons given for its rejection. Every candid Christian, of whatever sect, must feel that the attempt to maintain any opinion or usage, not clearly supported by the authority of the Bible, so far from serving, must injure the cause of truth and virtue. It will, therefore, constitute one part of our labor, and we trust not an uninteresting part, to show wherein certain views and practices are indispensable; and that, so long as they are maintained, it must be at the expense, both of reason and revelation. And it is hoped that Christian professors will exercise the candor which we all so much desire to see practiced by unbelievers—review their opinions, expunge from their creed every thing which is not authorised by the Scriptures, and which consequently does not admit of defence; and instead of the extravagances of fanaticism, practice the manly and purifying virtues enjoined by the Gospel. Let no one fear to do this. Christianity instead of suffering by the process, will come forth in greater purity, and in a more amiable and interesting form. Reason and revelation alike approve of every honest endeavor to restore the Christian doctrine to its original simplicity, and to the full measure of its influence over the human mind.

In the arguments and proofs employed in the following series of articles, in vindication of a divine interposition, no attempt is made at originality. Most of the works in support of the Christian theology have been read—many of them, however, for the general purpose of becoming familiar with the subject, and to be able at all times to meet the objections of unbelievers, to whatever they related, and in whatsoever form presented. And as this has been done for a term of years, without any reference to the uses to which such acquisitions are now about to be applied; it would perhaps be impossible for the writer to give the proper credit in all cases. He may have imbibed unconsciously, many ideas, and even forms of expression, which have become incorporated with his own views and phraseology so intimately as no longer to be recognized by himself as borrowed. And as he has no desire to detract from the claims of others, or to use their favors without acknowledgments and gratitude, he will leave the reader to settle the right of property in all cases where no direct quotation is made. We are really more concerned in the acquisition and spread of the knowledge of the Gospel, than in the question, whether the argument was first used by the facetious Berkeley, the indefatigable Lardner, the quaint and familiar Paley, or the interminable Chalmers. We would give "honor to whom honor is due," but would prefer being the humble instrument of imparting the belief, the temper and the hopes of the Gospel to but one mind, to the honor of being the author of more new ideas and arguments than any one man has now a right to claim.

But the question may perhaps arise—why so much solicitude on the subject of infidelity? why urge upon the public mind, the consideration of that particular subject? why persist in publishing book after book, and essay after essay, when nothing new can be expected as proof, and when the features and bearings of the arguments, scarcely admit of further modification? And above all, why call upon the unbeliever to read a number of works for which he has no taste?

There are at least two important reasons for doing these things—reasons that will continue to exist and be felt, while infidelity has a being; and such reasons as the unbeliever can never feel, nor properly appreciate. First—every Christian has full evidence—the evidence of his own experience, that the happiness of mankind greatly depends on their belief of the Gospel. And to the natural desire of seeing his opinions spread, and become the favored theme of public faith, is added the sincere and ardent desire to remove the evils and promote the happiness of the human race. Faith in the Gospel, is among the most obvious and effectual means for securing these objects. And, secondly—if Christians remain silent on this subject, they leave the field open to an industrious and active enemy; the youth would want protection from the specious allurements which have been artfully thrown in their way, and many minds would sink in darkness and wretchedness which, by suitable attention, may be preserved in faith, purity, and peace.

That unbelievers are active in the propagation of their system—if system it is, will be perceived when it is observed that they have ranged almost every department of mind, and endeavored to meet it in all its ramifications, pursuits and employments. And they do this without any prospect of moral benefit, or hope of future joy; for the gratification of counting increasing numbers and spreading a useless theory. Thus merging every grade of character and every variety of condition in one common tomb, where mind and morals, and hope and joy are crushed beneath the weight of a pervading and withering unbelief! And can they wonder, that the Christian should be equally active—that those with holy and heavenly hopes should find equal, or even higher motives to exertion?

For however it may be doubted, the course pursued by unbelievers, justifies and calls for continued vigilance on the part of the friends of Christianity. Every grade of society is assailed, under some form, with efforts to wean them from the faith of the Gospel. From the courtly and insinuating sarcasm upon the page of standard history, through plain-dealing assertions spread over works of philosophy and physiology, down to the humblest means of science and the ordinary associations of business men, all furnish the means of urging doubts of the most important and interesting truths—and all means are employed to plant deeply the seeds of infidelity.

And for what benevolent purpose is all this machinery put in motion? What end is to be gained—what worthy motive consummated—by the propagation of infidelity? Will it make the world wiser? This can scarcely be hoped, when it annihilates some of the highest inducements to seek after wisdom—and when it is recollected, that many of the wisest of our race were Christians. Can it make men better? This will not be pretended—such a supposition is contrary to the experience of fact, the evidence of every man's senses. And that there are good and upright men among unbelievers, is no objection to this statement. There are innumerable examples of superior triumphs over temptations and death among believers. Will it make men happier? No one believes that it can do so. For there is no reason to suppose that the mere virtues of an unbeliever can impart a purer or a higher felicity, than those of the Christian. And it were preposterous, or insane to suppose, that to go down to the grave with no hope of future life, can make the death-bed as peaceful and happy as the prelibations of another and a glorious state of conscious being. What, then, is the probable motive? Evidently to carry a point—to witness the triumph of what many no doubt conscientiously maintain for truth, reckless of all consequences of "weal or wo" to mankind.

But the Christian not only has different, but vastly higher motives for spreading the knowledge, and promoting the faith of the Gospel. He feels that his views are essential to the social, intellectual and moral well-being of his race. And that they are calculated to add dignity to wisdom, purity to the principles of the heart and the practices of the life, comfort and enjoyment, under every vicissitude of fortune, and peace and submission in death. He is assured, that to point out the way that leads alienated man back to his God, is to the religious feeling, what a message of kindness from a parent, is to a prodigal child. The Gospel directs the best and the holiest affections of the human heart, to their proper objects—concentrates them in gratitude and devotion to the Deity, and illustrates their uses and tendency in benevolence to man. It exalts, while it multiplies the reasons for a life of virtue, and it sanctifies that virtue with hopes as blissful as they are glorious and enduring.

This series of articles on infidelity, is not intended as part of a plan commenced in other recent publications, nor was it suggested by the appearance of those works. The attention of the writer had been drawn to the consideration of the subject some years since, from several causes—among these, the suggestions of several valued friends. And he had arranged the general outline, as well as the mode of publication, before it was known that any work on the same general subject was in contemplation.

The principal inducement to this mode of publication, was furnished by the certainty of placing the subject immediately in the hands of a much greater number of readers, than could be expected from any other method. For it is unfortunately too true, that the great majority of even general readers, have never been in possession of the usual arguments for a divine revelation. Their knowledge of the subject is principally derived from the recollection of a few sermons, or an occasional article from the press. And what is thus gleaned is often rendered of little value, from the confused and indefinite impressions which have been retained.

To this mode of publication, there is but one important objection—it is, that the several essays must be extended to considerable length, which will deter many readers from undertaking the labor. But this consideration is at least balanced by the certainty, that all such readers must be reached in this way, or not at all; since those who would hesitate at a single chapter, would never commence reading a book.

A CHAPTER ON PRUDENCE.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

PRUDENCE is one of the most useful and valuable traits that can adorn and beautify the human character; and it is to be seriously regretted that a greater degree of it is not to be met with among mankind, in their numerous and various enterprises and exertions. My present labors may not avail much in inducing attention to the importance and observance of the subject of this article; but at all events I shall so far manifest my attachment to it, as to write a few thoughts in relation thereto, and invite the reader's candid attention to them.

In the ordinary transactions of individual and social life, nothing is attended with more beneficial and profitable results than prudence of purpose and of action. Truly has the wise man of old said, "A prudent man foreseeth the evil and hideth himself." In a world like ours, abounding with such a multitude and variety of public and private enterprises, every individual should exercise all the discretion of which he is master, before he engages in any matter of importance; for, generally speaking, there is nothing of a more fatal tendency than heedlessness and temerity in the adoption and pursuit of any plan or purpose of a domestic, social or political nature. How many unfortunate alliances have been formed, how many families have been reduced to want and beggary, how many nations have become bankrupt and ruined, and how many kingdoms and countries have been deluged in the blood of intestine wars and commotions, in consequence of neglecting to exercise that prudence which reason and dispassionate reflection would have furnished? A mere glance at the past will furnish sufficient answers to the above interrogations.

But if prudence is thus important in the ordinary and secular concerns of human life, than which nothing can be made more evident to the contemplative and informed mind, how much more important must it be considered in its relation to the great matter of Religion! But here, again, we are too apt to act prematurely and rashly, both in the adoption and practice of those moral principles by which we choose to be governed and directed. And it is from this prolific source, that most of the evils, misfortunes and miseries of the nominal church of Christ, have flowed in such overwhelming torrents for several centuries past. If the professed followers of the Lamb, had, in past ages, duly "considered their ways," as the Lord directs and prudence requires, those tragic scenes which have wrapped Europe in devouring flames, and drenched her soil in the blood of martyrs, would have withered in their conception, and the honor, and glory, and power of the Redeemer's kingdom, would have spread from shore to shore, and millions who have expired at the stake and upon the rack, would have sung rejoicing in the radiance of its increasing splendor. And this is not all; their examples of consideration, forbearance and charity, would have extended their salutary influence over the whole civilized world, and a much more pleasing and profitable order of things than that which we now witness, would have been established among the professed worshippers of Jehovah in every land and nation.

But it is never too late to adopt and practice those exalted virtues which reason and revelation require. We should therefore speedily "cease to do evil, and learn to do well." We should strive to act prudently, not only in our endeavors to promote what we honestly believe to be truth and virtue, but also in our endeavors to overcome and vanquish what we deem vice and error. The most valuable enterprise ever conceived, may be thwarted by the inconsiderate temerity of its overzealous advocates; and the most devoted attachment to a virtuous cause, may lose its reward, and counteract its own design through the impropriety of its manifestation. We should therefore be admonished, that "the wisdom of the prudent, is to understand his way," and that "every prudent man doleth with knowledge." "The simple believe every word," says Solomon, "but the prudent man looketh well to his going." These admonitions are well worth treasuring up in the heart, and reducing to practice, on every occasion, through the journey of life.

Religious zeal unaccompanied with prudence, is very much like an unruly tongue—"a fire; a world of iniquity—it defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the whole course of nature; and it is set on fire of hell." James iii: 6. This being the case, every individual should strive to think, and speak, and act prudently in all things, but particularly in matters of religious doctrine and practice. Thus endeth the chapter.

TEMPERANCE IN RELIGION.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

Christianity is one of the noblest gifts of God to man—and applied, as it was intended that it should be applied, raises the moral and intellectual condition of the creature to the regions of virtue and truth. It expands his feelings, strengthens his views, brightens his hopes, exalts his understanding, softens his passions, sharpens his conscience, enlarges his moral action, sublimates his views of the Deity, gives him prudence in prosperity, courage in adversity, patience in sickness, and a noble confidence in the struggles of death. But this system, glorious as it is, can be used intemperately—that is, it can be so twisted as to produce evil in many forms. That men can become intoxicated on the subject of religion, I need only refer to those moral whirlwinds which swept over our land a few years since, when people would attend meeting, morning, noon and night, neglect their business and their families, and for that matter their Bibles into the bargain, to drink a false zeal which made some of them crazy and victims of suicide, while the rest were exhilarated for a season, to become morally languid when the fit passed off.

If I discover two individuals, when debating about the Bible, getting angry with each other, throwing hard names, and at the very foot of the cross exhibiting a malignant disposition, it seems to me that there is not a little intemperance about such a course. If I discover one sect perpetually stigmatizing any other sect, and at the same time averse to a fair and candid examination of the question in dispute, it seems to manifest some degree of intemperance. If I discover a man whose life is rather questionable for six days of the week, but who appears very sanctimonious for the other day, uses his religion as he does his cloak, to be put on at pleasure, and who at the same time denounces every person who does not believe his creed-book, surely there is intemperance about him—he drinks too much of a bad spirit. But if I discover a man (or a woman) who speaks of his faith in the mild spirit of his Lord, who respects the opinion as well as the character of his neighbor, who worships God with the simple desire of improving in righteousness, who is uniformly correct in his conduct, whose feet are often seen directed to places of distress, sickness and poverty, who is heard affectionately warning the wicked man to turn from the evil of his ways to that Saviour who bled and died for him, whose actions are so pure that others take knowledge from them and glorify God, who reads his Bible with delight and pleasure, making it the guide for all his ways and as well as the direct source of his faith—such a man is temperate in the use of his religion—his example falls upon community, not in the rushing torrents of sin, but in the calm and gentle influences of virtue—and as a moderate use of food induces in the physical system a high state of health, so such a man shows, that a clear, thorough, dispassionate examination of the Bible, and an every-day trial of its precepts, induces a high state of health in the morals, and makes him beloved in all his ways and upright in all his concerns.

But when an individual makes a compound of his religion, adding the intoxicating drugs of error to his faith, he becomes like fire without a master, an intemperate fanatic, incapable of reasoning dispassionately, and condemning all his neighbors to ceaseless tortures because they can not believe and drink his "mixed wine" of faith. Such religion has been a curse to man, for it has lighted the fires of sacrifice on every altar of persecution, and worked its fury without remorse. But when religion heals the soul, when it pours the wine of consolation into the broken heart, when it restores the desponding thoughts, raises the sinning soul to life and joy, and removes from the mind and body all the disorders of transgression, then it becomes the medicine of heaven which is shed upon man for his benefit and salvation, to make him what he should be, the friend of his fellows. In such a case religion is used temperately; and its blessed consequences are seen in the thousands of instances, to the good of men and the glory of God.

EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY.

Christians, though differing in sect and sentiment, universally acknowledge the Old and New Testaments to be the only infallible guide, and receive it as the sure foundation of their faith and practice. These Scriptures claim an absolute right to determine the belief, and to regulate the conscience of man; to be profitable for doctrine, correction, and reproof—and to have been given by the inspiration of God. These claims are supported by evidences external and internal—such as arise from its nature and consistency; its simplicity and uniformity; fidelity and competency; its fitness to the character of God, and the state and condition of man, with the accompanying convictions impressed on the mind by the operation of the holy Spirit: also from the nature of man, for as light is absolutely necessary, reason will teach that a Being infinitely wise and benevolent would be revealed; and that a revelation from Heaven would have been introduced and transmitted down as these Scriptures were, and like them, rational and practicable in doctrine; pure and elevated in sentiment; combining the plain and simple, with all that is noble and sublime; and so happily adapted to the capacity of every intelligent being in the universe.

The Christian, as his name implies, receives as the author and finisher of his faith, Jesus Christ. That such a personage did certainly appear, and suffer crucifixion, according to the records of history, the testimonies and acknowledgments of friends and enemies, none can doubt. That his religion was embraced and maintained by multitudes, is equally evident. From the same sources we prove that his immediate followers did write the life and doctrine of Jesus, their master; and that they, professing to have been guided by inspiration, delivered the books of the New Testament, as being the record of God's word. Now if their record be true, the divine authority of Christianity is established at once. One point is certain; that the apostles, at least, knew the true character of what they testified—they were "eye witnesses" to, and participated in. If false, the motive was worldly or selfish—but in promulgating this faith, they not only did forego pleasures and enjoyments, favors and emoluments, and all in which the worldly could delight, but bore a cross of privation and sorrow, of contempt and persecution, and emphatically preached with the certainty of meeting stripes and death.

In their writings, sincerity and disinterestedness are eminently conspicuous. They breathe forth a spirit, pious and devout, yet generous and benevolent. With language the most happy and the most forcible, they present unaffected and undadorned testimony, whose highest claim to attract and please is the garb of simple truth.

Nor was it by word alone, that the followers of Christ attested their mission. They were endowed with high and miraculous powers. Signs and wonders were wrought without number—not in secret and unknown; but publicly; before all, that all might believe—not for their own interest, or to aggrandize themselves; but they were exerted as instruments of benevolence and love, when necessity required the interposition of a God. Neither in life only, were they confident and zealous; but in death they rose triumphant in the arms of faith, accounting nothing as worthy, but the religion they professed. For this same Christianity, we see them subduing the carnal heart—buffeting the trials of life—preaching the word boldly and with steadfastness—vouching their sincerity by the power of the Most High; and sealing their testimony with their own blood.

Again—the propagation of Christianity evinces its Divine origin. Although despised and rejected, its progress and increase has been great and wonderful. “Destitute of all human advantages;” says a writer, “protected by no authority; assisted by no art; not recommended by the reputation of its author; not enforced by eloquence in its advocates, the word of God grew mightily and prevailed.” From the twelve poor and unlettered servants of a crucified Master, we behold it confounding the wisdom of the learned, and the subtlety of the philosopher; triumphing over the most determined opposition; and ever melting the heart of the persecutor and causing the hardihood of the magistrate to tremble—and that too, not by flattering and enticing the corrupt passions of the human heart. It condemned at once, the whole system of Jewish ceremony and Heathen belief, holding forth the doctrines of the cross as the only rule of faith and practice. Contemned and opposed, still it increased. The fiery zeal of persecution seemed but to advance its progress. The soul of the martyr amid flames and death, preached loud the consolations of the spirit, and the high hope of glory, and spread far and wide the religion of Christ.

And, also, its nature and its consistency, proves its divinity. It comprehends the history of the human heart; the whole plan of salvation, and even the great and adorable perfections, the sublime and awful mystery of Jehovah. It is consistent with the attributes of Deity, and the true character and condition of man—consistent, both in doctrine, in tendency, and in effect.

Without light diffused over the face of nature, much now clearly known, would have remained in deep, impenetrable darkness. Here its state is developed, and the path of duty made plain.*

[We need not the evidences of Revelation—particularly the graphic details of Paul in the first chapter of his epistle to the Romans—to prove that philosophy and learning, art and science, failed to redeem Greece and Rome from the degraded and corrupting influences of polytheism and idolatry; for nearly every profane historian furnishes proof, that even the few who were rescued from the popular belief continued the popular practices; adding to them the careless indifference of the skeptic, or the time-serving policy of the atheist. While the history of every other more barbarous people, (the Jews alone excepted,) adds but darkness, ignorance, crime, and beastly debasement to the picture. To enlighten even the Jew and refine his heart—to abolish the ignorance nature could not remove, and by giving necessary knowledge, subdue the vices of the Heathen world, Jesus of Nazareth was commissioned from on high. He disclosed the true, full character of God; the duty of man; and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel.] He before whom all heaven bows, gave himself a willing sacrifice, to publish salvation and eternal happiness, to a world self-condemned and lost in guilt—and not only was he willing to rescue the sinking soul, and fit it for endless joy—but to acknowledge it as his follower—as his joint heir—and use it as an instrument to spread his Gospel—advance his cause and co-work with him. Moreover, he imparted to his apostles a comforter, even the Spirit of truth. He opened to their view the bright prospect of glorious success; for as he was their leader and the cause his own, so he would be with them—and raise up for himself, a church on earth, which should believe his doctrine, obey his precepts, and be saved by his truth.

Its tendency, also, proves Christianity divine. It teaches, “Glory to God in the highest; and on earth peace, good will towards men.” The effects of Christianity have been, benefits great and lasting, in proportion to the obedience yielded to its principles. Before it, Heathen darkness has vanished—slavery and despotism have given away to governments free and enlightened. Nations acknowledging this as the fundamental basis of their laws and institutions, have arisen to the highest degree of eminence and happiness. Families, where once discord, turmoil and discontent reigned, have become the seat of every domestic endearment. Individuals, lost to themselves and society, have been raised from degradation and wretchedness, to enjoyment, usefulness and honor. In the lowest state, in the highest circle, in the most exalted station, wherever its true spirit has been known, its watchword has been “peace,” and its whole movement “onward,” to rescue—to restore—to bless. To its temporal benefits add its spiritual tendency—its effects on the mind of man. How many a soul, burdened with a sense of guilt, has found joy unspeakable in believing! How many hundreds and thousands have been constrained under its dictates, to devote themselves wholly to the praise and glory of God? Here the proud and impenitent heart has been softened—the ferocious temper, subdued—powerful prejudice, removed—ignorance, dispelled—and the obstacles to real happiness, overcome. Here the Christian, when looking around on the glories and blandishments of this world, has been enabled with a noble contempt to despise them all. By this has death been disrobed of terror—and with a holy magnanimity the soul has been borne up in a dying hour, and sweetly sung itself away to everlasting bliss.

And besides all these evidences, the Scriptures are replete with prophecies that have been fulfilling from that day to this; and which, whilst proving conclusively their Divine origin, open to the view a day infinitely bright and glorious, when the Sun of Righteousness shall beam on the dark and benighted corners of the globe—when the spirit of irresistible truth, winging its way to every clime, shall move from hill to valley; from heart to heart; until every hill and every vale shall re-echo the glad tidings of the Gospel, and every heart beat high with the praises of Zion.

Who, that has ever felt the happy efficacy of Christianity; who, that has known its excellences; who, that has been convinced of its heavenly nature and peaceful tendency, but will from the heart respond, Let the whole earth be filled with its glory, and may every inhabitant thereof know its genuine influence!

PHRENOLOGY.

Some of our readers may remember a promise made in the beginning of this volume, to notice an article quoted by Br. Thomas, in the Union, from the American Quarterly Review for December last. I have several times been asked why my promise was not fulfilled. But it was only a few days ago, that I was enabled to find a copy of the Review, so as to read the whole article. I partially regret my promise, as it leads me to perpetrate a longer article than may be deemed generally useful or proper on this subject, by our readers. To my mind, neither the whole article, nor the particular extract referred to and copied below, militates against the science. The following are what the Reviewer calls the horns of a dilemma.

“There is no more proper place than this for remarking what must have struck every one who has critically examined Phrenology, that its advocates make all the diversity of feeling and intellect observed amongst mankind to depend upon the size, shape and condition of the brain; and, notwithstanding, exclaim against the calumny, if they are called materialists. If every variety of genius and talent is to be traced to the condition of the brain, then it follows, either that thought is the function [Br. Thomas quoted this word “fountain,” which puzzled me exceedingly. A. B. G.] of the brain itself; or that the soul, or immaterial thinking principle, is the same in every individual, and its exhibitions of power in different persons simply modified by means of its material organ, the brain. If the former is the opinion of phrenologists, then they are properly denominated materialists. If the latter, we would thank them to inform us how they have discovered that souls are precisely similar in all individuals.” p. 376.

Phrenology has nothing to do with speculations about invisible and immaterial things—it confines itself to facts—that peculiar developments co-exist with peculiar manifestations of intellect and feelings. Being based on facts, by facts only can it be refuted. But suppose we indulge our metaphysical opponent, who prefers abstract reasonings to inductions and demonstrations. I choose the latter horn of the dilemma, not because I am obliged to take one or the other, (for he, himself, admits there is a third position that may be taken, and I know of yet another that might be assumed,) but merely to please him. Well, what dilemma—or rather what horn is there to gore me? Simply—“we would thank them to inform us how they have discovered that souls are precisely similar in all individuals!” Have we said we had discovered this? No—we give it merely as our opinion.

This demand reminds me of the Scottish stone-cutter, who, on a monument, carved an angel with a large wig on its head. “Who ever saw an angel with a wig on?” said a visitor, one day. “And wha,” said the man of stone—“And wha ever saw an angel without a wig?” Will our opponent please tell us how he discovered that souls are not precisely similar in all individuals? Hear his proofs. “We believe that they [i. e. souls] are diversified while connected with their frail and perishing tenements; and we also believe they will still farther differ from each other when separated from it and introduced into the world of spirits; and this [further difference in the world of spirits] will happen in consequence of a greater original capacity for improvement in some than in others.” p. 376.

At this rate of argument, phrenologists, also, can answer his question. “We believe that souls are equal, but diversified by their connection with their frail and perishing tenement; and we also believe they will remain equal when introduced into the world of spirits,” etc. Surely our “believe” is as good reason as his. Where, then, is the horn of his dilemma?

But he himself admits that there is a third hypothesis, notwithstanding his confident declaration that “there is no escape for the phrenologists from one or the other horn of the above dilemma.” For he says, p. 372, “We are aware that some, who wish to reconcile Christianity and phrenology, argue that the soul, acting through the brain, shapes this organ so as to correspond with its [the soul’s] powers; and, consequently, that the size and shape of the head will indicate the properties of the soul of each individual.” He denies the truth of this hypothesis, also, but offers no proof of its falsity. He says that experienced phrenologists deny any difference between souls—but his proof (p. 376) does not warrant his assertion. Combe and others only say—“we have no proof” (not, we believe, know, or have proof to the contrary) “that the immaterial thinking principle varies in its powers from year to year,” though the brain does, and its manifestations with it. Yet he asks, “How do phrenologists know that the immaterial thinking principle does not vary in its powers,” etc.; just as if phrenologists had said they knew it does not, when they only say they have no proof that it does—and proceeding according to proof

* I have taken the liberty, which I trust Beta will excuse, of substituting a few words in brackets which we all believe in lieu of some sentiments which many Christians reject with horror; in the belief that the more unexceptionable such excellent articles as the above can be made, the more good will they effect.

only they say nothing in favor of or against either, opinion. But how does this Reviewer know that souls do vary in their powers from year to year? Such metaphysical quiddities may answer in speculative theories, but in a science like phrenology, based on facts, and silent when there is no proof to warrant assertion or denial they are utterly vain and useless.

But I think the reason why the Reviewer contends for original difference, of capacity in the immaterial thinking portions of our race, and their change from year to year, may be found in his religious creed, taken rather from popular tradition than from the Bible. The following extract, from p. 377 of the Quarterly, lets us into the secret.

"If they [phrenologists] believe in the existence of a soul, and admit the truth of the only Book which gives us any information relative to its attributes, they must allow that, during this state of probation, it is continually undergoing changes; either advancing in purity and strength, preparatory to its admission among a higher order of intelligences; or retrograding, in its downward progress, to those mansions of wo, which are prepared for those who have degraded their noble nature by the pursuit of folly and licentiousness."

Not to notice the utter silence of the Bible about the attributes of the soul—about this present life being a state of probation—about original differences between the souls of men, and about those mansions of wo in the resurrection or immortal state, or the endlessly increasing difference between the destinies of portions of our race—not to notice these, I say, look for one moment at the character the Reviewer ascribes to Deity. Phrenology has been accused of representing chastisements as unjust, by saying that the disposition of men depended on the conformation of the brain. Though in this shape, the charge is false; yet suppose we admit it true—it would apply but to chastisements inflicted while the mind was dependent on its material organs for manifestation. But the Reviewer contends that there is an original difference between souls—that "in consequence of a greater original capacity for improvement in some than in others," "they will still further differ from each other when" "introduced into the world of spirits"—when one class is admitted "among a higher order of intelligences," and the other class is pent up in "mansions of wo." Endless bliss and endless misery are the consequences of the original formation of souls—formed not as the creature willed, but as the Creator pleased, knowing the consequences! Such is the Reviewers' creed, and no wonder it is opposed to Phrenology. Materialism in its worst form, is certainly preferable to this—for, better believe in no God, than in such a one.

But materialism is not always atheism—many Christians believe in the materiality of the soul, and yet believe in its immortality. Anciently, spirituality of the soul was not supposed to involve its immateriality; as may be seen by consulting several of the most eminent Fathers.

But enough. I think the reader must be satisfied that those famous two horns of a dilemma, are but a large pair of ears, after all! A. B. G.

LUKE II: 10.

"Fear not: for behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people."

These words preceded the annunciation of the most important event in Ecclesiastical history—the birth of the greatest and best personage ever commissioned to deliver a message to the world. The terms in which was announced this great event, are plain and emphatic; and the first question which must arise in every reflecting mind anxious for happiness, must be—are they true? Were they—or will they be literally and strictly fulfilled? Mark the idea naturally conveyed by the words of our text. They are extensive as creation and gladdening as hope can desire in their extent. Will, then, the event—the annunciation of which is preceded by these words—ever terminate in such a grand result as to warrant the use of exactly such words as the text contains? Be pleased to notice the energetic—yea, the peculiarly emphatic language of the text.

"FEAR NOT"—The message was not a fearful one—it was not a message of anger, vindictive ire, and almighty wrath and indignation—and though the shepherds were "sore afraid" when the glory of the Lord shone round about them, yet their fear was without cause, and was speedily to be removed. Oh, how different from many sermons we have heard was the introduction of this sermon by the angel!

"Fear not"—but why should they not fear? were they not sinners, and are we not told that God hateth sinners? When therefore his glory was manifested, why should they not fear—for "all have sinned and come short of the glory of God"? Hear, then, why they should not fear. "For behold I bring you good tidings of great joy"—was here any cause of fear for themselves? Are people authorized to fear at hearing "good tidings of good" proclaimed unto them? But the shepherds were men—they were connected by the ties of humanity to others, if not all of our race—might they not, then, fear for others? We frequently see religionists who rejoice with great joy at the tidings of their own salvation, yet grieve, and weep, and mourn with a sorrow that will not be comforted, at the probable perdition of their relatives and friends. Might not the shepherds have been in their condition? Hear the whole message.

"Fear not: for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people." Is here a loop left on which to hang a doubt? on which to place sorrow and sighing and sadness? We think not. Now unless these good tidings are ultimately made known unto all people, they will not be tidings of any kind to all. To those who hear them they may be tidings—but not to those who never hear.

You are in a state of great destitution—a distant friend makes arrangements to relieve you—a messenger, aware of this fact, appears before you, but is silent as the grave on the subject of his mission—is his knowledge tidings of any kind to you?

2dly—Unless these "good tidings of great joy" are true—however good they may appear—they will ultimately be really bad tidings to all who are deceived by them—their good will be apparent only, but not real. In this case our former supposed case will again answer. Suppose then, that when you are thus destitute, the messenger, deceived as to your friend's good intentions—or your friend prevented from relieving you—the messenger appears and informs you, as a fact, that relief is near—even at hand—but you ultimately find, by sad experience, that the message is false—I appeal to you all, would the deceptive falsehood, when thus discovered, be "good news"? We do not ask what it would have been if true—but what is it, if false.

Lastly—If these "good tidings of great joy" be not ultimately experienced by "all people"—they will not be really true—they will not be "good tidings of great joy to all people." True—they may be good to some, being experienced by some—but they will neither be true, nor good to those who experience them not. But if true to all, then, whether believed or not, on its first promulgation, yet when its fulfilment takes place—when the destitute are supplied—the oppressed relieved—and the enslaved made free—then will it be good tidings of great joy realised, and felt and known of all.

Such is Christianity—such are its promises—such will be its blessings if any reliance can be placed on the annunciation which accompanied the birth of its founder, and the teachings of the volume recording its doctrines. To the believer there is joy unspeakable and full of glory, in the anticipation of this joyous event—to the unbeliever, deprived of this consolation, its promises are nevertheless sure. Its first words to all, are "fear not"—its assurances are similar in spirit—"for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be to all people"—and its simple doctrine is, "unto you is born a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." This believed, saves from all fear which hath torment—made a principle of life, it saves from sin by turning away from iniquity—and when realized, crowns with glory, immortality and eternal life the family of man.

We can see no objection of any important weight to this conclusion of our mind—though our Partialist brethren do, or believe they do. For what is the extent of the assurance, is it not to all people? There is no distinction made between saints and sinners—old and young—bond and free—rich and poor—Jew and Gentile—but all people—of whatever tongue, nation, kindred, sect or name—are embraced in its comprehensive bounds.

Nor are any doubts or contingencies or conditions expressed. It is a truth which may be proclaimed to all—for it is true to all—and having its foundation laid in the immutable counsels of the fountain of all veracity—it can not be rendered more certain by the belief or rendered less true by the disbelief of man. Being true to all, its fulfilment must eventually take place—and when fulfilled it will be good tidings of great joy indeed.

It was objected that it was to be good tidings only to the shepherds? The objector must then overlook the most obvious meaning of the text. It was to be good tidings to the shepherds, it is true, but it was also promised to be such to all people. Mark, in proof, the language. "I bring you good tidings of great joy which shall be"—what?—good tidings of great joy certainly—"to all people." Or, as Dr. Luther, in the German translation, has rendered it—"which shall occur to, or befall all people." These remarks will go far towards proving also that the tidings themselves did not concern the shepherds only, notwithstanding that the language, being addressed to them immediately and personally, may lead some so to suppose. "For unto you is born, this day, a Saviour which is Christ the Lord" must be as true to every individual of the whole human race, as it was to every individual among those to whom it was spoken. If not, how can it be good tidings of great joy unto all people. Suppose a popular doctrine to be true—will it be glad tidings of joy to the lost sinners of our race, when in hell, to hear that many years ago a Saviour was born unto a few shepherds near Bethlehem? Will it be even such to them to hear that a Saviour was provided for them, but in vain, by that Great Being who immutably foreknew from all eternity that the provision would not benefit them?

Render, may God give you grace to perceive the universality, the veracity and the immutability of his purposes—to rejoice in the certain prospect of their accomplishment, with fulness of joy and glory; and to be a co-worker with God, by spreading a knowledge of the truth abroad, and recommending it to the reception and practice of your fellow-beings by a well ordered life and godly conversation. ONEIDA INSTITUTE.

Doctor Green, the Principal of this Institution, which we took occasion to notice in this paper of the 6th of January last, has after so long a time condescended to notice our remarks. Whether any thing short of a public call would have induced him to do it or not, our readers must judge, after considering the facts stated in that article, and reading the following letter dated "Whitesboro', Feb. 16, 1837.

"MY DEAR SIR—From a paragraph in a paper printed at Utica, in which the writer complains of my neglecting to answer his inquiries about the On. Institute, a stranger might, perhaps, infer that the distance between Utica and Whitesboro', must be considerable. If you will take the trouble to visit us, we will do our utmost to satisfy your mind on any points respecting our design, which you may see fit to suggest. We have always been open to your inspection.

"Yours respectfully, B. GREEN."

"REV. D. SKINNER."

From the above, one would be led to infer, that Dr. G. supposed, because Utica and Whitesboro' were not a great distance apart, therefore he was under no obligation to answer any inquiries respecting the Institution over which he presides, whether verbal or written: and farther, that because the journey was not long, any one might go and see, in order to satisfy himself respecting any point concerning which he might desire information. But how could we know, till the Dr. or some one else should inform us, that the Institute and all its affairs were open for our inspection? If such was the fact we were ignorant of it, and from the total neglect to inform us any thing of this or any other fact, till after our public complaint, we were led to infer almost anything but a freedom to examine and know all about the affairs of the Institute. We thank the Dr., late as it is, for the information his letter contains; and think it probable we may avail ourselves of his invitation to visit and examine more particularly into the affairs of the Institute, after our return from the South.

Accompanying, and on the same sheet with the above letter, is a printed Prospectus of the School, its objects, expenses, course of studies, etc., which we conclude has been printed since we published our article complaining of a want of information in the public concerning the School at Whitesboro'. We suppose its publication is recent from the fact that we had not seen it at that time and could not ascertain on inquiry, from the friends of the Institute, that any such statement had been published for years. The following is the principal part of the printed sheet on this subject.

"THE ONEIDA INSTITUTE, at Whitesboro', New-York, a short distance from the city of Utica, beautifully situated in the valley of the Mohawk, combines in its course of instruction manual with mental labor. Every student is expected, under the direction of an experienced and able Superintendent, to devote three hours a day to muscular exercise in some agricultural or mechanical employment. Of this, the pecuniary results are appropriated, as far as they go, to the payment of the board bill. The value of these results for every student must of course depend upon his health and strength; his enterprise and skill; his activity and fidelity. In some cases it will equal the expense of his board; in some, it will fall a little, and in others, considerably short of that amount.

"The course of study pursued at the Oneida Institute consumes nearly four years. Each year begins on the second Thursday of February, and, consisting of forty weeks, ends in November. A vacation of twelve weeks then ensues.

"To enter on the course of study, a timely application from the student, with trust-worthy testimonials of good mental and moral character is expected. He must then be able to sustain an examination in the principles of common Arithmetic, English Grammar, Geography, and the Greek of Matthew's Gospel."

Then follows a statement of the studies pursued during the four years' course, with the different exercises in which the students engage.

"Lectures, more or less frequent and full, in connection with the studies belonging to this course, may be expected.

"Before leaving any particular study, each class will be examined; and the proficiency of every member will be officially certified. The Junior class will have public exercises on the second Wednesday of May; and the Senior the second Wednesday of September. These exercises will be confined chiefly to the studies in which the students had been engaged.

"EXPENSES.

"Tuition a year, $22 } to be paid quarterly in Room rent, - 4 } advance.
Contingent bill, - 4 }

Washing, light and fuel, will cost about $10
The price of board, $1 25 a week.

"All the students will be expected, extraordinary cases excepted, to board in the dining hall, where the price of board will be reduced to the lowest practicable amount. Every student must furnish his own bed and bedding.

"In the English and preparatory department of the Oneida Institute, attention will be given to such studies as English academies in our country commonly pursue. The elements of the Greek language will also be taught. Free access to such public exercises in the Institute as may be useful to the students, will be afforded. Tuition will be $20 a year."

There are some things very commendable in the plan of the Institute. The manual labor part, as connecting bodily and mental exercise, we think cannot fail of being highly beneficial, if rightly conducted. Respecting the merits of this Institution in general, we are not now prepared to speak. D. S.

COMMON SCHOOLS.

A STATE CONVENTION of Teachers and Friends of Education, (we perceive by our exchange papers,) is appointed to be held in this city, on the second Thursday of May next, at 9 o'clock, A. M. We learn by one of the Committee, that extensive arrangements are being made to secure a full attendance; to make the meetings interesting by lectures from able speakers, on important subjects; and for the transaction of important business connected with the prosperity and improvement of Common Schools. The Convention which authorized this call, met at Albany, on the 18th of February last, and appointed Mr. Samuel Steele, of Albany, Chairman of the General Committee, instead of J. O. Taylor, superceded, for reasons there given. The Committee of Arrangements are, S. Steele, J. W. Bulkely, J. B. Glendenning, James Henry, Jr., S. R. Sweet, E. R. Reynolds, and Charles H. Anthony. This notice is here given from a desire to aid in so important a work by calling the attention of the friends of general education among our readers in this State, (and we know they are many,) to the subject, and urging them to aid in securing as full and active an attendance at the Convention as is possible. There is room for much improvement in the Common Schools in this section, and, we suppose we might add, every where; nor can the liberties of our country and the happiness of her people be considered secure, until at least some of these improvements are effected. A. B. G.

DEDICATION AT FULTON.

Br. Eaton has furnished us with the following particulars respecting the dedication of the Universalist meeting house recently erected in this place, on January 19th. The order of services was as follows—1. Voluntary, by the choir. 2. Reading select Scriptures, by Br. Cook. 3. Introductory prayer by Br. Abell. 4. Hymn. 5. Sermon, by Br. Eaton. 6. Dedictory prayer, by Br. Cook. 7. Hymn. 8. Benediction, by Br. Morse. Sermons were also preached in the afternoon and evening, by Brs. Cook and Abell—the health of Br. Morse preventing his officiating as preacher.

The house is a neat building, thirty-four by forty feet, with a gallery on three sides, and will seat about 400 persons. I will add that the society is in a flourishing condition; but by the removal of Br. Eaton to a new scene of labor, contrary even to their united wishes, it is left without a pastor; the arrangement made to supply their desk before he left, having failed to supply them. May they soon be supplied, with one equal in zeal; ability and fidelity to their late pastor. A. B. G.

"The Magazine and Advocate of the 3d inst., arrived at the Trumpet office on the 11th, thirty miles beyond us they receive it three days earlier."—Trumpet of March 18.

Really, we shall begin to think our humble paper, (which Br. Whittemore, even forgot to notice in his list of Universalist periodicals furnished for Mr. Hayward's Religious Statistics,) is becoming vastly important to the Trumpet office; seeing that this is the third time its arrival has been noticed! And it is received three days earlier, thirty miles beyond Boston! What a pity that Br. Whittemore could not be there, to read it when it arrives!

But seriously—as it takes more than three days for our mailer to do up and send off all our packages of papers, it follows as a matter of course, that some people will receive their papers three days earlier than others. Dared a Dutchman occupy Irish ground, I would say, could we possibly contrive a plan by which each one would receive our sheet first, we would have every man served before the rest. But we can not; and every alteration of our mail books and order of mailing, would only involve us in as great perplexity as the present. We now begin mailing on Wednesday, and almost always finish before Saturday night. All delays beyond this, (with a few unavoidable exceptions during the busy Winter season,) must be laid to some other person's account than ours.—Our present order in mailing, enables us to accommodate the great majority of our readers with the paper for Sunday reading—an object we can not consent to lose sight of, to accommodate a few distant subscribers with the paper one or two week days earlier than at present. But even as it now is, our paper should reach Boston on the Wednesday after it is printed, at farthest.

While addressing the Trumpet, I would add, that I gave the name of the subscriber at Frederickstown, Ohio, as I received it—my rule in all such cases. A. B. G.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

THE WIDOW'S SON.

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

"Behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow." Luke vii: 12.

There's nothing beneath the blest'd regions above,
So sweet to the spirit o'erburdened with care,
As a mother's abiding, immutable love,
Which earth's direst evils can never impair.

Ah, who can portray the fierce deluge of feeling,
When piece-meal is rent the deep fount of her soul—
All the depths of despair with its wrecked hopes revealing—
Who'll "stay the proud waves," or their fury control?

Thus stood the lone mourner—the last tie that bound her
To earth and its pleasures, was severed in twain—
Though friends and acquaintance assembled around her,
And potent is sympathy—here all was vain.

She tremblingly followed the bier where lay shrouded
The pride of her life and the prop of her age,
While thro' her crushed spirit such wretchedness crowded,
Omnipotence only the pang could assuage.

When lo!—as they passed through the gates of the city—
The meek Son of mercy appeared, and drew near;
His eye beamed compassion, his soul moved to pity—
He looked on the mourner—touched lightly the bier.

Ah, now, what a scene! how exquisitely thrilling!
The multitude waited in anxious suspense;
They'd heard of his wonderful powers of healing,
Restoring death's victims to life and to sense.

"Young man—arise!"—and behold from death's slumber
Awoke the pale subject of death's dark domain!
The shroud and the coffin no longer encumber,
The warm vital fluid meanders again!

Who'll measure the soul in its wild agitation,
Or number the billows of ocean, I deem
Can tell how that torn one endured the mutation
From sorrow's mad frenzy to rapture extreme.

O blessed memorial! Truth's allegation!
What heart-felt emotion should each bosom fill—
What joy and thanksgiving, and true adoration,
That o'er the dread tyrant He's conqueror still!

CONTENTMENT.

There is a jewel which no Indian mine can buy,
No chemist art can counterfeit;
It makes men rich in greatest poverty,
Makes water wine, turns wooden cups to gold,
The homely whistle to sweet music's strain;
Seldom it comes, to few from Heaven sent,
'That much is little—all in naught—content—WILBYE.

Happiness is the most desirable object of existence; and when we observe the unremitting efforts of some in the pursuit of fleeting pleasures, which endure not, but vanish as the morning dews, and contemplate the ambition of man to elevation, it would seem, that the exhilarating follies of fashion, or distinction and honors, are requisite to the consummation of that much coveted state.

Philosophers, generally, extend this subject into too many divisions and ramifications, and mystify it greatly with metaphysical requisitions; a well-balanced observance of which with them, constitutes the desirable object in view: hence when we examine our feelings and situation, and find many of these wanting, we have to believe ourselves deficient of the attributes which we ought to possess to be happy. Though their precepts are valuable, we seldom find any one person in a situation that gives him the advantage of observing every particular to enjoy the blessing: therefore discovering the deficiency, with the misanthrope, he believes that there is no good, but all is evil and misery; and is thus at continual warfare with his own feelings.

We do not intend to go into the philosophy of happiness, but shall merely remark, that happiness consists in the harmony of the faculties of the mind, the animal, the moral and the intellectual powers, and in the adaptation of circumstances to means; with faith in God, and entire submission to his laws and dispensations. By the harmony of the faculties of the mind, we mean the legitimate exercise of the three grand divisions just named. A man, however industrious he may be in any manual labor, and however prosperous may be his business, can not be perfectly happy in that pursuit alone; he is constituted a moral and intellectual man as well as a physical being, and when he does not exercise his moral duties and improve his intellectual endowments, he has upbraidings of his own conscience, and ambitious longings for a rank among his fellow-men which destroy his repose and happiness. And the man who only cultivates the intellectual powers suffers a greater degree of restlessness, irritability, and disappointment. It is only by strict attention to the order of nature, and by giving due diligence in the application of our varied faculties to their legitimate purposes, that can secure to us that equilibrium of mind so essential to ease and comfort—the consciousness of having fulfilled our destiny as far as circumstances and opportunities permitted.

M. Droz, in his excellent work, Sur l'Art d'Etre Heureux, correctly observes, that "man is created to be happy;" but, restless and impatient in his over-weening strides after gratifications to satiate his inordinate pride and vanity, he drives it from his embrace. Bios, the philosopher, justly observes, that "no man had so much care, as he who endeavors after the most happiness"; and the ancients relate, that OROMAZES appeared to USBECK, the virtuous, and said, "form a wish, and I will grant it." "Source of light, replied the sage, I only wish to limit my desires by those things which nature has rendered indispensable": which single sentence comprises as much sound philosophy as the thousands of ponderous tomes, which contain all the wisdom of the Heathen Philosophers and modern Metaphysicians, on this subject. BURNS shrewdly hints:

"Its no' in books, its no in lea,
To make us truly blest:
If happiness has not her seat
And centre in the breast;
We may be wise, or rich, or great,
But never can be blest."

Happiness in this world must, necessarily, be imperfect. Man's unrestrained longings can not be satisfied—there is still an aching void to him who has not learned to curb his desires; and the most we can, reasonably, look for, is some of the comforts of life, and should feel ourselves fortunate to possess Contentment.

With the means of subsistence, and contentment, man possesses all that is necessary for him: it is our wants, only, and those often vicious, that make us unhappy. It is said of SOCRATES, that after he had worked through the great market of Athens, he exclaimed: "How many wants the people have that I do not experience." "A happy disposition, says the author of Night-mare Abbey, finds materials of enjoyment every where. In the city, in the country, in society, or in solitude—in the theatre, or in the forest—in the hum of the multitude, or in the silence of the mountains, are alike materials of reflection and elements of pleasure. It is one mode of pleasure to listen to the music of Don Giovanni, in the theatre, glittering with light and crowded with elegance and beauty: it is another to glide at sunset over the bosom of the lonely lake, where no sound disturbs the silence but the motion of the boat through the waters. A happy disposition derives pleasure from both, a discontented, from neither; but is always busy in detecting deficiencies, and finding dissatisfaction with companions. The one gathers all the flowers, the other all the nettles, in its path. The one has the faculty of enjoying every thing, the other of enjoying nothing. The one realizes all the pleasures of the present good; the other converts it into pain by pining after something better, which is only because it is not present, and which if it were present, would not be enjoyed. These morbid spirits are in life what professed critics are in literature: they see nothing but faults, because they are determined to shut their eyes to beauties. The critic does his utmost to blight genius in its infancy: that which rises in spite of him he will not see; and then he complains of the decline of literature. In like manner, these cankers of society complain of human nature and society, when they have wilfully debased themselves from all the good they contain, and done their utmost to blight their own happiness, and that of all around them. Misanthropy is sometimes the product of disappointed benevolence; but is more frequently the offspring of mortified vanity, quarrelling with the world for not being better treated than it deserves." In truth, the great secret of happiness consists in learning, whatever be our inevitable condition, therewith to be content. To moderate our desires is wisdom, and wisdom in this sense, is happiness; it is their excess, only, that makes us unhappy.—This idea is happily enforced by the sublime YOUNG:—

"What makes man wretched? Happiness deny'd?
Lorenzo! no: 'tis happiness disdain'd.
She comes too meanly dress'd to win our smile;
And calls herself content, a homely name!
Our flame is transport, and content our scorn.
Ambition turns, and shuts the door against her,
And weds a toil, a tempest, in her stead."

If we could trace madness to its source we should surely find that it originated in the power of one single thought, which excluded all mental variety.

DEATHS.

Suddenly, at Taberg, Oneida, Co., on Sunday the 5th inst. Miss SALLY FISH, daughter of Walter Fish, Esq., late of Herkimer county, in the 35th year of her age.

The circumstances of her death are truly afflicting; having felt slightly indisposed in the morning she had taken a portion of salts, which immediately produced the most excruciating pain. Medical aid was immediately called, and every assistance possible rendered, but it was all too late. Death had fixed his seal upon her and in six hours she was a lifeless corpse.

It is worthy of remark that notwithstanding the awful brevity of the summons, she met the King of Terrors with a Christian fortitude and resignation. Cut off as she was in the full tide of her usefulness, and the active practice of her virtues, the society in which she lived feel sensibly her loss, but to her more immediate friends and relatives, it is irreparable—I had almost said irreconcilable; but they must nevertheless, in view of her character, feel great consolation in the reflection that she now reaps the reward of a well spent life.

It is believed there was some deadly poison unknowingly mixed with the salts.—Com.

In New-Hartford, on the 9th inst., Mrs. SUSAN NORTON, wife of Mr. Hart Norton, in the 49th year of her age. Several years ago she disavowed the creed which had been taught her in early life, and embraced that doctrine which gladdens the heart and teaches the deliverance of all from the bondage of corruption. Her husband, who could not attend the funeral in consequence of bodily infirmity, must feel himself bereaved, indeed, and will justly mourn the death of an amiable companion. Her memory will also be blessed by a large circle of relatives and friends who knew and appreciated her virtues.

J. WHITNEY.

SHOCKING DEATH.—Sylvanus Waters, Esq., of North Norwich, was instantly killed in a grist mill, in Greene, on Friday last. While engaged in doing something near two heavy iron cog wheels, his clothes were caught, and he was instantaneously forced between them in such a manner as to cut his body nearly in two. We are informed that his bowels gushed out, and his heart was exposed to view! One scream, or a part of a scream, was heard, and all was over!

Mr. Waters was a man highly respected by those who knew him. He had held the office of Justice of the Peace in this town for several years, and resigned it but a few days since. He removed his family to Greene on Monday previous to the Friday of his death. His remains were taken to North Norwich for interment.

Chenango Telegraph, March 8.

Br. Waters was an active and consistent Universalist. May the faith he adorned in life comfort his afflicted family and numerous friends in their bereavement.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER IX.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

LETTER-WRITING.

Although this subject may be viewed by some, as of little importance, yet it should by no means be overlooked by the young. There are few youth of either sex, who will not find it necessary to correspond with relatives and friends, and often with strangers. And few there are, who do not desire to have their letters appear well in the sight of those to whom they are addressed.

The first requisite in letter-writing, is care in the penmanship. It should be your effort to have your writing plain and distinct. It is true, the penmanship of all can not possess the same elegance and finish; but all can and should exert themselves to have their letters as legible and neat as possible—free from blots, and with as little interlining as may be. You should also endeavor to punctuate your composition properly and distinctly. It is no small labor to peruse a letter without stop or point of any kind. In such cases, it is difficult to obtain the meaning of the writer, and ludicrous, and sometimes fatal mistakes, are in this manner occasioned. The necessity of both spelling and punctuating correctly, is exemplified in the old and familiar anecdote, of the note handed to the minister, in some town on the sea-board. It read as follows: "A man going to see his wife, desires the prayers of the congregation." When read as thus written, it was perfectly ridiculous. But by changing the word see to sea, and removing the comma from after the word wife to the word sea, the meaning of the writer is expressed as follows: "A man going to sea, his wife desires the prayers of the congregation."

Great caution should be exercised in regard to the contents of letters. Let it be remembered that letters are often preserved a great length of time, and frequently come into hands of whom the writers little thought, while penning them. Injudicious letters are liable, through accident or other causes, to stray into the possession of those who will wield them greatly to your disadvantage. Many individuals would give half their wealth, to recall letters hastily written, or to blot out sentences incautiously inserted. "We ought not to write any thing of which we may hereafter feel ashamed. Well written letters are as often burnt or destroyed, as slovenly or indiscreet epistles are, by accident or design, preserved, to rise up in judgment against us hereafter.*" An instance in point lately occurred. At the decease of the celebrated Aaron Burr, among his papers were found letters received in former years, which, had they been made public, would have ruined the characters of many individuals moving in the highest circles. Exercise your judgment upon this subject. Write nothing to the most intimate friend that would cause you to blush or feel degraded, were it read by strangers. I desire not that you should circumscribe the free and frank expression of thought, but would rather commend it. Write to your correspondents as you would converse with them, had you the opportunity—but as you would converse with them in the presence of others.

If possible avoid writing disparagingly of the character of any. Inadvertencies in this respect, are the frequent causes of difficulty and contention. Sentences of this nature often find their way to ears for which they were least designed.

* Young Ladies' Own Book.

If it becomes necessary to state your opinion of the character of any individual, communicate your sentiments in a frank, yet kind manner—write nothing as truth, that you do not know to be true—avoid deleterious insinuations—in fine, write as you would, were you addressing the person in reference to whose character you are making your statements.

Avoid in your letters, all expressions of anger—all profane or vulgar language—all indelicate words and allusions. Write with the same restrictions under which you would speak were the person present whom you address—bearing in mind, that when your letters are perused by strangers, they will form an estimate of your character and manners, from the nature and style of their contents.

In your correspondence, you should keep in view your own station and circumstances, and the rank and condition of the individual whom you address. In writing to relatives and intimate friends, you should express yourself in a different manner than when addressing a stranger. In the former case, you should be warm, affectionate and familiar—in the latter, more reserved, yet respectful, candid and concise.

Regularity in correspondence, should be observed. Many are very negligent in this respect—putting off writing from day to day and week to week. This is an unnecessary habit, arising solely from sheer indolence, and often causing much disappointment and inquietude. Write promptly, at the proper time, without any unnecessary delay. Youth who are absent from home should be punctual in this respect. As children leave the abode of their infancy, the sun-light of their parents' joys, waxes dim and more dim—as stars, the cherished objects of love vanish one by one from the family galaxy, leaving darkness and gloom behind. While, in mixing with the busy multitude, and engaging in the exciting avocations and amusements of active life, the hours pass lightly over your heads, you should remember that to your parents, in consequence of your absence, time drags with leaden step; and that nothing so cheers their aged hearts, as letters from the absent and loved ones. The young, therefore, should often think of their home, of their venerable parents, and the peculiarities of their situation. Often should you despatch letters laden with love and filial affection, and kind expressions of regard, to light up the evening of their days, with smiles of joy. Oh! how highly are those written messengers prized by the father and the mother! Anxiously do they await them, and eagerly do they devour their contents. They are as angel's visits, diffusing consolation and peace. The melancholy caused by separation, is felt much more sensibly by those who remain at home, than by those who go out into the world.

Be cautious in giving letters of recommendation, that the individual whom you would benefit, actually possesses the qualifications you enumerate. If you deceive in this respect, it will injure your integrity, and detract from your influence. Give no such letters, except in cases where you feel perfectly assured of the worth of those who bear your testimonials.

Never be guilty of circulating anonymous letters, or of assuming false signatures.* These are

* The reader will understand that I do not allude to fictitious signatures in writing for the public prints, where they are often properly assumed. But even in this respect they are sometimes resorted to for the basest purposes. As a general rule, it is better in writing for the public, to use at least the initials of your name.

low, base practices, utterly beneath the lady or gentleman. They should be heartily reprobated and despised. If you desire to give advice or to warn of danger, or to make any communication to an individual, do it under your own proper signature, with all frankness and candor. If you can not proceed in this open, manly manner, refrain entirely from all interference. The motives of anonymous writers are ever suspected—they are almost invariably detected and exposed, and do not fail to meet that public execration and disgust which they too frequently richly merit.

BELIEF AND UNBELIEF.

EXTRACTS FROM A SERMON,

BY REV. W. S. BALCH.

"Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen," or, more properly rendered, "faith is the confidence in things hoped for, the conviction of things unseen." It embraces facts which exist independently of our assent to their truth, and prior to it, and which are facts, even though we have no confidence in them.

Our belief in a thing will not create it, or make it true, if it did not exist, and was not true before we exercised a belief in it. If it would, the most monstrous notions ever engendered in the human brain, would be true; and witches, ghosts, demons, and false gods would now exist as truly as the only living and true God.

On the other hand, if the fact does not verily exist, our disbelief can not destroy it, or affect its existence at all. If we should assent to the thing proposed for belief, which had no being prior to our exercising faith, then we should believe a lie.

Truth is immutable. It can not be created nor destroyed. That which is true to-day was eternally so with Deity; for all things are present to him, and that which is false was eternally so, and can never become true. Though belief may not create truth, it will nevertheless, bring us into the enjoyment of it; and though disbelief can not destroy it, yet it will deprive us of the freedom and joy it imparts.

To illustrate.—The earth was a sphere and turned on its own axis every twenty-four hours, and annually rolled round the sun in its orbit; and all this, with as much precision and regularity, before Copernicus as Galileo believed and taught it, as it has ever done since. And the darkness and error—the unbelief of all former ages, the decision of the church, and anathema of the pope, could never block its wheels or prevent it from trundling along with tremendous velocity and astonishing precision, in its diurnal and annual revolutions. The planet Herschel existed as truly, shone with as much splendor, possessed as great magnitude, and performed its revolutions with as much regularity, before the birth of the distinguished astronomer whose name it bears, as it has ever done since. The lightnings played as vividly, and the thunders roared as loudly through the heavens, before our own honored Franklin had investigated the subject of electricity, and learned to play with the lightning at his pleasure, as they have ever done since. The principles of phrenology did as truly exist, and the material organs of the mind, constituting the brain, were as directly employed to manifest the immaterial mind before a Gall, Spurzheim or Combe had scientifically investigated the subject, as since that time. The laws of magnetism and cristallization—the truths of Geology so recently brought to light—and in short the whole principles which pervade all physical nature, as really exist and as powerfully operate without our knowledge, as with it. But the knowledge of these truths, in themselves immutable, and a due observance of the laws by which they are regulated, may be made conducive to human happiness.

So in moral and religious things. Jehovah reigned as supreme, the righteous Governor among the nations, riding upon the whirlwind and the storm, and doing his will and pleasure in heaven and on earth, as truly, as since his moral and glorious representative, our Lord Jesus Christ, was born into the world. The covenant of his grace, the plan and extent of his salvation, through a crucified Redeemer, was as broad, deep and certain before the Gospel of glad tidings was preached by the angel from heaven to the shepherds in Jewry, as since their chorus was sung on that occasion; for from the beginning the end was disclosed, and the Lamb of God was slain from the foundation of the world. But by the knowledge of these things, and a life of conformity to them, only, can we be benefited.

Man's faith or unbelief has nothing to do with the eternal truth of Heaven. That was as fixed and immutable as the pillars of God's throne, and as true as the oath of Him that can not lie, could make it, ere we believed it or were created. Jesus Christ "came to bear witness to this truth," not to create it. He is the way, and the truth and the life: and all who believe the record he has exhibited in his Gospel, find salvation, and the enjoyments of his blessings produces the witness in ourselves.

Jesus Christ came to the earth with the message of truth from the Father, that he "is the Saviour of the world"—that he "shall be for salvation to the ends of the earth"—that God "has given us eternal life in him" and that he "shall give it to as many as God has given him." Hence he that hath the Son hath life—and he that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life—and "he that believeth not the Son shall not see life," so long as he continues to disbelieve the record of truth, that God has given him eternal life, for by so doing he makes God a liar. See 1 John v: 10, 11.

But if it be true, as the wisdom of this world has told us, that God has given eternal life to those, only, who do believe, then if those who do not believe, should believe, they would make him a liar, and so the beloved disciple would be proved in the wrong in what he has said. On the ground assumed by him, the question arises, How can the unbeliever make God a liar? He has never given the unbeliever eternal life, says the popular creed; and unbelievers do not believe he has? How, then, have they made God a liar? But if he has given them eternal life, and this life is in his Son, then when they disbelieve this fact, it is easy to perceive they make him a liar, for they believe not the record he has given of his Son.

In conclusion. Belief brings us into the enjoyment of the promised blessings. We partake, by anticipation, and with the fullest assurance, of a richer, and purer, and holier joy to succeed the dissolution of all terrestrial things, and the resurrection of the pure, immortal, immaterial part in the fold of God, in the society of the blessed.

Oh God, help thou our unbelief!

THE CHANGE.

BY MRS. SARAH BROUGHTON.

A form of youthful loveliness sat in a Summer bower, engaged in reading—her mind so absorbed in the subject, that she did not notice the approaching storm, until the deafening roar of Heaven's artillery awoke the startling echoes of the caverned cliff. Why flashed the eye with terror? Why fled the rose-tint from her beautiful cheek? Alas, false teachers had inspired her gentle heart with fear; and when, in grandeur and sublime glory, the Lord went forth in his cloudy chariot—while the vast sky seemed bending with his tread—was terror blanched her brow and dimmed her eye! Death was to her the king of terrors, because he would usher her into the presence of a being she dreaded. And while the tempest gamboled through the sky, she knelt in anguish; fearful that the winged lightnings might launch her trembling spirit upon the untried ocean of eternity.

Again she sat in the bower, amid the fading flowers of Autumn—herself a fairer flower—pale, and hastening to the grave. Consumption's caukering touch had fretted the life-strings of her heart, but heavenly confidence sat upon her brow. Again the heralds of the coming tempest pealed the furious blast, and black as night, the storm-cloud reared its frowning crest. The rain in torrents drenched the verdant plain—the lightnings chain, from cloud to cloud, darted along the gloomy West—the thunder's peal was long and loud, and the reeling earth reverberated with the shock; yet her eye was calm. With deep and fervid devotion she bowed before that God who holds the angry storm in his grasp. She had learned to love, instead of fearing the Father of her spirit; because she had seen that his character was altogether lovely. New and beautiful scenes had opened to her view in the works of Providence. Each voice of nature spake of the wisdom, and the majesty, and the might of him who rules the countless legions of worlds, and wields the destinies of a universe. And in his revealed Word she read of his boundless love; and in Jesus, the glory of the great Eternal shone forth in the rich provision of grace for his sinful children. She no longer dreaded the angel of death; whether he came on rosy pinions of light, bearing the worn spirit from scenes of sorrowing affliction—or whether he came arrayed in the blackening fury of the storm. She was content to go at her Father's bidding. In darkest shades of ill, the star of Bethlehem beamed with brightening radiance. Thunders might roll, but amid the din she heard the still small voice of love, that thrilled along the rocks of Horeb, when Elijah mantled his face.

Sons and daughters of humanity—listen to this blessed voice, and follow the guidings of this resplendent star; then shall you walk calmly through this vale of tears, until you gain the regions of immortal glory, through him who burst asunder the two-leaved gates of the tomb.

HABIT.

BY REV. J. BARBER.

All that is necessary to make us love, business is, in the first place, to acquire business habits—"Habit is every thing," as the clown said of attitude. And although what we have said may appear simple, yet it teaches the young especially, an invaluable lesson. It tells us to form such habits in early life, as we wish to possess in more mature years. Does my young friend wish to pursue study? If so, youth is the time to acquire the habit—let it be ever so irksome now, it will in time become agreeable and pleasant. When a habit of study is once formed, you will feel uneasy without study.

Do you wish to labor at some particular occupation—do you wish to be a man of business? Now is the time to acquire a business habit.

"Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined."

"Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." Do you wish to acquire habits of industry, temperance and frugality? Ah, youth is the season. Pursue such a course for a short period, and it will soon become pleasant. Do you wish to live a life of indolence and consequent ignorance? To live a life which will benefit no one? Now is the time to form the habit. Spend ten years in idleness, and mischief, and, to return to the figure of Pope, the tree will bend in the same direction through life. Do you wish to be a drunkard, a gambler, a liar, a busy body in every one's business but your own—a spendthrift, a meddlesome braggadocio? Now, young man, is the time to acquire the habit.

Go about it in youth, and you will be cursed with it and all its consequences in old age.

A man may be almost any thing he undertakes to be, if he begins in season—in early life—and resolves to persevere. But if he does not determine upon a wise course in early life, he runs the risk of being "nobody" in the latter part of his earthly pilgrimage. It is the virtuously industrious man who benefits himself and society. Were there no such men among us, we should soon dwindle to a state worse than Algerine barbarism. Bodily exercise of some kind promotes health, makes food relish, sleep sweet, the body strong, it gives contentment to the mind, and benefits society at large. Why, then, should a man be an idler? Where is the advantage? What does he gain by it? Does it promote happiness? Does it give strength? Does it keep a man from growing old? Does it make him wise, learned or honorable? Does it give vigor to the constitution? Does it bring wealth, or raise him in the estimation of the virtuous? All these questions must be answered in the negative. What, then, I ask, does a man gain by being an idler, even if he has what is denominated an independent fortune? The answer is NOTHING. He gains nothing and loses much. He is a pest to society—an excrescence of no use—like a wen or a wart on the physical system, nearly destitute of proper feeling, but very much in the way! Then, let all—especially the young—be up and doing—form habits of usefulness and virtue, and rely upon it, they will be habits productive of peace and enjoyment.

ADAM'S TRANSGRESSION, NOT THE CAUSE OF NATURAL DEATH.

It is truly astonishing many times to see to what an extent of absurdity the force of prejudice will carry persons. The attachment to early education and creeds of men will many times cause individuals to act the basest hypocrisy, and tell the most unqualified falsehoods. Yea, among persons whose belief, or at least professed belief is, that the liar shall in nowise enter the kingdom of heaven, will many times, in order to uphold their particular sentiments, or religious belief, tell the boldest open falsehoods, and thus assume the very character they so willingly and anxiously exclude from heaven. To prove the truth of this, we need but call to mind many, and very many instances familiar to us all, of Partialists denying the most plain, self-evident propositions when addressed to them for their assent, if they see they militate against their favorite theories. We know by experience, they will deny things contrary to every dictate of their consciences, and every assent of their hearts and judgments. Propositions in logic, which they accede to on every other occasion, they will unqualifiedly deny when brought to bear against their religious creeds. For a man to deny that which his mind gives assent to, is to act the hypocrite and liar; for his heart speaks one language, and his tongue another. And it is this long schooled evil, that is, declaring and defending things contrary to the assents and convictions of the honest heart, that has kept alive the doctrine of infinite punishments to curse these late generations. Let men read—search for truth; and, as they advance in knowledge, allow their hearts to give assent to the convictions of truth, and their tongues give utterance agreeably with those convictions; and the creeds of men and systems of endless punishments, will soon be heard no more from the pulpit, but take their appropriate places beside and with the tales of romance, and only show how men have once been enslaved in cruel error. But to my purpose.

It is a very general belief among all classes of believers of the doctrine of endless punishments, that death—death of the body—or, as we usually call it, natural death was brought into the world by reason of Adam's transgression in the garden of Eden.

It would hardly seem possible that rational man could be made to believe that one man,

Adam, could, by possibility have effected so effectual a revolution in the whole system of God's original plan, as is very generally admitted was effected by simply partaking of the forbidden fruit. This one transgression, according to modern theology, changed that which was immortal into mortality—gave origin to the necessity of a triune God—gave origin to a justice in a Father of love, which led him to sacrifice his own beloved, immortal and only Son, to avenge the wrong a man had done—gave origin to a cause requiring God himself to die; yea, that very God in whom all living spirits live, move, and have their being—doomed souls to endless punishments to which they were before not obnoxious, etc., etc.

When it is admitted that God is the author of all things, infinite in power, wisdom and goodness, does all things after his own will, and is without shadow of turning, it is astonishing that the human mind in those days of reading, research and light, should give countenance to such egregious errors.

I will merely see if I can not expose the error, that natural death was brought into the world by reason of Adam's transgression, in so plain a light that no man, though a fool, "can err therein."

By reference to Gen. i: 27, 28, the following instructions will be found:—

"So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said unto them: Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it, and have dominion over the fish of the sea," etc.

It will be borne in mind that this commandment of God to Adam and Eve was before their transgression, and that they were told to MULTIPLY and REPLENISH the earth. How long were they to multiply? It does not say, neither is it limited. The earth was to be replenished, and we will not do violence to common sense to say otherwise, than that the order of generations was established as now existing in the world.

It is estimated and shown by mathematical demonstrations, that had no human beings ever died since the time of the Mosaic origin of man, the whole surface of the globe would now be covered three deep with human bodies standing one upon the other.

Now, if man was created, placed upon the earth and commanded to multiply, and there was to be no natural death, or death of the body, what a deplorable situation would the present age be in. Pharisee and sinner would come in very close contact.

Such a state of things could not exist. The body must be nourished by food from the earth; but how could this be done when the present age had arrived, and the whole surface of the earth should be covered three deep with human beings? A scarcity of food ere this must have been experienced, and man made to have eaten his fellow-man, and yet not cause the death of him thus eaten. Will it be said he was not to live on food from the earth before his transgression? It will be seen that he was to subdue the earth, and before his transgression God said to Adam and Eve, Gen. i: 29, "Behold I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for MEAT." Chapter ii: verse 9, we find that "out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree, that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food," etc., and in verse 16, we are further told that "the Lord commanded the man, saying, of every tree of the garden thou mayest FREELY EAT." This was all before transgression; hence it was in the original plan of God that man should have food springing from the earth, and should go forth and multiply, etc.

That this order of things could exist—that is, that man should receive food from the earth, and continually add to his species by perpetual process of multiplication, without any change being effected by death of the body; or some other alternative, is beyond the possibility of conception, or any allowance of consent of a rational being. And it will be seen also that birds, fishes, etc., etc., were to multiply also. A strange medley, were there never to be a death of the body.

So that it was necessary that the Deity should stamp mortality upon man, as it was that he should create him flesh and blood to be nourished from the trees and seeds of the earth, and to multiply; and the idea that natural death was brought into the world by Adam's transgression can have no apology for its existence, unless it be said it was thus brought in to perfect the plans of God, then imperfect by reason of man being immortal yet left to multiply in perpetual progression; which can hardly be admitted.

Were men to be translated bodily to heaven? We are told that "flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of heaven"; beside, flesh, blood and bones are but cumbersome appurtenances to accompany the soul in the world of spirits.

Alas, alas! how wonderfully prone to abandon reason, the lamp of life, many are! what a prostitution of the exalted gift of God, reason, do we witness in sacrificing it to the support of dogmas, outrageous to every thing rational and consistent, noble and good!

Upon reading the above and examining the Scriptures, I hope some may be disposed to abandon the error that natural death was introduced into the world by Adam's transgression, and attribute to God all praise of establishing his own plans and provisions.

VERITAS.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

Munnsville, February 5, 1837.

Br. GROSH—The following letter was written to Rev. Pindar Field, Pastor of the Presbyterian church in Cassety Hollow, but then chief manager of a protracted meeting, going off in this place. For reasons best known to himself, he has seen fit to observe a "dignified silence." How easy it is for modern reformers to build of "hay, wood and stubble," by wholesale assertions! But when called upon to "give a reason," they are "speechless"! As it may not be entirely uninteresting to the readers of the Magazine, by particular request, I submit the letter for publication. W. MARTIN.

LETTER OF INQUIRY.

TO REV. PINDAR FIELD.

Munnsville, January 14, 1837.

DEAR SIR—As you have solicited conversation with all those who feel disposed to converse upon the subject of religion, and feeling equally interested in common with others, in the great truths which pertain to our eternal destinies, I have concluded to offer for your consideration, a few queries which suggested themselves to my mind last evening, while listening to a discourse delivered by yourself, from Rev. vi: 17—"For the great day of his wrath is come, and who shall be able to stand?" Lest I might be considered an "intruder" in presenting myself in the "inquiring room," I have thought best to present my inquiries in the form of a letter.

In discoursing upon the words above cited, you attempted to establish the doctrine of a general judgment at the end of time, in the which all intelligences will be "brought to trial," and be judged according to the merit or demerit of their respective characters in this life. But as if well aware that the text which you had selected as the foundation of your discourse, was insufficient of itself for the basis of your fabric, you very wisely proceeded to prop it up, by the help of two other passages, which you deemed more to the purpose. You first brought forward the words of Paul, "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body." Next, you adduced John v: 28, 29—"Marvel not at this, for the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and come forth; they that have done good, to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation." You then proceeded to show the propriety and the certainty of the judgment.

Now to me it appears clear, that not only your text needed the help of props, but that even your props also need propping to make them at all serviceable. But I may be wrong; if so, I shall esteem it a great favor to be corrected. I will inquire, in the first place, how you will reconcile your application of your text with the language of the context? The third verse preceding the text, reads as follows: "And the heavens departed as a scroll when it is rolled together, and every mountain and island were moved out of their places." Now, if by this we are to understand the dissolution of the material heaven and earth, as you suppose, why is it said in the next verse, that "the kings of the earth, and the great men," etc. "hid themselves in the dens and rocks of the mountains?" Will there be "dens, rocks and mountains" in which men can hide themselves, after the literal heaven and earth are destroyed? Again, it is said that "every bondman and every freeman hid themselves," etc. Now, certainly, "every bondman and every freeman" must mean all intelligences, both good and bad; for it is difficult to conceive of an intelligent being who is not either a "bondman" or a "freeman." And if the text is to be understood as representing the final conflagration of the whole world, then every intelligent creature in the universe is represented as "saying to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb." Now if those who are represented as calling for rocks and mountains to fall on them, are to be doomed to remediless woe, as you contend, I would ask, in the name of reason and common sense, "Who, then, can be saved"? What say you to this? Am I right?—if not, wherein is my reasoning defective?

Again. It appears to me preposterous in the extreme to apply the text under consideration, to things yet to take place in eternity, from the fact, that the writer himself has assured us, in language too plain to be misunderstood, that the visions which he saw "must shortly come to pass." Says he, "seal not the words of the prophecy of this book, for the time is at hand." In no less than seven or eight different places in the book of Revelation the same language occurs. See i: 1-3; iii: 11; and xxii: 7, 10, 12, and 20. Now, what is the meaning of all this? Did John mean as he said; or did he mean to deceive his readers, by telling them that the things of which he wrote, "must shortly come to pass," when, in truth he knew he was writing of things to take place in the future ages of eternity? What say you to this?

The next passage in order, to which I would invite your attention, is the words of Paul, which formed the second part of your triune text. "For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ," etc. This text, you seemed to think, was an "all-absorbing" argument in favor of a future judgment. Perhaps it is so. But according to my limited capacity of understanding, the text, instead of favoring your notion of a future judgment, it furnishes one of the strongest arguments against you. Leaving out the supply word "done" which you will perceive makes no part of the original text, but which alters its complexion materially, the text will read thus:—"For we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things in body, according to that he hath done," etc. Thus you see, that instead of favoring your notion of a future judgment, the text says that all are to receive their punishment in body, which can not be, admitting the common notion of a future judgment to be true. Am I right in this? What say you?

Next in order, comes the third and last part of your text—"Marvel not at this," etc. This you deemed one of your strongest pillars. But it does appear to me, that when "weighed in the balance" of your creed, it will be "found wanting." Let us compare the text with the context, and see if it must necessarily imply a literal resurrection of the dead; or if, indeed, it can possibly be construed to favor your argument, without doing violence to the text. The third verse preceding the text, reads as follows—"Verily I say unto you, the hour is coming and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live." Here, then, you will perceive that the resurrection spoken of in the text, had already commenced at the time when the words were spoken. Who were those "dead" who "heard the voice of the Son of God and lived"? Were they the literally dead? or were they morally "dead in trespasses and sins"? Next come in the words of the text: "Marvel not at this, for the hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and come forth; they that have done good, to the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation." Here you will perceive that reference is had to the 12th chapter of Daniel. "And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as there never was since there was a nation, even to that time. And at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth, shall awake; some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt.—And from the time that the daily sacrifice shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate be set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days." This, I think, is the "abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet," mentioned by our Lord to his disciples, and which he himself applied to the then impending ruin of Jerusalem. See Matt. xxiv: 15, 16. "When ye shall see the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place, (whoso readeth, let him understand)"—(very good caution, "whereunto we should do well to take heed")—"then let him which is in Judea flee into the mountains." Now, of what use, I ask, would it be to "flee into the mountains" at the final dissolution of the earth? Just about as much as it would have been to have sought refuge in the mountains at the time of the deluge! I think it can not be denied, with the least shadow of reason, that our Lord was here speaking of the destruction of Jerusalem; and if so, then the passage in the 5th of John, under consideration, and the parallel passage in Daniel, above cited, which you admit refer to the same events, must both refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, and consequently have long since had their fulfilment. For if both refer to the same events, and one has already taken place, (which has been proved from the highest authority,) the other, of course, must have taken place also. This, I think, is as plain as that two and two make four. Am I right, Mr. Field? What say you?

I will now proceed to notice some of your proof texts. You adduced the parable of the sheep and goats as a case in point, and proceeded to apply it as in the cases before mentioned, to "the last judgment." But to me it appears evident, that the parable of the sheep and goats, taken in connexion with the context, is at least quite foreign to your purpose, not to say a complete refutation of your doctrine. But to the text. See Matt. xxv: 31 to end. "When the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats," etc. Now, you will please to notice, first, that all this was to take place "When the Son of Man should come in his glory." And, secondly, you will please to notice that it was to be a national separation, and not a separation of "husband and wife, parents and children, friends and neighbors," etc., as you represented. "Before him shall be gathered all nations, and he shall separate them, (that is, those nations,) one from another, as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats." Now, by referring to the preceding chapter, we shall see, as I think, when the Son of Man did "come in his glory," and consequently, when the parable of the sheep and goats had its fulfilment. And here I would remark, by the way, that the division of the Bible into chapters and verses, as you are well aware, is a work of modern invention. The 24th and 25th chapters of Matt. were originally one unbroken discourse, and referred to the same events, as is proved by the connecting word, "Then"—xxv: 1. But to the context. "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken; and then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven;—and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. Now learn a parable of the fig tree; when his branch is yet tender and putteth forth leaves, ye know that Summer is high; so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, this generation shall not pass away, till all these things be fulfilled." All of what things? All the things of which he had been speaking, namely: "the end of the world," "the coming of the Son of Man," etc. And again he says to his disciples, as if to put the matter still further beyond mistake, if possible, as to the time when the Son of Man should come; "Verily I say unto you, there be some standing here that shall not taste of death, till they see the Son of Man coming in his kingdom." Here, then, we have it in terms as strong as language can possibly make it, that the Son of Man was to "come with his angels," "sit upon the throne of his glory," and execute judgment, and give to all according to their works, in that generation, and even in the lifetime of some who then stood by, listening to his discourse. And thus, you see, that the parable of the sheep and goats, when taken in connexion with the context, instead of affording evidence in favor of your supposed future judgment, turns out quite to your disadvantage. For whatever may be the true application of the parable, this one point, I think, is settled; namely, that it has long since had its fulfilment, in every particular; unless, indeed, it can be shown that the then present generation has not yet "passed away," and that some of our Lord's immediate disciples are yet alive, having lived to the very advanced age of eighteen hundred years!—which none, I trust, will pretend. What say you to this? Am I right?—if not, wherein am I wrong?

Again. You quoted Rev. xxii: 11—"He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still"—and applied it, as before, to "the last judgment." But why did you not read the next verse? "And behold I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give every man according as his work shall be." I repeat the question, why did you not read the next verse? Was it because you was well aware that this text was a complete refutation of your doctrine of a far off judgment? or why was it?

Again. You quoted Rev. 14th chapter, and a part of the 11th verse—"And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever," and applied it to your future world of wo. But why, I ask again, did you not quote the whole verse?—"And they have no rest day nor night," etc. Was it because you was well aware that they have no such thing as "day and night" in the future world? or why was it that you was so careful to omit the latter clause of the text? What say you to this?

I will now briefly give you my views, more fully, of the judgment, and adduce such Scripture testimony as I think corroborates them.

I by no means deny or disbelieve in the judgment. I believe in it—I hold to it, in all the strictness of the letter. And I even go farther, perhaps, than you do. I believe in many judgment days. I believe that to every individual and to every transgression, there is a judgment day—a day of retribution—in which all do and will receive according to their works. Whenever a nation or an individual, pursues a course in opposition to the moral laws of rectitude, the punishment imposed or inflicted, (be that punishment what it may,) is what I believe to be "the day of judgment" to that nation, or that individual. Instance the judgment of Sodom and Gomorrah. The day in which they were swept from the earth for their wickedness, by the awful judgments of God, was to them emphatically "the judgment of the great day"—a day, of all others, the most important. So with regard to the Jewish nation. God had "appointed a day" in which he would judge that people—a day in which should "come upon them all the righteous blood shed upon the earth since the days of Abel." And this, I think, is the "great day" to which such frequent reference is had in the New Testament; and to which the passages already considered, have allusion. It is called, "the judgment of this world," "the end of the world" "the coming of the Son of Man," etc., all of which, I think, refer to the same events; namely, the end of the Jewish world or dispensation, and the establishment of the Gospel kingdom. And no where do I find it said or intimated, in Scripture, that this judgment day was to take place in another world. But it is uniformly spoken of as a period near at hand, and to take place in that generation. Peter speaks of some "whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not." And Paul says "The time has come that judgment must begin at the house of God." And that this judgment day had already commenced at the time of our Lord's advent, will, I think, appear further from his own words. He says, John xii: 31, "Now is the judgment of this world." And again, in explaining to his disciples the parable of the wheat and tares, he says "The field is the world, the reapers are the angels, and the harvest is the end of the world." Well, when was this harvest to take place? You probably will say at "the last judgment." But what saith the testimony? what says the Saviour upon the subject? Hear him: John iv: 35, "Say ye not there are four months, and then cometh the harvest? Behold, I say unto you, lift up your eyes and look on the fields; for they are white, already, to harvest; and he that reapeth, receiveth wages and gathereth fruit unto eternal life; that he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together." And again, Paul says, 1 Cor. x: 11, "Now all these things happened to them for examples, and are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come." From this it appears that the end of the world had already come upon that generation. Again, Heb. ix: 26, he says, speaking of Christ, "Now once in the end of the world hath he appeared, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself." And again, Christ says, he "came into this world for judgment." But how, I ask, can that be, if the judgment is to be in another world? Paul says, "He that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption." But how can that be, if he is to be tried and punished in another world, thousands of years after the flesh has mouldered to its native dust?—But I must bring my remarks to a close, as I have already written more than I had designed in the commencement.

Such are a few of the most important barriers to my conversion to your system of faith. And now, if I am wrong, and you are right, I am ready and willing to be convinced; and when convinced, I am willing to renounce my errors, and embrace the truth. But nothing short of "the law and the testimony" will do. I can not place that credit in the bare unsupported assertions of an uninspired man, that I feel bound to place to the word of God.

Shall I be permitted to hope for an answer to these inquiries? I would choose an answer by letter, but if you prefer to answer me from the desk, please to inform me of the time when you will do so, and I will attend. There are many others in this vicinity, in the same situation with myself, and who, no doubt, would be highly gratified to hear from you, concerning this matter. But I speak only for myself. If you should be silent upon the subject, I shall, of course, take one of two things for granted; either, first, that you do not consider my soul to be equally "precious" with others; or, secondly, that you are sensible of the untenableness of your arguments.

Be assured, Sir, that I am a sincere inquirer after truth; and though I have been a student of the Bible from my youth up, yet I esteem it a great privilege to "Put myself to school

And feel some comfort not to be a fool."

Yours very respectfully, W. MARTIN.

From the Troy Whig

There has recently been formed in this city a Young Men's Universalist Institute, on a plan similar to those in Boston, New-York, Philadelphia, and other places. The objects of this society are according to the constitution, as follows—Article 1. "The objects of the society shall be moral and religious improvement; for this purpose lectures and essays will be delivered, and debates on moral and religious subjects be holden at stated periods." Article 11th provides that, "there shall be a library connected with the society consisting of moral and religious books for the use of the members, under due regulations." Article 12th is as follows—"Each member will endeavor to promote the peace and prosperity of the society, recognizing the great principles of the Gospel, 'liberty, holiness and love,' as the foundation of all their acts, and the governing principle of all their motives."

At a large and respectable meeting of the society on Monday evening, 6th instant, held in the basement of the church in Fifth-street, the following officers of the Institute were elected, viz.:

Abram Schryver, President;
Lyman Powers, Vice President;
George E. Baker, Secretary;
S. W. Britton, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS.

"THE DOCTRINE OF FUTURE PUNISHMENT."

A discourse by Aaron Perkins, Pastor of the First Baptist church at Hamilton." Utica; typography of Bennett and Bright. 1837. 19 pp. 8vo. Text—"Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." Mark ix: 48.

Such is the title of a sermon, of which two copies have been kindly furnished us by as many friends; and which, judging from the source whence it emanated—i. e., the village where is located the great Baptist Theological Seminary—and the reputed learning and talents of its author, may be fairly supposed to be the ablest defence of the doctrine of endless misery the limits and occasion could furnish. If so, our Baptist brethren in Hamilton, may well despair of supporting this item in their creed. The sermon contains not a single new argument in favor of that doctrine, nor one that has not been often refuted by Universalist writers, beyond the possibility of patching together its fragments.

The text itself he explains thus—taking care here, as in every instance where he repeats it, to strengthen its affirmation, by altering its language from "Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched," to "Where their worm shall never die, and their fire shall never be quenched." This, to say the least of it, is not a commendable practice in one who should not "handle the word of God deceitfully." But to his explanation of the text.

"In this, and the verses immediately connected, the things of time and those of eternity are placed in strong and most interesting contrast.

Here the two great classes, under which God has uniformly included the human family, are distinctly represented. They are such, in the one class, as will retain the hand, and the eye, though the whole body perish; or who choose to gratify their ambitious views, and sinful inclinations, at the expense of being doomed to endless perdition: while those of the other prefer the denying of ungodliness and worldly lusts, by cutting off the hand, and plucking out the eye, that they may be approved of God, and admitted, through the merits of his Son, to life everlasting.

The places which await the persons here introduced, where they shall meet their final destinies, are as clearly defined as are the characters themselves. The self-denying disciple, who holds out to the end in his cross-bearing career, shall enter into life: "and God shall wipe away all tears from his eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain, for the former things shall have passed away." The other place of departed spirits, the one distinctly referred to in our text, is HELL: a place so denominated in the 43d, 45th, and 47th, verses of the context, where it is rendered from gehenna, a word which occurs twelve times only in the New Testament, and in each instance is used in a sense which necessarily denotes future punishment.* Here, all who have cherished their sins, refused to repent, and fallen finally into death, laden with iniquities dark and multiplied, will be cast down by the Omnipotent arm, to dwell "Where their worm shall never die, and the fire shall never be quenched."—p. 4.

"We have one other passage—the words of our text—on which still further to remark. "Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched;" words describing the condition of persons cast into hell, as stated in the context. That the conscience is here intended by the living worm, is the general and more probable opinion; not, however, as seared, and silenced, and murdered, by a mad career of sin, but in its resurrection power—living, devouring, insatiate; ever and anon mingling its accusations with the wailing of the lost. * * *

This their worm shall never die; showing clearly that the life and being of souls in hell will be forever perpetuated; because should they cease to be the living victims, the instrument of their sufferings would no longer be their worm: and God has not only said it shall never die, but also that it shall remain their worm forever. "And the fire shall never be quenched." "A fire everlasting, prepared for the devil and his angels,"—a fire kindled on account of sin—the penalty due to sin—its flames continually fed and fanned by sin: it will burn to the lowest hell, and to the longest eternity; for "Their worm shall never die, and the fire shall never be quenched."—p. 16.

There are several assertions here made which need proof, but which, we fearlessly assert Mr. Perkins can not prove.

1. That "the things of time and those of eternity are placed in strong and most interesting contrast," in the text and context. That Gehenna (the Valley of Hinnom) is made an emblem of the awful calamities and miseries attending the destruction of Jerusalem, may be seen by referring to the 7th and 19th chapters of Jeremiah and the 66th chapter of Isaiah—but that it was ever made the emblem of a place of misery in a future state of being by any sacred writer, Dr. Campbell merely asserted, but did not attempt to prove—neither can it be proved. So much for this portion of the contrast. And that "life," "everlasting life," and "the kingdom of God," used in this and its parallel passages, are frequently used to denote the happiness of well-doing, the enjoyment of faith in the Gospel, and entrance into the Gospel dispensation by the enjoyment of "righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost," is evident, from a reference to Deut. xxx: 11–20; Ezek. xviii: 9, 17, 19, 20–32; Matt. xix: 16, compared with 17, and with 23, 24; Also, Mark x: 17–26; John iii: 36 ("hath everlasting life"); v: 24, and xvii: 3. "This is life eternal," etc. So much for the other portions of the contrast. Those who sacrificed what would cause them to offend, though as dear to them as hand, foot or eye, would enter into all the enjoyments of the Gospel—while those who clung to their possessions, in preference to Christ, must experience all the horrors of unbelief and reproaching consciences, and take their part in the miseries of the nation in its approaching terrible calamity. Other points might be noticed containing similar errors, but the following is the most important.

2. Mr. Perkins can not prove that "the worm" means the conscience, or that "the fire" will be in another state of being. It may burn to the "lowest hell," without being in the immortal state, (Ps. lxxxvi: 13, compared with Ps. cxvi: 3,)—but that it will burn either to the shortest, or "the longest (?) eternity," Mr. Perkins has offered no proof. On the contrary, by comparing Mark ix: 48, with the parallel passage in Matt. xviii: 7–10, he will see at once that the words of the text are added by way of explanation, by the evangelist. The reason given by Dr. Campbell is, that the term Valley of Hinnom would not be understood by those to whom Mark was writing, they not being acquainted with Jewish localities and customs. The explanatory words of Mark are taken verbatim from Isaiah lxvi: 24, "And they shall go forth [at the destruction of Jerusalem,] and look upon the carcases [not souls] of the men that have transgressed against me; for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh"—not spirits, or saints in immortality. This was to take place while there were Sabbaths and new moons—the scene is the Valley of Hinnom, even Gehenna, which lay near Jerusalem, (see Jer. xix: 2,) where a continual (or everlasting) fire was kept burning to destroy the filth of the city, and where the carcases of the slain Jews, to the number of about six hundred thousand were dragged, to fester in corruption—and the period when it was to occur, was after the creation of the new heavens and the new earth, (Isa. lxvi: 22,) or the establishment of the Gospel dispensation.

If Mr. Perkins can refute these views, which militate so much against those he has advanced, we hope he will attempt it—he will find in us willing examiners of his proofs, and candid receivers of them if they are sufficient.

The remainder of the sermon is of the same character—betrays a similar ignorance, and maintains a similar silence in regard to the real views and arguments of Universalists, and bases the doctrine of endless misery on passages not even apparently as much in its favor as is the text. Of course, there is nothing in it really deserving of our notice—nothing that any well informed layman of our order can not readily and triumphantly refute.

The order of the sermon is as follows:—1. An examination of the general doctrine. In this he quotes as proofs, Ps. ii: 12; John iii: 16; Mark xvi: 16; John iii: 5; Heb. xii: 14; Isaiah iii: 10, 11; Matt. vii: 13, 14; Rom. ii: 6–9; Gal. vi: 7, 8; proofs of a day of general judgment (!); Job xxxvi: 18; Ps. ix: 17; Prov. xiv: 32; Matt. xiii: 49, 50; the parable of the rich man and Lazarus; John v: 28, 29; 2 Peter iii: 7, and Rev. xx: 15. 2. Proofs that future punishment will be eternal. He quotes the case of Sodom and Gomorrah; of Judas; Dan. xii: 2; blasphemy against the Holy Ghost; 2 Thess. i: 7–9; Matt. xxv: 31–46, etc. We are credibly informed that one of the Professors of the Seminary, who was present, regretted that Mr. Perkins introduced the case of Judas as proof, as the passage principally relied on (Mark xiv: 21) is a mere Hebraism, to denote an earthly state of great misery, and very ambiguous withal, in the original, whether the words "had never been born," apply to Judas or to the Saviour. 3. Observations by way of inference. These are, that Universalism is a false doctrine—that it encourages sin and licentiousness—and that it is dangerous.

One extract more on the words forever, everlasting, etc., and we will close this notice.

"It is objected that the term everlasting is often used in the Bible in a limited sense; and therefore does not, as employed in this passage prove the eternal punishment of the wicked; and we are willing to admit that its sense is always limited, when used in relation to the things of time; but when thus applied, it invariably means the longest period through which the things or subjects mentioned are capable of existing. Thus, 'The everlasting hills and mountains,' are those which must remain until the earth shall be burnt up, when all its mountains and hills will be dissolved together. So, also, 'a servant forever,' is a servant for life—the longest period through which his servitude to a fellow-being can continue. But it is also true that everlasting, when applied to a future state, and the things of eternity, means the longest possible duration; and no instance can be found in the Scriptures to the contrary."

That this statement is not correct, we refer the reader to Jonah ii: 6—"the earth with her bars was about me forever." Here the duration was three days and three nights. Yet the earth still endures—Jonah lived long afterward, and we have no proof that the fish died at the end of that time. Again, the "servant forever," was not a servant even for life, if the year of Jubilee occurred before his death. See Lev. xxv: 28, 40, 41, 54. I have no doubt that many other instances might be found, had I leisure to search for them—but these are sufficient to overturn Mr. Perkin's arguments, and meet his assertions.

Thus, by especial request have I noticed this production—not that I conceived it merited any attention; but that the standing and talents of its author seemed to require some notice. It will be seen that even an able man may fail—greatly fail in supporting a bad cause. If I have committed any errors in my hasty remarks, or unintentionally mistated Mr. Perkin's arguments, our columns are open for their correction. We desire to know and to speak the truth, and nothing but the truth. Our "selfish feelings and depraved inclinations," (which language Mr. Perkins uses in assigning reasons why some believe Universalism,) never lead us to close our columns to respectful and well written articles from those who differ from us in opinion—we wish to read both sides, that we may judge fairly for ourselves. Can the Editors or proprietors of Partialist journals, especially of the Baptist Register, manifest their desire to know the truth, in the same manner? Will they open their columns to both sides of this subject, or to any misrepresentations of, or false charges against Universalism or Universalists? If they will, we are ready to teach them some truths they seem not yet to have learned; and to correct some misstatements they have published but never yet corrected. Yes—more—we are willing to enter into a friendly correspondence with Mr. Perkins, on the meaning of any text he has quoted in this sermon as proof of endless misery, to be published entire in the columns of that paper and this. What says the "selfish feelings and depraved inclinations" of our Baptist brethren, Clerical, Editorial and Typographical?

LETTER FROM BR. SKINNER.

Philadelphia, March 17, 1837.

Br. Grosz and Hutchinson—You will perceive by the above date, that I am now in the city of "Brotherly Love;" consequently have made but slow progress on my way South. I reached Albany about sunset, on the day I left Utica, and stopped for the night at the house of our long tried and faithful friend, Br. Stephen Van Schaack, 392 South Market-street, with whom and his amiable family I tarried till the next morning, at half past eight o'clock, when I took stage directly for New-York. I had the pleasure of seeing Br. I. D. Williamson and lady, with whom I spent part of the evening at the house of a friend. Br. W. has been a faithful laborer in the cause of truth in this city, for a number of years past; and the work of the Lord has prospered in his hands. He is now, however, on the eve of leaving the society and removing to Poughkeepsie, Dutchess county, where an infant society of believers has lately been formed, whose prospects are flattering for soon becoming a strong and numerous body, if they can be soon supplied with a preacher to break to them the bread of life. By thus establishing and upbuilding a new society, and somewhat relieving Br. W. in his arduous labors, much good to the cause may result from his removal. The society in Albany will, however, be left destitute by the event, or rather be compelled to find some other brother to minister to them in holy things. God grant that they may speedily find one who will go in and out before them, and feed them with knowledge and understanding.

On leaving Albany, we proceeded down the river upon the ice, as far as Hudson. There was in many places, and indeed for the most of the way, considerable water upon the ice, occasioned by the recent thaw; and the night having been pretty cold, this water had frozen over, so as to make it extremely bad for the horses to travel, their feet breaking through the new formed ice at every step. We stopped at Hudson, barely long enough to dine at the stage house, kept by Staats, where we were furnished with a most excellent dinner, to which the passengers generally, and myself in particular, did ample justice. We then proceeded on runners by land as far as Rhinebeck, then took wheels and proceeded to Poughkeepsie, the half way place from Albany to New-York, where we arrived about 11 o'clock, P. M.

The stage and the rest of the passengers proceeded on after tea, and were thus enabled to reach New-York on Saturday evening, which I had hoped to do when I left home. But such was the state of my health, my neck stiff, throat sore, cough troublesome, and withal, the night being very cold, I dared not venture to ride all night. Accordingly I stopped at the stage house till the next day, and had the privilege of waiting till the next evening, and so riding all night, or else hiring an extra or special conveyance to take me on at an extra extravagant price. I chose the latter. Now, what they call the regular stage fare from Albany to New-York, is only the moderate sum of $12, and you can judge something of the expense to those unfortunate wights, who are not in such health as to be able to ride all night; and then have to hire an accommodation to take them on at from ten to twenty cents per mile. On Saturday, I found two other passengers wishing to get to New-York, and after toiling and bantering all the morning with stagemen and keepers of livery stables, all of whom appeared combined together, not to carry passengers for a moderate sum, we succeeded in engaging one of them to send us to Peekskill, a distance of thirty-three miles, in a hack; but before leaving, we found that all his competitors were angry enough at him, for getting the job, to tear him to pieces; and one of them threatened that, in future, he would send a hack to Peekskill for $10—a dreadful threat that, to the community of livery stable spongers; but one which if put in execution, would greatly relieve the travelling community. Well, we got under way about 11 o'clock, A. M., and reached Peekskill about sunset. Here we tarried until about 11 o'clock on Sunday morning, when we proceeded to Verplank's Landing, four miles below Peekskill, to which place the steam boat "Union" came from New-York, the river all above there, being closed with ice.

I regretted the necessity of travelling on Sunday; for I always endeavor to avoid that when practicable. I consider the custom of setting apart one day in seven, for rest and for purposes of religious worship and moral instruction, as founded in wisdom, sanctioned by reason, and approved by every true religionist and philanthropist. Nevertheless, the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath. It is lawful to do good on Sunday, but it is not lawful to do evil, either on that, or any other day. Moreover, I was encouraged by the prospect of being able to reach New-York in season to attend public worship in the evening, which fortunately I did.

We reached the city about sunset, and I proceeded directly to the house of our zealous and long tried friend, Col. C. Harsen, whose house and whose heart are alike open for the reception and comfort of the messengers of the glad tidings of peace. Here, in the bosom of one of the best and most amiable families, whom respect does not flatter, honor make vain, nor wealth make proud, I remained most of the time until Tuesday morning. Dr. Harsen, the only son of the Colonel, returned a few months since, from a tour to and through most parts of Europe, whither he had been absent something more than a year. In the first part of his tour he was accompanied by Br. C. F. Le Fevre, whose letters while absent, many of our readers have seen. Dr. H. made a much more extended tour, and has brought home with him a great variety of paintings, prints from engravings, sketches, etc., exhibiting some splendid and most beautiful views of the principal scenes of his visits, such as cities, temples, cathedrals, towers, mountains, rivers, lakes, passes, monasteries, etc., etc., which, when accompanied in the examination, by his explanation and remarks on the events, manners, customs, etc., of the subjects of those pictures, can not fail deeply to interest the naturalist, the historian, the topographer, the geographer, and cosmopolite.

Immediately on arriving in the city, I learned with pleasure, that Br. David Pickering was to preach at the new Bleeker-street church that evening, in exchange with Br. Le Fevre, who was to supply for him in the Duane-street church, where a course of evening lectures has recently been commenced, in which Brs. Pickering, Le Fevre and Sawyer, alternatively officiate. Having never before heard Br. P., and the Bleeker-street church being much the nearest for me to attend, I availed myself, feeble as my health was, of the opportunity, and was highly gratified in listening to an able and appropriate discourse on the Scripture doctrine of election.

Our cause in New-York is steadily onward and highly prosperous. It is now like a Sampson with his locks fully grown, when compared with what it was a few years ago in this great emporium; at which time it was like Sampson in the lap of Delilah, shorn of his strength and subjected to the scoffs, reproaches and bitter jeers of his worst foes. Blessed be God, Sampson's locks are again grown, nor can the Philistines restrain him longer. He is, however, destined still more to increase in strength: or to drop the figure, Universalism has just begun its march in New-York. There is not, nor can there be a reason found or named, why there may not be, in that vast city, within a very few years, from six to ten Universalist churches, each as well filled and sustained as are the three now in existence. On Monday I made short calls, on each of the brethren, Price, Sawyer, Le Fevre and Pickering. Found them all in good health but the latter, who at present appears to labor under considerable bodily infirmity. May the Lord restore him to health, and prosper the work of truth in which he is engaged.

On Tuesday morning, 14th inst., I left New-York, at 7 o'clock, A. M., and by steam boat and rail road, two very comfortable and expeditious modes of travelling reached this city a little past 3 o'clock, P. M., where I was most cordially greeted by those true yoke-fellows in the faith and ministers of the Gospel of peace, Brs. A. C. Thomas and S. W. Fuller, with whom I have spent most of the time for the three days I have been here. On the evening of my arrival I attended the celebration of the second anniversary of the second Universalist Institute in Philadelphia. I was highly gratified with the meeting. Two excellent addresses were delivered by two members of the Institute. The music was animating and exhilarating. The cause of universal grace is permanently prosperous and steadily advancing in the city of "brotherly love," and certainly has two able and faithful public advocates in the pastors of the Lombard and Callowhill-street churches. Long may the pleasure of the Lord prosper in their hands. As of New-York, so of this place, with its immense population, I think that no good reason can be assigned why half a dozen Universalist societies, at least, may not spring up within a very few years. All that is wanting to build up new societies and new churches, is a few leading influential laymen to take hold of the thing, put shoulder to the wheel and be determined and faithful in the undertaking.

I had intended ere this, to have proceeded on farther South: circumstances have determined me now to delay my journey till next week. My health continued much the same as when I left home till I arrived here, my throat quite sore and cough troublesome. But by the advice of some of my friends, I have been persuaded to remain here long enough to try the efficacy of a new medicine and new process of treatment. I have begun the experiment, and so far it promises favorable results. I shall proceed South to Baltimore, etc., next week, you will probably hear from me again before long.

Yours in faithfulness, D. SKINNER.

PSALM CIII.

It seems I was not fortunate enough to make myself understood in my explanation of this Psalm; at least the following extract of a letter from an esteemed correspondent would seem to intimate as much.

"In the first place, you state the subject of the Psalm to be, 'the loving kindness and tender mercy of God,' contrasted 'with our sins' and 'our iniquities' in the text. To this I have no objection. But the idea that he does not deal with us after our sins nor reward us according to our iniquities, because his ways are 'precisely the reverse' of ours, is, in my humble opinion, fraught with much inconsistency. Does not the Deity act upon the principles of rigid justice, at the same time he manifests to his dependent and erring children his paternal love, 'his loving kindness and tender mercy'? Does he not reward 'them according to their iniquities' when he punishes them to reform them—when he chastens them for their profit? That is, does he not render to them the punishment due to their iniquities, at the same time that 'he pursues them with his mercies'—'pities their waywardness with paternal compassion—and in short,' when he 'acts directly counter to their sinful course and iniquitous doings'? So it seems to D."

To the three question concluding this article, I answer YES—and in so answering, involve my explanation in no inconsistency, but the very reverse. D. takes man's ways to be as they should be—I, in saying that the Deity does not copy after man's ways, suppose the ways of man to be not what they should be. The Deity always acts on the principles of rigid justice in punishing us; but man too often acts on the principles of revenge in punishing his enemies. Deity punishes to reform; man to revenge himself—to inflict suffering for injuries, without regard to the benefit of the sufferer.

Thus man too often acts—almost always, when not enlightened by divine teachings. And these actions are "our sins" which the Deity does not deal with us after—i. e. does not copy after in dealing with us. Justice, equity, and punishing to reform, are virtues, not sins and iniquities. In performing these virtues we deal after God's actions—but God in dealing with us does not deal after our sins, nor reward us according to (i. e. in a manner the same as) our iniquities.

I hope that I now am understood in my explanation of my explanation. I did not suppose that my first statements could be so misunderstood as they have been; for I did certainly not state that God did not deal with us after our virtues nor according to our good deeds—but after [or the manner of] our sins, nor according to [or agreement with] our iniquities. Am I understood?

NOTICES OF PERIODICALS.

The crowded state of our columns, and an occasional slip of the memory, have prevented some notices of this kind, which I intended to insert in their season. Let it might be supposed the periodicals named below had become unworthy of notice, I will here briefly remark—

The Knickerbocker for March was duly received, read with pleasure and interest, and found to sustain its previous, well-earned reputation. It now has engaged some additional contributors to its pages, some of them eminent in the literary circles of England and Germany. How literary enterprise is throwing the bands of social intercourse and general interests around the nations of the earth!

The New-York Mirror still continues its improvement in the unexceptionable matter provided instead of its former Sunday evening readings—while in all else it contributes equal to what before was unexceptionable.

Waldie's Library, as heretofore, continues worthy of patronage and the most extensive circulation. The looks selected for it, are the best of their kind, and the variety, while it is calculated to please every class of readers, is judiciously and carefully calculated to improve as well as please.

Waldie's Literary Omnibus has had all the first numbers of a large edition already exhausted! He begins an even score with No. 10, from which new subscribers can, for a time be supplied. It is a work admirably suited for general readers—its news department is well condensed and filled with the most interesting items. Its tales and larger works are of the most popular kind. Its price is low, and its rapidly increasing list shows well for publisher, Editor and subscribers.

Among the exchange papers we receive, there are few so well edited as the Poughkeepsie Telegraph. Of its politics, it does not become us to speak, further than to name them—they are favorable to the present General and State Administrations—but its editorial articles are well written—its selections good, and it is blessed with a few able correspondents all of which tends agreeably to vary its contents, and make it a very excellent country newspaper.

Let some may think me partial, I will here name an old favorite, (though not an exchange paper,) to acknowledge my obligations for some extracts from its columns. The United States Gazette—daily and twice a week—published in Philadelphia, by Joseph R. Chandler, Esq., is "on the other side" in National politics, though in favor of the present Pennsylvania State administration. He has engaged a European correspondence—the writer of which intends travelling on foot through England, to see "the common people," their manners and modes of living. We shall occasionally copy such extracts as may be "in our line," and as we believe will be gratifying to our readers. Those who wish the whole correspondence, and a good paper beside, had better apply at the "fountain head."

I have good will enough to name some others, but no room, and I fear our readers have no patience to spare—besides, their name is Legion—so I close for the present.

A. B. G.

TWO WISHES.

We have two wishes which, if gratified, we believe would advance the interests of the cause, and are quite sure would advance our own interests. One is, to dispose of several full files of the last volume, which we have on hand; and the other is, to increase our present subscription list. As an inducement, therefore, to our friends, and particularly to those who commenced their subscriptions with the present volume, to aid us in their gratification, we offer the last volume, in numbers, as a

to any one who will send us, free of expense, the advance pay for four new subscribers.

Can not many thus avail themselves of volume seven, and at the same time extend the circulation and consequent usefulness of the paper? Those who choose to avail themselves of this offer, will please state their wishes, and inform us whether we shall forward the volume by mail or otherwise. Those who prefer volume four or five, can be supplied with them on the same terms.

GROSH AND HUTCHINSON.

Well bound copies of volume seven can be had at this office for two dollars each—also of several former volumes at the same price.

G. and H.

Br. E. D. Wight, of West-Bloomfield, will accept our thanks for the copy of the Minutes of the New-York Universalist Convention for 1826, he was so kind as to send me.

D. SKINNER.

SHORT ARTICLES.

Would the reader believe it? Short articles are more difficult to write than long ones. Br. Skinner is absent—Br. Smith is busy on his "Causes of Infidelity Removed" and on other matters—and poor I am left to grind editorial, all alone. The reader will therefore excuse me if I give him more long articles than may be agreeable to his taste.

Will our correspondents please notice the above? They may see by it, how sadly I need help—especially in the "short article" line. I hope some of them—many of them—indeed I wish they, all, would pour in a stream of communications upon me, so as to keep me afloat. A few sermons as well as a lot of short pithy articles will be thankfully received, and in due time disposed of and accounted for. Can we get them?

A. B. G.

WHERE IS HE?

The following if I mistake not, relates to the wanderings of an old school-mate. Perhaps its insertion in this paper may do good, and therefore, though out of our usual course, I insert it. It is taken from the Chronicle, published at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania—to the Editor of which the required information should be communicated.

A. B. G.

"INFORMATION WANTED."

"Information is desired in regard to Thomas Forster Laird, son of Samuel Laird, Esq., late of Harrisburg, Dauphin county, Pa., deceased. Any information given to the Editor of this paper at Harrisburg, will be thankfully received. Editors will confer a favor by inserting this notice, which may result in beneficial consequences to the above young man, who has not been heard of for several years."

Harrisburg, February 18, 1837."

Br. Price—Send current volume of the Union to Thomas Barracough, Three mile Bay, Jefferson county, per request of Br. Britton—and number 4, volume 2, to Rev. William Andrews, Gaines.

Br. Tompkins—Send current volume of the Repository to Daniel M. Green, Middlefield, Otsego county, Miss D. Phelps, Hornelsville, Steuben county, and Orren Densmore, Oakfield, Genesee county, N. Y., charge the latter to A. B. G., and stop Miss Phelps' at the close of the present volume. Also, credit Nelson Netheway, Alabama, and Miss Clymerna Scott, Middleville, Herkimer county, N. Y., each $2, and charge

POETRY.

From the New-York American.
THE OUTCAST.

BY LT. G. W. PATTEN, U. S. ARMY.

They never more may breathe her name,
That cherish'd name of gentle tone;
'Tis blotted out in lines of shame,
On every page where once it shone.
Oh! may you never, never know,
The startling dream which haunts her rest,
Since that sad hour, her conscious brow
Was lent to warn a faithless breast.

That brow, whose changing lines were such,
As charmed the wand'ring painter's view,
At which the master gazing much,
Forgot his easel as he drew
The loftiest far among the proud,
And loveliest still amid the fair—
No more shall tempt the glittering crowd,
To forge the chains they smiled to wear.

That voice, between whose words of guile,
Such 'witching tones of passion rung,
That music's self would pause the while,
Neglectful of the lute she strung;
No longer 'mid the tuneful choir,
Shall strive to wake the trembling lay;
Nor love, nor friendship more aspire,
To sigh beneath its thrilling sway.

Yes! looks and words alike are vain,
Though smiles may soothe, and prayers may win,
They cannot break the galling chain,
Which binds the victim child of sin.
Like some frail bark upon the wave,
Deserted by the idle air,
Not all the power which man may have,
Can burst the spell which keeps it there.

European Correspondence of the United States Gazette.

SOUTHAMPTON, England, January, 1837.

This may be taken for a fair specimen of an English provincial town, and I shall describe it, to a certain extent, with the understanding that it is exponential of a class. It is half fashionable and half commercial. Both are owing, apparently, to its uncommonly beautiful situation, at the head of an arm of the British Channel, which is called Southampton Water, with a ready access to and from the sea, and two pretty little English rivers running into the Water, on either side. Of course the position is very pleasant. As it is the south of England, the climate also is mild. I was surprised, on my first arrival here, at the greenness of the fields as I entered Southampton; it reminded me rather of the environs of Philadelphia in the first soft days of April, than of the icicle rigors that usually hang, in our latitude, upon "January's front severe." Many flowers were blooming in the open air; and the sheep, with their young lambs, I found, were usually, in this neighborhood, exposed to the whole season, with very little food but the herbage, and scarcely any shelter at all.

Since the time of George III, this has been a watering place for invalids, and the leisurely portion of the town. At the same time its commercial opportunities are too good to be lost, in a country so money-making, as well as so pleasure-loving, as this. The consequence is, as I have intimated; a rather incongruous mixture here of the two characters;—than which, of course, nothing can be more diverse from each other in style. Southampton reminds me of the famous Mr. Fitz James, who used to amuse people—and fill his own pockets—by laughing on one side of his mouth and crying on the other, at the same time. The feature in the face of the town, corresponding to his nose, is the "Bar-gate"—so called; a massy, monoid, uncouth old archway, running across the principal street; with ancient, grim paintings of the world-renowned Asenpart and "Sir Bevis of Southampton," grinning in their several niches; and rampant brazen lions, green with years, making themselves useful to the public (to pay for their hideousness) by holding two of the town lamps in their clutches. This arch, I believe, is a remnant in fact of the original walls of the town; for though a gay place, you must know it is not (like some other gay people) particularly remarkable for its youth. The name betrays it—as a parish register exposes a belle passée. The ham part of it is the Saxon, I take it, for "house," and ton for "town." On this shore is the well-authenticated site of the good old story of Canute's rebuking the waves;—the then royal residence being only 12 miles distant—at Winchester. Near here are remains of a castle erected by Richard II. There is a charity in town, for the benefit of four old men and four old women—two shillings a week, and lodgings—founded by Edward III, under the name of "God's House;" with a charter extant which (like the notes of the sermons presented to Franklin by his uncle) nobody on earth can read. These eight jolly customers, of course, are always to be found, and live in clover, I dare say. A wiser institution, is a Free Grammar School, established by Edward VI.

These are wrinkles in the brow of the belle, you see, quite inconsistent with juvenility. Here, too, by the water-side is a long, unwieldy, iron cannon, given to the town by Henry VIII.—dated 1542—and bearing that monarch's proud title of King of France, etc. If I mistake not, this is about the date of the first ordnance of the sort cast in England, and it is worthy of notice, that pieces of the same age have just been brought up from the bottom of the sea at Portsmouth, after an abeyance of near 300 years. Among the town's jewelry, they show also—that is they wont show—a clumsy, rusty old sword, four and a half feet long—double handed, with a two inch blade—presented by Elizabeth, and carried about by the mayor upon gala-days, down to this time. I could not succeed in getting a sight of this invaluable jewel. I presume the town would go to destruction directly if it were shown to the profane eyes of a Yankee—though it does not appear, by the way, whether there is a man in the place able to wield it, since the death of Sir Bevis.—This noble knight, I should have mentioned, is supposed to have been buried out of town, at a place named Mount Bevis, where a huge skeleton was once found. This apparently is all the evidence extant—(an illustration of the old saying, "nihil nisi bonum," etc.) In latter days, the spot has been turned, to better account by a ploughshare; a late Earl of Peterborough having laid out splendid gardens and grounds here, of attractions sufficient to induce visits from Lady M. W. Montague, Voltaire, and Pope, who were all frequenters of the place. Latterly, Southey, the poet, has owned it.

ATTACHMENT OF A SWALLOW.

The Cliff swallow is not, we believe, a regular sojourner in these parts. His visits are believed to be only occasional—few and far between. At any rate we are informed that he has no regular haunts. The farm that he gladdens this year, may not be again cheered by his presence for many coming seasons. We have an excellent anecdote to tell of a pair of these interesting birds. It was related to us, if not by an eye witness, by one who received it from an undoubted source. These birds, as do nearly all the birds of this latitude, take their departure hence for warmer skies. Several years since a large number of them had their nests built upon a barn in the south part of Deerfield. At the usual period their northern dwellings were abandoned, and the tribe took its flight for the tropics. After a time, a solitary individual was observed lingering among the forsaken habitations. Various conjectures were started to account for his tarrying. It might be that he had not strength enough for so distant an expedition; or he might have been accidentally left behind in the general emigration, and feared to encounter the perils of the journey alone. The Autumn passed away, and still that solitary stranger remained, braving the frosts and the pelting of the storms of Winter. Spring came and yet he was there. An occurrence so singular and contrary to the habits of the emigrating tribes, caused his movements to be watched with more attention. At length another head was observed protruded from one of the nests, which seemed to be the particular abode of the bird which had been marked with so much interest. On examining the nests the mystery was beautifully solved. Another swallow was found there a prisoner, one of its legs had become entangled by a thread or a horse hair, which had been used in the lining of the nest and held it there a captive. Yet it was not deserted by its faithful mate. Through all the long and dreary Winter, his patient, self devoted love supplied her wants. He saw, without regret but for his hapless consort, the deepening gloom of the fading year, he felt without feeling, but for her, the advancing rigor of Winter, and if he at times, remembered the sunny skies of the South and the pleasures his tribe were then enjoying it was only to sigh that she could not partake them. By night and by day, in sunshine and in cloud, in the calm and in the tempest, he was with her, ministering to her wants, and cheering the hours of her hopeless captivity by his caresses and untiring devotion.

A SOBER CALCULATION.—A man who earns from six to eight or ten dollars per week, and spends two or three of it for boarding, and besides what is necessary for his comfort and convenience, may lay up from one to two hundred dollars yearly towards setting up for himself at the proper time. If the capital required be not large, in three or four years he may calculate upon being a master instead of a journeyman. This is one view; obvious to be sure, but not the less important.

Another view is one which too often presents itself. If a young man, instead of thus laying up a chief part of his wages, spends it all, or nearly so, in Sunday excursions, or frivolous evening balls, gaming or any other vicious or imprudent pursuits, he may calculate upon remaining a journeyman for life; and if not brought through evil communications to the state prison or the gallows, will, in all probability, terminate his mortal career in some poor house, unpitied and despised. This is another view of the case equally obvious as the last; and yet how often are both of them lost sight of, to the ruin of youth.

CONFIDE IN YOUR MOTHER.

To the youthful female we should say, that no individual of either sex can love you with an affection so disinterested as your mother. Deceive her, and "your feet will slide in due time." How many thoughtless young daughters receive addresses against the wishes of their parents, receive them clandestinely, give their hand in marriage, and thus dig the grave of their earthly happiness? He who would persuade you to deceive your parents, proves himself in that very deed unworthy of all your confidence. If you wed him you will speedily realize what you have lost. You will find that you have exchanged a sympathising friend and an able, judicious counsellor, a kind and devoted nurse, for a selfish and unfeeling companion, ever seeking his own accommodation and his own pleasure—neglecting you in health, and deserting you when sick. Who has not read the reward of deserted parents in the pale and melancholy features of the undutiful daughter?

MARRIAGES.

In this city, March 8th, by the Rev. Mr. Fowler, Mr. FREDERICK E. BEDIET, of Westmoreland, to Miss ELIZABETH C. HERRICK, of this city.

In Clinton, March 8th, by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. MOSES POWERS, to Miss OLIVE CURRY, both of Augusta.

At Cold Creek, Allegany county, March 2d, by Joseph Morse, Esq., Mr. CYRUS W. KILBORN, to Miss CAROLINE P. NORTON, all of that place.

DEATHS.

In Deerfield, on the 4th inst., CHARLES H., infant son of Philander and Beulah Sage, aged five months. But they mourn not as those who have no hope, for they have a hope "That looks beyond the bounds of time,

When what we now deplore

Shall rise in full immortal prime.

And bloom to fade no more."

D. B.

In Mexico, Oswego county, on Wednesday, January 11th, after a short and painful sickness, Mr. JOSEPH LAMB, aged 47 years. He was a kind husband, an affectionate father, a "friend indeed," and a useful member of society. His funeral was attended at the Baptist meeting-house, in Colosse, on the 13th, and the evidences of a glorious and happy immortality for all mankind presented to a numerous and sympathising audience by the writer, from 1. Cor. xv: 51-57. C. B. B.

In Union township, Tioga county, Pa., on January 29th, 1837, Mr. JOHN NEWELL, a veteran soldier of the Cross, and of our war for National independence. Br. Newell was born May 7th, 1745—and entered the Gospel kingdom of universal love, upwards of sixty years ago. His neighbors of a contrary faith, testified to his Christian walk and conversation in life and in his dying hour, his end was peace—his theme, the love of God in Christ—his joy, the hope of a world's salvation. His funeral was attended by Br. A. H. Ripley, who delivered a discourse on the occasion from the answer of Jesus to the Sadducees, recorded in Luke, 20th ch., to an assembly, many of whom had never before heard a preacher of universal salvation.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.....NO. II.

BY REV. S. R. SMITH.

IMMORALITIES OF CHRISTIANS.

It may appear singular, that we should attempt to assign reasons for the conduct of other people—especially when that conduct involves some of the most intricate operations of the human mind. For such, the mental decisions respecting the truth and tendency of the Christian revelation, are generally considered. And it may, therefore, be viewed by some as a presumptuous undertaking. Those who thus judge, are informed, then, that nothing bold, daring or uncommon is intended. But it is very sincerely believed, that this subject—the causes of unbelief—has not received the attention which its importance merits, either from unbelievers themselves, or from Christian professors. And it will receive consideration for some little time, more from the desire of drawing upon it that portion of attention which it deserves—than from the hope that its discussion will be very agreeable, either to Christians in general, or to unbelievers.

Men sometimes act or decide on a given subject, much less from the weight of well understood motives, than from the immediate influence of some impelling cause. And among the instances which might be adduced in illustration of this fact, there are few which appear more certain and obvious, than the existing infidelity among mankind. For it is difficult to conceive of any sufficient motive for unbelief, in the mind of any man. And surely no person is naturally an infidel, however indifferent or inattentive he may be to the interests of religion. The natural tendencies of the mind and feelings are to the belief in, and worship of some superior being—a fact abundantly proved in the practice of all nations, in every period of time.

We have used the term motive, in this instance, not with a view to reproach unbelievers for their opinions, or want of opinions, but rather to exonerate them from any improper designs in their adoption. For none can suppose, that merely to differ from the majority on the subject of religion, is an object of such importance as to furnish a motive for the disagreement. Nor can it be imagined, that to shut one's self out from the consciousness that there is a God, and from all the pleasures of devotion, and from the belief that he has made known his will to mankind, can constitute a motive for infidelity. Neither is it probable that the effort with which the religious feeling must be stifled in the human breast, furnishes such motive. Nor yet is it scarcely possible, that the exclusive love of truth, ever led men into absolute unbelief. For unbelievers are not distinguished for the patient and deliberate examination of religious subjects. And were they ever to become so, there is good reason to believe that they would cease to be unbelievers. But admitting that there are no sufficient motives for infidelity, there still must be producing causes—what are they?

There are several prominent, existing causes of infidelity, which have their separate and distinct, as well as their collective influence. And to these particular influences may, perhaps, be traced the various aspects which unbelief assumes.

1. One cause of skepticism, is—the imperfection of morality among Christians. This is, in reality, a compliment to the purity required by the Gospel; and should have an effect exactly the reverse of the one named. For it is admitting, that if Christian professors were to live up to the principles and requirements of their religion, they would be far better than at present. And consequently, that those requirements are good. But this view of the subject, if taken, does not incline people to make any allowance for the imperfections and weaknesses of poor human nature—nor to look more favorably upon Christianity.

From the natural tendency of the human mind, principles and practices, if not absolutely identified, are, at least, very intimately associated. And as actions are more tangible than mere mental operations, and also usually esteemed more important, it follows that more stress is laid upon the conduct of men, than upon the principles of the mind. When, therefore, the conduct is vicious, the common inference is, either that the person is unprincipled—or that his principles are corrupt and vitiating. Hence some well-disposed persons are led to doubt the genuineness and utility of a system, which leaves its professors to the practice of vice. And the vices of nominal Christians, have been the stumbling-blocks that have turned many aside from the path of peace, into doubts, disgust and unbelief.

That much crime—nay, perhaps every variety in the catalogue of crime—has been committed by professing Christians, is neither to be doubted nor denied. From the most cruel and unrelenting wars, oppressions and persecutions, down to the lowest and the vilest of personal atrocities, there is probably not an offence against morality of which they have not been guilty. And while these facts have been the sources of deep mortification and sorrow to all good Christians, they have laid in other minds the foundation of an unnatural skepticism. That observation, however, which recognizes the abuses of the moral injunctions of the Gospel, is entitled to due consideration. And it should induce the believer to examine with great care, into the probable reasons of the previous and existing immoralities of Christians.

One obvious and important reason why the virtues inculcated by the Gospel, have not been more generally practiced, is—they have unfortunately been undervalued by Christians themselves. A state of things has existed—a system of opinions has prevailed, which has placed a false and exaggerated estimate upon mere belief; and which, consequently, rendered morality a subject of secondary consideration. Men believed, and still believe that the virtues are not of saving efficacy, but that faith and forms are; and consequently, that however good virtue may be in itself, it is not indispensable to salvation, and that the violation of its requirements may be atoned for, by the ceremonials of religion. Now, although these facts do not constitute an apology for crimes, still they do furnish reasons why the morality of Christians has not been better.

And these influences have been greatly augmented by other well-meant mistakes. Ministers have preached, and people have as constantly believed, that the practice of the Christian virtues was the sure way to render men miserable now, although it might secure their bliss hereafter. While, on the other hand, the pursuit of vicious indulgencies has been very uniformly regarded and represented as the only true way of present happiness. And it must also be recollected, that these views of the respective means of present happiness or misery, are deeply laid in the young and susceptible mind—grow with the growth, and strengthen with the strength of successive generations. So surely then, as man loves happiness and would avoid misery, so certainly may we look for vices, while he supposes them the instruments of his present enjoyment. The operations of the natural laws of cause and effect, here exert a part, at least, of their wonted influence over the conduct of men. And the principles of the mind being corrupted—the moral feelings weakened and vitiated—it is no longer matter of surprise that strong and ardent passions should, in many instances, assume the right of control, and precipitate the believer into the very depths of crime and degradation.

But Christian morality has encountered other, and perhaps still greater discouragements. A hand, cold and palsying as that of death, has been laid upon the germs of human virtue; and apparently for no other purpose than their extermination. What else could have inspired the thought, or have prompted the earnest propagation of the opinion—that under that very condition in which man was introduced into being, he was wholly corrupt. That his best thoughts and purposes were sinful, and his best actions but "splendid crimes." That the affections of the soul were polluted by an affinity with the first born of our race, and its final destiny would only be rendered more wretched by any attempts at moral obedience. That must be a hardy and well-rooted plant, which can flourish, or even live under such cultivation. And yet, such is the care and culture which the Christian virtues have received for ages.

In view of all this, it ceases to be matter of surprise, that professing Christians have been guilty of crimes—or that under this head of discouragements, their morality should languish. Nor is it wonderful that some are tempted to doubt the heavenly origin of such sentiments—or even to question the divinity of a system of which they are supposed to constitute a part. At the same time, they fully account for the ridiculous and disgusting fact, that some persons are more devout than moral. And they should convince their advocates, that the sin of unbelief lies, in part at least, at their own door. While, on the other hand, the skeptic should be led to search for the causes which have prevented morality from wholly sinking under its burdens. And that it has not thus sunk, even among Christians, ought to satisfy him that there is a divine energy somewhere in the religion of the Gospel, and which secures among its professors, an overwhelming majority of candid and upright members.

It is then worthy of the attention and earnest consideration of the skeptic, whether the immoralities of Christians properly have, or can have any bearing upon the credibility of the Gospel. They are the subject of deep regret to every well-wisher to Christianity, as well as of pain to the philanthropist. But still, it is not a little extraordinary, that with the acuteness of vision possessed by unbelievers, they should be able to perceive little in the Christian character except offences. Nothing else is clearly and distinctly seen; and this is very certain to be first seen and made the subject of animadversion. And thus, notwithstanding the notorious fact that, in every Christian community, of every age and sect, the offenders against the ordinary rules of morality, are comparatively few in number. While, on the contrary, no one class of men on earth, have furnished so large a proportion of those who may justly be considered the ornaments of human nature. The catalogue of those who have shone pre-eminently in their respective spheres, as the benefactors of mankind, and as illustrious modes of moral purity, is immensely too great to admit of enumeration. While millions in humble and private life, have carried out into full practice the benevolent principles of a pure and heavenly morality. Nor need we search the records of by-gone days, nor go abroad for examples: they are to be found every where around and among us, in the lives of the thousands and tens of thousands of Christian worshippers of almost every name. And we beg leave to press the question—why these things are never considered by skeptics, as well as the faults of Christians? Why that morality, which has triumphed over so many discouragements—diffused so many meliorations over suffering humanity, and so greatly improved the moral condition of society—should seem to be overlooked, or disregarded?

The unbeliever would consider it unmanly and unfair, to charge the follies or vices of a few individuals of his fraternity, to the weakness or corruption of his system. And he would, with great propriety, demand that the virtues of other members should be taken into the account. This indulgence we must give him, or his system would fall at once. For it is not yet well ascertained, that skepticism, or infidelity, professes to improve, or that it was ever known to improve the morals of any man. And this indulgence we are willing to grant—but we claim what we give, with the fullest confidence in the superiority of Christian morality over every other system that ever claimed the attention of mankind; the opinions of skeptics, and the acknowledged vices of professors, to the contrary notwithstanding.

We deny, then, that the views of the nature, imperfection and usefulness of morality, which have been here stated, are any part of Christianity. And we demand as our privilege, that the unbeliever give so much attention to the subject, as may enable him to distinguish between the corruptions of Christianity, and its pure and primitive principles as taught and exemplified by the Saviour and his apostles. This he can do at a small sacrifice of labor and attention, and this he is bound to do before he takes for granted, that any set of opinions are the same with those maintained by the New Testament. He should know, by a candid examination of the subject, whether the utter worthlessness of moral virtue is a doctrine of Christianity, or one of its corruptions—and reflect, that the malpractices of erring man, are no proof that his faith is ill-founded, or that the confidence of his hopes is unjustifiable. And if he does not do this, but rejects unceremoniously the whole system of Christian revelation, as doubtful or untrue, he must assure himself that others will suspect him of having more zeal to escape from error, than industry in ascertaining where the error lies.

Let the unbeliever go to the New Testament, and he will learn that Jesus taught his followers to practice a better righteousness than that of the Scribes and Pharisees—the great religionists of his nation—and that he exemplified in his own practice the nature of the virtues he required. From the same book he will also learn that the apostles required of the first Christian converts, a departure from all iniquity, and that they should keep themselves unspotted, unpolluted from the world. They thus not only enforced an entire and pure morality, but they denied the name and the privileges of discipleship to all those who disobeyed their injunctions. From whatever cause, then, the immoralities of professors may proceed, that cause is not found in the precepts of the Gospel, or in the example of the first propagators of Christianity.

He, therefore, who allows himself to doubt of the truth of divine revelation in general, or of the Christian religion in particular, because some Christians undervalue morality, and therefore do not most effectually promote its practice—or because, from erroneous views, or human frailty, others fall into crimes—does one, or all of the following things.

1. He permits himself to judge hastily and on insufficient evidence, when the means of full and ample information are in his hands. And he does this, because he takes but a very partial view of the subject. This no one can doubt, who recollects that he doubts the truth of Christianity, or rejects it entirely from the single consideration, that some of its professors are immoral. The virtues of other Christians ought certainly to be esteemed as good evidence in favor of its moral tendency—especially when the number of the virtuous greatly exceeds that of the vicious; and when that evidence is supported by the visible fact, that when Christianity has prevailed, the morality of mankind has been uniformly improved. Or,

2. He identifies the opinions of a certain body of professors, with the thing professed, without ever instituting a comparison between them. This the unbeliever or skeptic generally does, by taking for granted, that the opinions respecting the moral depravity of man—the sinful tendencies of his actions, and the worthlessness of virtue, are the identical doctrines and teachings of the New Testament. This has been shown to be incorrect, and we have a right to expect that he will at least examine both sides of the question before he draws his conclusions. Else,

3. He betrays an indolence which he will not excuse in others, and judges by rules which he condemns. For he would not trust for a moment, the credibility of his views upon the moral conduct, or moral requirements of the sternest advocates of infidelity; nor allow the Christian to be a competent judge of the merits of a book which he had never read.

ROMANS VIII: 20.

BY REV. L. L. SADLER.

"For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope."

[Br. Sadler, after remarking that he dislikes the mode of determining the meaning of Scripture by the arbitrary laws of language, says, that words are often used metaphorically, etc., and used in an accommodated sense—idioms and phrases arise out of local and other peculiar circumstances—and can not therefore be determined by the rules of syntax. The New Testament writers did not use classical Greek, but corrupted it with Hebraisms and provincialisms, consequently not on etymological and classical principles. And that they did not regard grammatical construction as much as they did sentiment and idea, so that "it need not surprise us if they made errors in syntax—especially if we consider the unlettered character of the apostles." He also says that "copyists would be extremely likely to vary grammatical construction," "to suit their particular notions," and for all these reasons "but little reliance can be placed on the grammatical sense of a disputed passage." After these and other prefatory remarks, he proceeds to consider E. B. V.'s remarks. A. B. G.]

"E. B. V." is very sanguine in the opinion, that "if Br. Sadler will look into his Greek Testament, and examine the passage there, he will be compelled to reject the interpretation he has given, as it is absolutely impossible that such an interpretation can be forced upon the Greek, as it now stands."

Your correspondent has reckoned without his host. Br. S. has looked into his Greek Testament and no such consequences ensue, as are affirmed with so much confidence. "E. B. V." attempts to show why such a result as declared above, must inevitably follow an examination of the original text, by a criticism on the passage.

[Br. S. here quotes part of the fourth paragraph of E. B. V.'s article—see No. 10. A. B. G.]

In reply I remark, that though "hekousa is an adjective, and must belong to some noun which it qualifies"; and though "there is no other nominative case of any kind" but ktesis, rendered creature, expressed in the text, it does not necessarily follow that because hekousa is in the nominative case, it must qualify that term. No. For there is another noun implied, to which it more naturally belongs, and to which it should be applied. The writer had in view the person who subjected the creature to vanity; and though not mentioned in the text, it is fully implied. The language is elliptical. Its import is "for God subjected the creature to vanity not of his free, unreserved will"—as the loving father punishes his child, not with a willing mind, but in reference to his final good.

Macknight renders the passage which he calls a literal translation, thus, "for the creature was subjected to vanity, not willing it, but by him who hath subjected it," etc. By supplying the agent understood or implied, this translation shows my interpretation correct. "For God rendered the creature subject to vanity, not willing it, but by reason of him who subjected the same to hope." Not willing what? The vanity to be sure. Who did will the vanity? Who should it be, but he who subjected the creature to it?

Again, though hekousa is in the feminine gender, that does not "absolutely" determine its relation. For if the gender has never been changed by any copyist, so as to correspond with the gender of ktesis, it is not very material. Macknight in his preliminary essays to the Epistles, says, "the masculine is sometimes put for the feminine, even by classical writers," and quotes examples—of course, vice versa. Again, he says, "sometimes the relative takes the gender of its consequent." Hence, if in this case the relative were supplied as it might properly be (reading, "waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God, who hath subjected the creature to vanity not willing it") the gender would be used as in other cases, with our application.

I shall close this article by giving what I conceive to be a literal translation of verses 20 and 21, supplying the elliptical words—"For to vanity God appointed the creature, not willing it; but by reason of him who hath subjected it in hope, that the creature itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the freedom of the glory of the children of God."

"PARTIALISM WON'T DO TO DIE BY."

BY NOAH G. BARROS.

"Who ever knew a Congregationalist, or Baptist, or Methodist, recant in a dying hour, and embrace Universalism? Is this not very strange, if Universalism be the only true doctrine?"

Such is the language of Le Roy Sunderland, the Editor of "Zion's Herald," a Methodist Abolitionist paper published in New-York city. It is added to a notice of the death of a Mr. Wm. Latham, of Hebron, Ct., in which it is said he renounced Universalism, declaring it would not do to die by. Whether the story is a true one or not, will, I hope, soon be ascertained. But at all events, I think it high time for Universalists to stereotype the phrase with which I have headed this article, in reply to the one so frequently uttered by our opposers. It has as many words, and sounds as sonorously, as, "Universalism won't do to die by."

It is more reasonable, too; for what on earth can mingle darker bitterness with the ebbing tides of mortal existence, than the reflection that many whom we know and love—will be endlessly separated from us, and whelmed in interminable woe?

It is more true—not only theoretical, but proven so by facts. While our opposers have diligently sought out every case of a death-bed repentance—every recantation made by a dying skeptic or indifferentist, that could possibly be tortured or twisted into a semblance of proof in favor of their assertion;—yes, while Partialists have even forged cases of deaths that have never occurred—killed off each letter of the alphabet in succession, and even reported recantations of Universalism, when that doctrine actually was "the anchor of the soul" while life remained;—while they have done all this to support their unproved declaration, Universalists have seldom condescended to notice the miserable, despairing exclamations of dying Partialists—have tenderly refrained from publishing the anguished prayers and supplications to God, of dying parents, children, brethren and sisters in behalf of their yet-unconverted relatives and friends. If we chose to record but a tithe of these manifold, real occurrences, we could bury their forged, unreal lists under a pile that would forever prevent their resurrection. Truth would swallow up falsehood in victory.

But their object is to show, to superstitious fancies, that in the dying hour, a person knows more about the eternal world, than during the enjoyment of health; and that therefore these cases prove Universalism false and Partialism true. I have no objection to adopt even this test, (for the sake of argument, only;) but do not believe it a correct one although decidedly in favor of Universalism. Let them bring forward every case they can find, giving name, date and place—let each be fully tested by actual inquiry of persons acquainted with the facts—and, for every case that is thus fully established, I think we can furnish another on our side of the question, of a Partialist who embraced Universalism on the death bed, which shall give name date and place and stand a similar test on their part.

Mrs. Hinckley, wife of Jared Hinckley, of Fenner, Madison county, N. Y., a Baptist, renounced Partialism and embraced Universalism on her death-bed. She died April 20th, 1831. For particulars see Magazine and Advocate, vol. ii, p. 264. Miss Celinda Graves, daughter of Walter Graves, embraced Universalism a few days before her death. She died in Skaneateles, N. Y., February 28th, 1832. Magazine and Advocate, vol. iii, p. 128. Mrs. Ann Hawley, embraced Universalism, after living in the embrace of a limited faith all her previous life, in her last hours. She died in Milleroche, Canada, November 4th, 1832. Warren Reed, of Little Lakes, (Warren,) Herkimer county, N. Y., died February 27th, 1832. In his last moments he avowed, for the first time, (what had been his previous faith is not stated,) his belief in Universalism. Mrs. Esther Hotchkiss, aged 81 years, an Episcopalian, renounced her limited views and embraced Universalism in her last illness. She died in Vernon, May 21st, 1833. See Magazine and Advocate, vol. iv, pp. 32, 88, and 184. Mrs. Sophia Brown, a Baptist, consort of Rev. C. B. Brown, now of Hastings, then of Mexico, Oswego county, N. Y., renounced her former views, and embraced Universalism in her last illness. She died March 21st, 1836. Mrs. Elizabeth Allen, consort of J. P. Allen, of Westmoreland, Oneida county, N. Y., renounced Partialism and embraced the doctrine of universal salvation, in her last illness. She died January 23d, 1836. Magazine and Advocate, vol. vii, pp. 56, 128. Others might be added, but these will suffice for the present. The period in which these all occurred is but four years; as I have but that number of volumes to select from—viz. volumes ii, iii, iv, and vii.

Probably if I had leisure, and access to the twenty other periodicals of our denomination, I could add more to the list. But when these are fairly met, it will be time to call for others. Let our opposers duly inquire into these cases—examine them well—report mistakes, if any, and then meet them with an equal number of equally well attested cases, and they shall be further attended to in proof that PARTIALISM WILL NOT DO TO DIE BY.

OCCASIONAL PREACHING,

That there has been a grievous extravagance among religionists, especially in their Councils, with respect to theological seminaries, ecclesiastical discipline, ministerial qualifications, tests of fellowship, etc., is an opinion I have long had. And while I observed the management of other denominations, I fondly hoped that Universalists would prove an exception. Their profession and faith, their zealous pretensions to liberty and equality among preachers and laity, and many other circumstances, would seem to exclude the possibility of those evils arising among us.

It was but lately that an article appeared in the Magazine and Advocate, vol. 7, no. 29, over the signature of C. Hammond, (a Br. I have long esteemed and do yet highly esteem,) in which I found some remarks upon "occasional preaching." True, the article contained some well-directed remarks upon the condition of several societies in the bounds of the Niagara Association. Having a mind of my own, I ventured to transmit to Br. Grosh some of my thoughts upon the subject requesting him, if he thought proper, to notice the scrap in any part or shape, that he would publish it with (instead of my real name) a signature expressive of my humble situation. Accordingly the article appeared in number 37, volume aforesaid; to which Br. Hammond replied in number 42, same volume. By a reference to the Minutes of the Niagara Association, it will be seen that Br. Hammond (together with the members of the Council,) brought matters to his liking.—The resolution was adopted. Be it so. It is his right—a right upon which I would not infringe. Now a word to Br. Hammond upon the spirit and manner of his reply to me.

In the first place, he seems to make light of anonymous writings. Methinks I can state facts over the signature of "Minor," and have done it as truly, though not so elegantly, as "Nemo," who offered his remarks upon "Theological Seminaries." See both published on the same page.

He says that my first objection is against requiring a preacher to devote any portion of his time, etc. This is news to me—examine my article and see if such a remark can be found there. I always knew better than to advance the idea that a preacher was not required to devote any portion of his time to ministerial duties. I know that for many years the Genesee Association required the preacher in fellowship to preach "at least once a year, unless sickness, etc., prevented;" this I consider a portion. I think I wrote plain enough to be understood. Perhaps not. But I can state my meaning in another form.

I protested against a law, or "code of by-laws," which required one of our preachers to surrender his letter of fellowship, because he preached "only occasionally." And though he made some other employment his business, yet, if he preached "occasionally," or "some few times in a year," he did not "entirely neglect his ministerial duties."

Br. Hammond speaking of our congregations, says "eight or ten hearers." Where did he get this? I think he must have quoted from memory, and his memory must have been very treacherous to allow him to make such a mistake. When I wrote, our society numbered fifteen members, scattered some six or eight miles around—none wealthy—about two-thirds females—those who have families, barely able these hard times, (and it is always hard times for poor folks,) to support them. Some of the sisters can not get to meeting without assistance, and are so unfortunate as to have husbands who are not over anxious to help them, at least to Universalist meetings. We live in a thinly settled place, and out of the few inhabitants in our vicinity, there are now existing the following churches, viz:—One Free-will Baptist, one Presbyterian, one Christian, three different sects of Methodists, and one Baptist, which latter I understand numbers rising of one hundred members. Now, does Br. Hammond or any other person wonder at the smallness of our society, and that we can not collect more than "eight or ten" of that small number at a time to meeting? The non-professing part of community, if they attend meeting at all, will run where there is the most noise and greatest excitement. And while we are surrounded with almost a continual overflow of revivals, protracted meetings, etc., there are but few of those who will attend with us, where rational solemnity forbids the intrusion of enthusiasm—where the "soul's calm sunshine and the heartfelt joy" is expressed from the heart thoroughly imbued with universal benevolence.—And after all this, I said, "about the same number generally, (sometimes more,) of others."—Leaving the reader to judge of the size of our congregations, at from twenty to thirty, from that to fifty or more, as the case may be.

By this time it may be seen with what peculiar grace the phrase is ushered in, "He can now preach steadily to some eight or ten hearers." Astonishing! When I arrived at this period, I could not but wonder what would come next so entirely destitute of truth. I think Br. Hammond lacks sympathy. He wounds the feelings of a friend with an unsparing hand. His charity, too, for the feelings of a society, is rather scanty here. Did he attempt to make amends by the fine little tints of sarcastic humor which immediately follow?

He speaks of the "happy state of things"—wonders who would be most grieved, "preacher or hearer"—and of the preacher's "fortitude, piety and zeal"—"such an ungrateful society"—"no small honor or favor to have them dissolve the fellowship formerly subsisting between us."—'Too bad! too bad! I can form no better excuse for him, than, that he was very careless in his readings, and also, was ignorant of those about whom he wrote.

He says, "Minor advises amendments to our constitution." Another mistake! to say nothing worse. I discovered in his article an expression of anxiety upon this subject, and supposing him sincere, I said, "of course you see the necessity" etc. I saw no such necessity myself—so much for my advice. He speaks about waking "up dead societies—who withhold from the laborer his hire." To this we plead, not guilty. We never hire preachers without paying them—we have had hired preachers, and can prove payment.—Br. Hammond further says, "If the preacher considers it his duty to preach at all to such a society, let him preach repentance towards God," etc. Good, wholesome doctrine—I have no fault to find with it. And I think some preachers, as well as societies, would do well to adhere to it. If Br. Hammond should introduce himself among the members of this society, ten to one if he would not have the same lesson preached to him. And I think he would "witness something like the Christian religion among them." But they have yet to learn, that they are under obligations to hire, and then to distress themselves and families to pay the preacher. Humility is a gem of sterling worth, in a preacher of the Gospel.

Upon the whole, I am right glad that a man of Br. Hammond's capacity is not destined to reside here! I should not like to see him "starve"; and I very much doubt whether or not he would "preach at all to such a society" as this. A society of only fifteen or twenty members—only five or six males—all in low pecuniary circumstances—scattered far and wide—almost overrun and trampled under foot by other denominations—this is a station too insignificant for a popular preacher. Although they are warm-hearted Christians—established Universalists—faithful friends of our common cause—happy to find in our society a peaceful home, where they can rest with Christian friends, secure from the boisterous commotion that surrounds them, and from which they have fled—yet if our preachers were all like Br. Hammond, we should be left alone—without a shepherd and denied the happy privilege which the poor in all ages have enjoyed, that of having "the Gospel preached to them."

As it is we have a preacher who sometimes preaches steadily, at other times "only occasionally." We are glad of it. And further, we rejoice that there are some Associations of our order yet left, that will fellowship and protect such preachers—though they earn a living by some other business.

I regret that Br. Hammond's reply was written so unguarded. This article is intended to set him right, where I am confident he is wrong. I am not conscious that I have departed from the law of brotherly kindness and Christian charity in either article.

I have now done. We live in a free country. Br. Hammond has expressed his feelings and views—I have expressed mine. We are even.

And now, if Br. Hammond would know my real name and place of residence, let him manifest it—he shall be individually gratified. The cost to him will only be the postage on one piece of paper to Utica.

A FABLE.

BY MRS. SARAH BROUGHTON.

I saw a beautiful garden, enclosed with walls strong and high: it was enriched with every pleasant plant that could delight the eye, or regale the sense. The lofty trees of refined pleasure spread their branches to the golden sun, and whispering zephyrs held melodious concert in the quivering leaves. Pure crystal fountains cast their flowing jets on banks of tangled flowers, and bubbling springs were sparkling in living lustre, beneath the deep embowering shades. Sweet tones of music swelled the balmy gales and played among the scented blossoms. Harmony was there; for love had built his gorgeous temple amid the clustering shades, and two bright beings, clad in the radiant robes of innocence, dwelt in peace in the glorious palace. The pure spirits that flitted in the sunbeams, saw it and rejoiced. * * *

Again I looked on the happy garden: the leaf was withered and sere, and sadly the wind sighed in the moaning branches. The fountain's jet no longer played, and the crystal springs were troubled and brackish. The flowering vines, that clambered up the wall, were torn and trampled; and when I looked for the shrine where love had dwelt, ruin and desolation were there. The bright and happy beings no longer revelled along its walks, but a form of sorrow bent over the broken fountain, and essayed to cool the burning brow of misery!

A fiend had been there, and clasped the iron bands of slavery around the mental energies, and kindled blighting fires upon the heart and brain. Then came the dread Sirocco's burning blast—and the swift hurricane of moral degradation levelled love's beautiful temple with the dust!

Reader, would you know the name of this fiend? Go to the midnight haunt, where over the maddening bowl, fallen humanity raves, and curses the God that made him; and on his haggard brow, in characters of fire, read INTemperance.

UNIVERSALISM.

BY DR. B.—.

The mind of man, when entering into deep discussions and examining the glorious doctrines of the word of life, formed but a faint conception of things yet to be revealed. No subject is so crowded with lofty mysteries, as the nature, attributes and administration of Jehovah. All inspire us with reverence. All lead the soul out from the little narrow circle of terrestrial investigations, and encourage deep and holy contemplations. We enter the sanctuary of divine perfections, and while glory brightens, and beauty after beauty, and wonder after wonder opens upon us, we feel that we can not return. O how entrancing, then, is UNIVERSALISM! How well calculated to call into action the nobler powers of the soul! Who, then, would wish to stay it in its progress of development? As, in ascending a mountain, every rise of ground opens before us new and delightful prospects, and gorgeous scenery, and adds grandeur to all above, and beauty to all around and beneath us; so, in the progress of Universalism, we are introduced by every advance in its principles, to purer and better views, to more distinguished energy, to a nearer resemblance of the angels of God—yea, to a greater likeness to the all-wise Jehovah.

The friends of truth in our own country, understand this. They perceive the ennobling influence of Universalism on the human race. They are sensible that a true knowledge of the Scriptures, is the source of a most pure and lofty pleasure—and that a diffusion of its principles, is necessary to the well-being and happiness of mankind;—and that it makes man worthy of his name as an intellectual, and of his destiny, as an immortal being.

Universalism, we have reason to rejoice, is now becoming the centre point which attracts the gaze of many in the world; and its benign influence, notwithstanding the prevalence of Partialism, we believe, is winning more and more widely, every day, both the respect and affection of mankind. They look up to it as the grand moving power, which must give force to the dictates of morality, and plant the elements of peace and purity in every soul. It is the beautiful star in the morning of this latter day, whose early rays promise so much of blessedness, that even Partialists are inclined to bid its ministers "God speed." Our evidence of the truth of this assertion, is the fact, that some, who a few years since were its most inveterate opposers, now esteem it one of the brightest emanations of modern philanthropy—a subject of such sublime and thrilling interest, that one can not but be eloquent in speaking of it.

But in order to attain its highest excellence, truth must be extended. The seed must be sown and watered, and diligently nurtured, if we would rejoice in the yellow harvest. The little acorn must be put into the soil, and by the shines and showers of Summer, the frosts and snows of Winter, be gradually trained up to the strength and firmness of the majestic oak. So the young bud of uncontaminated truth must be nurtured and cherished, that it may bring forth worthy fruit.

Universalism is no poet nor painter; yet he who brings the sweetness of verse to inspire her devotions, does her a most worthy service. The painter who delineates sacred subjects, with the pencil and spirit of an angel, opens the fountains of taste and refinement—cultivates the sensibilities of the soul; and indirectly nurtures and elicits the gentleness and loveliness of her features. Yet he, who with living language, and living thoughts, pleads the cause of universal salvation, and is instrumental in inviting men to her standard, is her best auxiliary. By him her ranks are replenished—her graces set forth—her beauties made known—and her excellency rendered lovely in the eyes of the world.

Every man who has gone but a little way in examining any doctrine of revelation, or any scene of future blessedness, perceives it to be full of interest. And after a somewhat protracted examination, he feels like one, who always thought the narrow arm of the sea on the shore, by which he had long wandered, the great Atlantic; but who in pursuing his walk, comes all at once, in sight of the broad ocean, charming the eye with its majestic beauty and brilliancy—stretched out under the blue heavens—reflecting a glorious sun—rolling onwards its eternal waters—and reaching to the boundary of human vision. How does such a scene in nature fill the soul with unutterable emotions! Yet who can tell, how vast the difference between earth and heaven—between time and eternity—between the wonders of this world and those of the world to come—between the themes of mystery that surprise and delight us here, and the revelations of God's own presence!

If matters that concern man be wonderful, those which concern God must exceed in wonder. And this is the grand store-house from which Universalism draws forth her treasures of heaven. In her light we may come near the Father of spirits. We may hold communion with his infinite attributes. We may gaze, and wonder, and admire, while we see him robed in transcendent glory, and dwelling in inapproachable light. Amid all that is sweet, and lovely, and desirable in heavenly things, the soul may wander abroad, gratifying every hallowed wish—unfolding every power to new and energetic action—imbibing immortal strength—being filled "with all the fulness of God."

Such is the destiny of mankind. In the mere thought of it, the soul glows—heaven and its glorious scenes brightens—new fountains of life seem to burst forth in our path—the spirit unfolds her pinions, and is ready to soar away from mortality. Then let your watchword be "onward," ye ministers of truth! Fear not that you will wrong yourselves, or injure others, by unfolding the Gospel, fraught with such glorious images. Ye friends of humanity! consider how much may be accomplished, by a thrilling paragraph in our periodicals—a Gospel sermon—a hymn where poetry shall combine, in a single stanza, all that is moving and melting, all that is glorious and sublime, in this most glorious and sublime of all themes. The field is wide enough, and the calls for philanthropy pressing enough, to summon into action every faculty—to enlist every affectionate heart—to employ the most brilliant imagination—and to give full play to the noblest intellect.

In order to be successful in spreading the principles of universal salvation, as brought to light in the Gospel, we must understand the governing sentiments and principles of mankind—adapt ourselves to their capacities, circumstances, and wants—bring home the doctrines and hopes of the Gospel to their bosoms—and touch successfully the springs of feeling in the human heart. To be eloquent, persuasive, and successful, we must feel the importance of our subject.

We may fascinate an audience with the elegance of taste, the flash of fancy, and the very lightnings of genius; but nothing will convince the understanding but pure and fervid tenderness. Let the glow of affection be wanting in the services of the sanctuary, and how dull, how lifeless! Moonlight falls not so cold, so powerless on the cold snow, as do the words of an unfeeling preacher on the ears of his audience.

Thus viewed, it will be more clearly seen how very necessary feeling is to the formation of impassioned eloquence; since eloquence must gather her materials from those quarters where taste, talent and feeling only can travel. Every want in life, pleasant or painful—every striking object in nature—every beautiful and instructive effort of art—every peculiarity of circumstance and character in the audience we address, must be collected, analyzed and compared. This being done, we then shall be enabled to describe the loveliness of morality—the attractiveness of virtue—and the hopes of the Gospel beyond the grave, with a vivid conception, forcible illustration, and glowing persuasiveness, which will carry conviction and power to the hearts of those who listen. And what, I ask, can make any one successful in reaching and influencing the heart, but to study and to feel its wants—to kindle with its hopes—and to struggle with its fears:—to understand and explain the causes of its disquietudes—and to know and to tell where it may find repose.

There are passages in the life of every one, which must be cheered, if cheered at all, by the glimpses of benevolence and the softening of the affections. And where can these kindly influences come so well, as from him who believes in universal salvation? And surely he will feel himself blest in imparting them. He will delight, if possessed of a generous sensibility, in alleviating pain and administering hope. He will mingle his tears with those which innocence sheds, and calm the grief in which bereaved affection indulges.

How much are the offices of affection, then, to be prized? In prosperity, we love the man who, in beholding our enjoyments, feels pleasure himself;—and in affliction, the sympathies of a friendly heart, come to us like the ministrings of a pitying angel. Such relief it is the privilege of the Universalist to impart. His belief implies every thing tender, attractive and endearing.—Then let us be ever ready to sanction the refined civilities of society—watchful to cherish every lenient endearment—and prompt to soothe every disturbing sorrow. Let us exhibit the virtues of the Gospel, amid the intercourse of the domestic circle. Then we shall be able, by a serene and affectionate temper, to dispel every shade of sadness and despondency; and like the calm sunlight, to kindle the glow of happiness around us. Let all benevolent action be directed to similar ends, and what will be wanting to make society the image of heaven? For among the saints in glory where the consummation of bliss is brought to pass, and the drama of earth is finished, the powers that were expended here, in promoting the happiness of mankind, will be devoted to rejoicing in the love of God, and over the salvation of the world forever and ever.

Well may we be oppressed with the grandeur of the conceptions that open upon us, and astonished at the glorious revelations of the Gospel. We need not attempt to describe the unutterable emotions that will thrill through our bosoms, when the imagination, like the painted rainbow, will shine brilliant and beautiful—when the rain-cloud of earthly anxiety, and the darkness of earthly motive, shall have subsided towards the horizon. For then the soul will enter upon the ocean of infinity—spread all her sails, not knowing how far she may proceed—will, ere she is aware, receive a gale from heaven, which will waft her out over the bright billows, place her beyond the reach of clouds and storms, where in the brightness that surrounds the throne, she may ride at anchor and enjoy the glorious prospect forever. The emotions of joy that will then break in upon the soul, the pen may as vainly attempt to describe, as may the pencil to give the coloring of those rays of light, which often dart athwart our pathway and illumine our minds with their cheering and benign influence. And until then, let us put forth every exertion to untrammel the prejudiced mind from false notions. Let us with thrilling thoughts, wake up kindred strings in a thousand bosoms, and arouse to benevolent action the dormant elements of society; that the world may be freed from all that is hurtful—that God may be honored—the truth become prevalent, and the sanctuary crown every hill and beautify every valley; while the whole intelligent creation shall send up the morning and evening sacrifice to the beneficent Creator.

CHARITY.

Is it not a fact, that Universalists, in their just abhorrence of the doctrine of endless wrath, are often too sparing in the exercise of charity toward their opposers? True, it appears at first view, that no rational and philanthropic individual can, for a moment, hesitate in choosing between the mild and heavenly features of universal love, as set forth by the Universalist, and the horrid, demoniac picture of wrath, as depicted in the Limitarian description of endless torments; yet there are many circumstances which we are too apt to overlook, that have a great influence over our opposers. I do not allude to the time-serving, popularity-seeking spirit with which too many are governed; for the slaves to such a spirit justly deserve all the contempt that an honest, independent mind is capable of exercising. Neither do I claim much pity for the blind, bigoted, headlong fanatic, who is ready to be made a tool of by aspiring religious demagogues, to drive people to madness and despair; for such pests to society deserve to be brought to their senses by the indignant frowns of all who have the welfare of society at heart: But there are those who would be honest and independent enough to embrace and defend Universalism, were not the prejudices of their education heightened by the conduct of some who make a profession of Universalism, and who frequently are apparently the most active in its promotion, and the most zealous in its defence; but alas! who seem to forget that Universalism is a practical system. It is to such people that our opposers look for the practical tendency of Universalism; and if they perceive that it does not improve their morals and make them better members of society, they very naturally conclude that Universalism, although its theory is beautiful, is incapable of exercising a salutary influence, consequently is not founded in truth.

"I admire your system," said a very amiable lady with whom I was once conversing, "its theory is indeed beautiful, and I hope it may be true; but I can not embrace it as truth, so long as I find among some of its most active professors, those who prefer the gaming table, and the intoxicating bowl to the domestic fireside." It was in vain that I attempted to convince her that they were not influenced nor encouraged by the doctrine they pretended to believe—that we must expect to find hypocrites among all denominations; she still persisted that if Universalism were true, its practical influence would be manifested in the lives of its professors. I reminded her of many, very many whose lives correspond with their professions; but she declared that such would have been good members of society, independently of their religious belief.

And this is not the only instance. I have found many who were disgusted with the dogmas of Limitarianism; but who declared themselves equally opposed to Universalism, until they could witness more of its beneficial effects on society.

Would it not, then, under these circumstances be well—indeed would it not be more in accordance with the spirit of our doctrine, and more conducive to our own enjoyment to find less fault with our opposers, pay less attention to minor differences of opinion among ourselves, and pay more attention to the practical application of Universalism to all the concerns of life. If a philosopher were to warmly recommend a system of philosophy entirely different in character from any in vogue, and neglect to be governed by it himself, we should naturally think but little of him or his system; ought we then to complain that people are slow to embrace Universalism, unless we manifest our conviction of its value by reducing it to practice ourselves? CONFERENCE AT MCLEAN.

Br. GROSH—Agreeable to previous notice a Conference was held at McLean, on the 1st and 2d days of March. Owing to the severity of the weather, the congregation on the first day, especially in the morning, was rather thin; on the second, however, it was respectable, both as to numbers and character, though the weather continued cold and frosty. If we were not honored with the presence of those who have rendered themselves notorious for their fanaticism and for their overstrained and pharisaical pretensions to piety, it is just to say we were favored with the candid, the virtuous, and intelligent of several denominations. The meeting was conducted with order and decency—the season was peculiarly refreshing—the impressions received will doubtless be lasting and salutary—the word was spoken with demonstration and power—the seed fell upon good ground, and we trust the spirit will seasonably appear.

Ministering brethren present.—Brs. M. B. Smith, A. Kinney, C. S. Brown, and Bullard. Br. Smith preached two discourses, the three latter each one discourse. On the evening of the second day, after a short introductory service, "a Concert of Praise" was held, in which the ministering brethren prayed, spoke, and sung alternately—being joined in the latter exercise by the choir and congregation promiscuously. The scene was one of deep and thrilling interest—it was truly joyous, and its effects upon all present could have been no other than those of a pleasing and salutary nature. Indeed, I believe if Universalists generally, should adopt the measure of meeting often in their respective neighborhoods for social religious meetings, it would tend greatly to the furtherance of our spiritual interests, and the spread and prosperity of our cause. W. BULLARD.

VANITY.—The symptoms of vanity are almost infinitely various; there is no genius comprehending a greater variety of species. The silly girl, vain of her dress and complexion, is really one of the least offensive and most pardonable of all; for in proportion to the value of the thing boasted of, is the meanness of the boast: hence, a pedant is more contemptible than a coxcomb.

WHY SHALL WE PRAISE GOD?

"Enter into his gates with thanksgiving and into his courts with praise; be thankful unto him and bless his name. For the Lord is good, his mercy is everlasting; and his truth endureth to all generations." Psalm c: 4, 5.

Gratitude and thanksgiving are ennobling emotions of the soul. Next to the pleasure of doing that which merits thanks, is the pleasure of being grateful for benefits. No man, who has a proper view of what constitutes happiness, and who has ever experienced the all-delightful emotions of gratitude, will be ungrateful. So pleasing—so necessary to the happiness-grasping soul of man is this delightful emotion, that even the pleasure of benefiting others, is enhanced by the pleasure of being grateful to the Being who enabled us thus to do good. How madly blind, then, are we to our own best and highest interests, duty and happiness, when we so frequently, so almost continually neglect reviewing the evidences of God's goodness—the experiences of his bounty—and impressing their value on our hearts, and their benefits on our minds. For when we do realize all these things, are we not happy—when we review them, do we not feel ready to break forth, with the Psalmist, into joy and singing?

From the concluding verse of our text, however, we are assured that all these high and holy joys are derived from, and founded on the estimate of God's character entertained by the Psalmist. If we estimate that character differently, our joys will also be different—if our estimate be higher, clearer, purer, so will be our joy in its contemplation—if lower, confused, and mingled with the fearful or abhorrent—our joys will be dashed with terror, or fade away into indifference or aversion.—Nor must the character of God be holy and benevolent to us, alone—it must be so to others also—if we would thus gratefully thank and praise him in the highest, purest degree. And so, vice versa, if God is good to others only, and not unto us, how can we thank and praise him on our own parts?

I know that much has been written and more said about a totally disinterested religion—but it has not been written nor said by the prophets, nor by our Saviour and his apostles. The religion of Jesus requires man to love himself—to make his self-love the standard of his social love—to nourish and cherish his own frame, and to make this self-preservation the standard by which to measure his regard to those who are nearest and dearest to him. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"—"So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies"—and other injunctions of like nature and meaning, can never be fulfilled, on the principles of a totally disinterested religion. Hence such a religion is not the religion of Jesus, and was not the religion of the beloved John and his fellow Christians—for they loved God, because God first loved them.

Yea, even the advocates for absolute disinterestedness in religion, make the Deity seek his own glory, and therefore a standard for our imitation, in direct opposition to their creeds. Hence it is natural, just, proper, Christ-like and God-like to have self-love, exercise self-preservation, and seek self-happiness—and being so, it is unreasonable, and contrary to the divine law, to ask man to thank God for what is useless, or worse than useless—or praise him for hating us, or for rendering to us perfect, absolute evil; or for doing that which we abhor.

Thus we see that it is for what God is, has been, and will be to us, that we are to praise and thank him—to thank him for what is deserving of thanks, and to praise him for all that is praiseworthy. And as God is good and doeth good—as the Judge of all the earth doeth right—as his goodness is unto all, and his tender mercies over all—as from him cometh every good and every perfect gift—so we feel assured that all God does merits praise, and all he gives us is deserving our thanks and gratefulness. This also seems to be the view of the Psalmist. He does not call on any to be thankful, who are not benefited—nor on any to praise God, before whom a personal reason for doing so, has not been laid.

"It is he that made us, and not we ourselves."—The gift of existence, with all that appertains to it, or is consequent on it, comes from God—he made us and constituted all our powers, and all the circumstances by which they are regulated. Whatsoever he knew would be the result of the existence he gave us, will be the result—and whatsoever will be the result, was clearly and immutably known to him before he created us.

Suppose, now, that this earthly existence was all he made us for—that there was no hereafter—no future existence. Suppose that he gave us eyes that were exquisitely tortured with every ray of light that reached the eyeball, and yet tempted us continually to expose them to the light by some involuntary movement of the muscles, or by depriving them of eye lids. Suppose he covered our frames with no skin, or one so tender, that the constant pressure of the atmosphere caused us incessantly to writhe in severest torture. Suppose he made the senses of hearing, smell and taste most sensitive and acute, and yet provided only discord in all the sounds of art and nature—loathing odors and foetid flavors in every object of scent and food. Suppose our teeth were made merely to ache—our eyes to see phantasms of the most hideous and frightful forms—our stomachs to be constantly sick—and, in short, made us to crawl this life in constant fear, hunger, pain, sickness and torture—would it be our duty to worship him with a joyful noise—to serve him with gladness, and come before him with singing?

If man's existence, on the whole, is a curse—a mere vehicle or container of immortal and infinite agony—is he bound to be thankful for it; seeing that God infallibly foresaw what man would be when created? Suppose to vary the argument, that, the devil had created a human being—does that mere act of creation entitle the devil to be served with joy, and to be praised with gladness, by that being? Look at the question fairly, and without prejudice.

Satanas says to his creature—"Come enter into my courts with thanksgiving, and into my gates with praise—come before me with joy, and serve me with gladness and singing."

"Why," says the creature, "why should I do this?" "Because," says satan "I made you—you did not make yourself did you?" "Ah, but," replies the creature, "what did you make me for?" "Make you for!" says the astonished prince of evil, "to wait forever in the shriek-resounding caverns of hell—to glorify me by your groans and agonies—to show forth my power in you!—come, praise me with joy and gladness—be thankful unto me and bless my name!" "Did you make me expressly for so horrid and cruel an end as that?" "Oh no," sayst the devil, "I did not make you exactly for that purpose. It was my revealed will—my desire—my wish that you might be a happy being; but I knew, when I created you, you would not be. I called you from nonentity, with a certain foresight that your existence would be an endless curse to you. I knew that if you could foresee all that I foresaw, and had your own will, you would have immediately returned back to nonentity—but, still, I desired your happiness, and knowing you would not be happy, created you—and gave you an agency, powers and faculties which I knew must lead you finally to perdition. Now, see how I desire your happiness. I gave you an existence, which I know will be an endless evil to you—I gave you powers, which I know you will use to your endless ruin—and I still continue you in being to all eternity, that I may show forth my justice and glory in your endless woe. Oh, come, then, enter into my courts with thanksgiving, and into my gates with praise; be thankful unto me and bless my name—for I am good to you, and my mercy to you is everlasting."

If there was a personal prince of all evil in the universe, and he had ever created any intelligent being, such might be his language—such his pretences of good—such his malignant conduct, and such his insulting call to praise and thank him. Are there any who will dare say such is the language of God to some of his creatures—such his pretences of goodness, and conduct of evil? I trust not. But wherein does it differ from the language and conduct ascribed to God by many of the creeds and commandments of men? I have taken their own profession of belief, and substituted the devil for God, as more according therewith, and you see how useless it must be to call on men to praise a naker in sincerity and truth, if such is their maker's character!

But such is not the character of our God. He designed our happiness really and truly, and having designed, has provided for it, and has constituted us and the provisions for our salvation in such manner that, ultimately, it will be effected. Not, then, merely because God has made us, but because he has made us for happiness, and will secure his end and aim, does the Psalmist call on men to come to his earthly temples, and by a communion of their spirits with his come before him with joy and gladness; "for the Lord is good, and his mercy is everlasting."

ROMANS VIII: 20.

An article under this head will be found in our columns to day, from Br. L. L. Sadler in reply to Br. E. B. V.'s article in No. 10. The article sent was equivalent to more than seven pages of letter paper, and my apology for curtailing its dimensions so much is—I could not possibly find room for it all, consistent with other engagements, or without delaying it for some time—the subject is too unimportant to our readers to warrant so long an article—and, lastly, I believe all who take any interest in it will be able to make up their minds as fully by what has already been published as if the whole had been inserted. I therefore omitted all that was merely a repetition of what had been offered in reply to me—was merely personal—and that was irrelevant in reply to Br. E. B. V. As to what was offered in reply to me, I had made no reply to call for it; and as to what is new, I give it below, with a reply as brief, hoping that will end the discussion between Br. Sadler and myself. The reader has both our opinions; let him judge for himself. As to Br. E. B. V. he is better able to defend himself than I am, and he will keep to the question I do not doubt. I trust he will so write as to call for but a brief reply, if any.

The paragraphs in Br. Sadler's article, which in courtesy call for my notice, are the following.

"If my views of the passage be correct, we have here developed, in a concise manner, the purposes of God relative to man's final destiny, and the reason assigned for the permission of present evil under the reign of supreme Goodness."

"The latter clause expresses the action of the one who occasioned the subjection, and assigns by way of explanation the reason for ordaining such condition.—To contrast this member of the sentence with the adjunct that speaks of the creature's passivity, or negation of will, in reference to the condition in which he was placed, renders the antithesis very inelegant and inexpressive."

"The giving a reason why such subjection was witnessed, or appointed, and contrasting it with the preceding member of the sentence by the use of the disjunctive 'but,' which serves to continue the sense, or sentiment, and express opposition of meaning in degree, goes to show, that the phrase, 'not willingly,' must have reference to the agent that is recognized in the former and latter clause, as the cause of the subjection. The explanation given for such an appointment, and the phrase 'not willingly,' are put in contrast, which renders it evident, that both refer to the author of said subjection."

If God subjected the creature to vanity (not because the creature willed it, but because He willed the subjection) that the creature should be delivered, etc.; then, surely I can say of my views all that Br. Sadler says of his, and it becomes as strong a proof of universal salvation.

The antithesis expressed by "but," I conceive to be, not between the same objects, but different ones—the creature and the Creator. The creature was not subjected because it willed the subjection, but by reason of Him (the Creator) who subjected the creature in hope to be delivered, etc. Br. Sadler's antithesis would make it read that the creature was subjected, not because He (the Creator) willed the subjection, but by reason of Him (the Creator) who subjected it, etc., which would in my opinion make a very "inelegant and inexpressive" antithesis, if it could be so called at all.

In conclusion—my opinion of the passage remains the same—of E. B. V.'s criticism, the same—and after a careful re-examination of the whole subject, I do not see how Br. Sadler can possibly sustain his positions, or justify his rendering of hupetage ("was made subject") by "subjected," or make God its nominative, instead, of Ktisis ("the creature," or "creation"). Nor have I found a single rule in Macknight, Gerard, Horne, or any other Biblical critic, or any instance in the New Testament, which would justify me in saying that the feminine is sometimes put for the masculine, as Br. S.'s "of course, vice versa," implies; though all agree, and give proofs, that "the masculine is sometimes put for the feminine." And with these very brief remarks to Br. S.'s former and present remarks, I close this article.

MATTHEW III: 12.

"Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire."

In a very acceptable letter lately received from Br. E. B. Mann, he enters some objections to my explanation of the above passage, and offers his own somewhat different in reply. Anxious that our readers should have both sides of every question, where I have presented but one side for their consideration, I present them his views, after reading which they must judge for themselves.

"Br. GROSH—The explanation you give of Matt. iii: 12, in No. 4, current volume, is an old one, but I doubt its correctness. I think the "chaff" means all the chaffy portion of the Law—its external rites and ceremonies—and the "wheat" means all the good part of the same—its divine truth, its universal precepts and god-like injunctions. By gathering these into the "garner," I suppose is meant embodying them in the Gospel—making them a part of the Gospel dispensation. This view I think, will agree with verse 10 of the same chapter; also with Matt. v: 21, 27, 28, 29, 32, etc. Here we see some of the trees that did not bring forth good fruit cut down by the axe (Christ), by the roots, with the spirit of love."

Br. Mann's explanation has the merit of novelty, ingenuity and plausibility to recommend it. Both views were fulfilled by after events, and either will serve for an answer to any application of the text in favor of the cruel and unscriptural doctrine of endless misery.

So much I can say in candor, conscience and courtesy; but as to which is the true explanation, I must yet give the preference to my own views. I do it on what Br. Mann may esteem insufficient reasons; but they are powerful enough to sway my mind.

The phrases "fire" and "unquenchable fire," though held by the early Universalists in this country, to mean the Deity, his love, etc., are more commonly if not always applied in the Scriptures, to mean punishments, and in the latter case, punishments which could not be arrested or terminated by human means. True, even those punishments are proofs of the love of God; for as he can not, in his very nature, delight in them for their own sake, it is evident that he inflicts them for the benefit of the sufferers, in which he can and does delight. But still, they are such manifestations of his love, as we generally term judgments. In this latter sense we consider the phrase, "for our God is a consuming fire." He consumes to purify; but the process yields suffering and anguish, whatever may be its results. He may even consume unto death, as he did in his furnace at Jerusalem; but we are certain, also, that death is not the end of human existence, nor punishment the end of God's government. Both are but beginnings and means to a higher and better end.

But I did not intend to write so much. I will close by observing that, though I regret that we must differ from each other, I also rejoice that we can differ in a friendly Christian feeling—willing to give reason and hear reason—and while we hold opposite opinions, unite in the same spirit. It is this that makes me rejoice in and be proud of the denomination of which we are members. Long may it so remain. A. B. G.

THE RECORD.

A Conference was held in Wales, Mass., on February 16th, and sermons preached by Brs. Gihon, Shrigley, and Chaffee. Br. J. H. Willis was also present, and took part in the services. A Concert of Praise was held in the evening.

Br. Thomas B. Robbins, of Ogdensburgh, St. Lawrence county, a young man of good education, great natural abilities and excellent moral character, has commenced preaching the everlasting Gospel to good acceptance. Most heartily do we rejoice at it, and wish him God speed. Another young man named, Phineas Hathaway, of Fort Ann, has also commenced preaching the "final restitution." Br. J. Barber says, "he preaches to good acceptance." Br. Levi Ballou, of Hallifax, Vt., the brother of Hosea Ballou, 2d, and of Wm. S. Ballou, has just commenced his labors in the ministry of reconciliation. He is the eleventh Universalist preacher of the name of Ballou, in the United States.

Br. Charles Spear, late of Springfield, Mass., has lately received and accepted an invitation to settle with the society at Sandy Bay, same State, and entered upon his labors.

Br. W. A. Stickney has dissolved his connexion as pastor of the Universalist society in Berlin, Conn., where he has hitherto labored to good acceptance.

Br. M. H. Smith was installed as the pastor of the society in Haverhill, Mass., on February 21st. Sermon by Br. H. Ballou, 2d. Brs. H. Jewell, J. A. Gurley, and S. Cobb, took parts in the services. Evening stormy, but the audience was large notwithstanding.

The Universalist meeting-house in Williamstown, Vt., was dedicated on March 15th. Sermon by Br. R. Streeter. Br. J. Smith, (who has preached with the society one-fourth of the time heretofore,) and Br. J. B. Morse were present, and took parts in the services. The house is forty by fifty feet, neatly finished, and surmounted with a cupola and bell. A gentleman in Lynchburg, Va., (who occasionally preaches himself,) has lately erected at his own expense, a Universalist meeting-house in that place. It is of brick, two stories high, forty-four by fifty-four feet, and situated on third street, next to Main street. It was dedicated on February 19th, by Br. L. F. W. Andrews. He thinks five hundred dollars could be raised to support preaching, and a good school could be obtained, for which a building will be furnished gratuitously. The Universalist meeting-house in Cincinnati, O., has lately undergone a thorough repair—the basement has been fitted up for the Sunday school—the house handsomely painted within and without—the aisles carpeted, pews cushioned, etc. Br. West deserves credit for his exertions as their pastor.

A public discussion which lasted four days was lately held in Straford, Conn., by Br. S. J. Hillyer, and Rev. Ira Ferris, Methodist. The Methodist house being insufficient to hold the audience, the Congregational house was obtained for the last three days. Notwithstanding the bad weather from one thousand to one thousand two hundred persons were present. A spirit of inquiry has been excited in that region, which must result in much advantage to the cause of truth.

An Anti-swearing Society has lately been formed in Lansingburg, in this State, under the auspices of Br. Bell. The address by Br. Rayner. Since Universalists have commenced the formation of societies to put down particular vices, as in Temperance Societies, etc., we suppose they will soon form Moral Reform or Seventh Commandment associations also. By the Emancipator we learn that in Boston a large meeting was lately held to establish a Universalist Anti-slavery periodical. They censure our periodicals, for not opening their columns and taking a decisive stand in favor of the immediate abolition of slavery. The meeting embraces the names of several respectable ministering and lay brethren. What will be done, time must determine.

A friend in Detroit, Mich., has sent us two numbers of a Monthly paper called "The World," edited by Alihu Bordan!—correspondent Br. E. B. Wheelock, of Plymouth. It is omnivorous; treating of all things known in the world—news, politics, religion, etc.

The firm hitherto conducting the Universalist Union, under the style of "P. Price and Co.," was dissolved on March 25th. The business will hereafter be conducted by P. Price. The Editors of the paper, with the addition of Br. L. S. Everett, continue as heretofore.

Considerable excitement was lately caused in Albany by Rev. Calvin Munroe, formerly of the Restorationist denomination, now a Baptist. He obtained leave to preach in the Universalist meeting-house against Universalism, on February 7th, backed by Dr. Welch and others, as a man in good standing in their order. Br. Williamson was to have the privilege of replying.—After Mr. M. had occupied nearly two hours and a half, (probably to occupy time and thus prevent a reply,) Br. W. replied for forty minutes. Notice was then given that Br. W. would continue the subject on the next Friday evening. Mr. M. agreed to attend and reply. But when the evening came Mr. M. sent word that his brethren had advised him not to attend. The excitement this attack and retreat caused, induced a gentleman belonging to no denomination, to offer, through Br. S. Van Schaack, $200 in gold if all or either of the Rev. Drs. Sprague, Welch, Campbell or Kirk would meet Mr. Williamson and debate the subject for four days—i. e. 50 dollars per day. The offer was not accepted, though the conditions were varied so as to allow the money to be appropriated to any religious or benevolent purposes if the Rev. D. D.'s preferred to enter the lists on such conditions. "Their strength is to sit still." A. B. G.

UNION AND PIONEER.

By an Extra issued by Br. Price, we have received the very gratifying intelligence that Br. L. S. Everett has united the latter with the former paper, and he becomes a co-editor of the same. To those who have regretted deeply the bickerings of the Pioneer with the Union, this bare announcement will give pleasure. We wish for the union (without a capital U) all the success and prosperity its projectors anticipate, and hope the Union (with a capital) will be doubly instrumental of good with the present accession to its circulation, its editorial departments, and correspondence. It never has contained aught which Universalists could have wished omitted, a praise that can seldom be bestowed on a weekly periodical, and for talent, typography and price (with or without a capital P) may compare with any periodical, either religious, political or literary, in the United States.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Dr. B.—writes with spirit and understanding, and will be read with pleasure and profit.—Br. E. G.'s letter to a certain Elder is good, but merely alluding, as it does, to certain incidents which are not known to us and our readers, its publication will only serve to tantalize a curiosity it does not satisfy. Doubtless it would be very interesting to those in the neighborhood where all the events are known; but our readers there embrace but a very small portion of those for whom we cater. The obituary notices by Br. J. A. A. are not remembered, and can not be found. I think they could not have been received.

Apology.—For a number of weeks past I have been troubled with what are commonly termed "Job's comforters"—and part of the time I have been confined by them to the house for days together. Consequently matters dependent on my presence in the office—or on good temper—may occasionally be the worse off for the boils, as well as my poor tortured body. I, however, have one comfort in enduring them, which my readers and correspondents may not enjoy—they are said to be healthy! There are few that will not agree with me, that they had rather have the health without them, than with them.

A. B. G.

PRIZE TALES AND ESSAYS.—A number of articles have been received, but owing to lameness, etc., I have not yet been able to select a committee. This will be attended to soon, and a meeting and announcement of decision will be had at as early a day as possible.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in April by Br. WHITNEY at Paines Hollow—Br. BRITTON at Brownville—Br. Sias at Perch River, and at Jenks' school house in the evening—Br. M. B. SMITH at Burlington Flats, (and on the third Sunday in each month thereafter during the year,)—Br. NEWELL at Russia—Br. R. O. WILLIAMS at Amsterdam—Br. GROSH in this city—Br. C. B. BROWN at Oswego—Br. L. C. BROWNE in Albany—Br. WILLIAMSON at Fort Plain.—Br. Wm. QUEAL will preach in Churchville in the forenoon, and in the afternoon deliver a funeral discourse, on the demise of the daughter of Mr. Samuel Shepard.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. GROSH at Norwich Corners, (Litchfield,) and in Wetmore's school-house in the evening—Br. WHITNEY in this city—Br. C. B. BROWN at Hastings, A. M., and lecture at Union Square, at 3 P. M.

Black River Association.—This Association of Universalists will meet in the village of Champion, on the third Wednesday and following Thursday of June next, (21st and 22d.) Shall we have a full delegation from all our societies? Will ministers within our limits be faithful to attend? Will ministers from abroad render us all convenient assistance? P. MORSE, Standing Clerk.

The Quarterly Conference of the Universalist church in Oswego county, will be held at Mexico, next Sunday—the second Sunday—beginning at 10, A. M. Br. J. Foster is expected to officiate. C. B. B.

The third Quarterly Conference of the Ontario Association, will be held in Victor, on Saturday and Sunday, April 29th and 30th. A general attendance, particularly of the ministering brethren, is earnestly solicited.

K. T.

The First Universalist society in Mexico, will hold their annual meeting, on Wednesday, 12th inst., at 2, P. M. General attendance is requested. C. B. B.

POETRY.

THE HOUR OF PRAYER.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Child, amidst the flowers at play,
While the red light fades away;
Mother, with thine earnest eye
Ever following silently;
Father, by the breeze of eve
Called thy harvest-work to leave;
Pray!—ere yet the dark hours be,
Lift the heart and bend the knee!

Traveller, in the stranger's and Far from thine own household band;
Mourner, haunted by the tone
Of a voice from this world gone;
Captive, in whose narrow cell
Sunshine hath not leave to dwell;
Sailor, on the darkening sea—
Lift the heart and bend the knee!

Warrior, from that battle won
Breathest now at set of sun!
Woman, o'er the lowly slain
Weeping on his burial plain:
Ye that triumph, ye that sigh,
Kindred by one holy tie,
Heaven's first star alike ye see—
Lift the heart and bend the knee!

European Correspondence of the United States Gazette.

SOUTHAMPTON, England, January, 1837.

You may infer from my last, that this town exhibits a somewhat singular mixture of styles—a little like a centaur,—or an American meeting house with a Gothic tower on the top of it. It is, in fact, amphibious, and can get a living, in case of emergency, in either element. It has considerable trade, and does, among the rest, most of the English commerce with the Jersey and Guernsey Isles. This water too, is a most beautiful riding ground for the yachts;—a pleasure which has become in this country, you know, one of the luxurious sciences of the day. The festival called the “Regatta” is held here in the summer. This, with the other navigation and the trade which supplies both, gives the town a business air. Another income arises, too, from the fashionable themselves. Half Southampton is in fact all bustle, and the other half all style: the former for the most part enclosed by the latter, which occupies the beautiful environs of the town. What with both, High street “below bar,” and “above bar,” presents to a stranger a full confirmation of this account. Indeed the town is almost all one street; having extended itself, in later days, all in one dimension, as lusty boys, at a certain age, grow great and tall. It may be described as a slice, or strip, of a city; or rather of two; say, a piece of Liverpool or London, and another of Bath or Brighton—the thoroughfare of one, and the ton of the other—cut out and woven or “spliced” into one. The union of the two, produces an amusing compound, and gives at some seasons a very tolerable notion of the various classes of English society on a reduced plan.—Races, capital baths, a gallery of paintings, and archery clubs, with several highly observed galadys, and a number of splendid regular balls,—together with the fact that this is the way of all the travellers who visit the beautiful Isle of Wight, opposite,—contribute to render it, in its way and time, perhaps one of the liveliest little places in Europe.

I have alluded to some of the ancient foundations in Southampton. These are of course very numerous in a country so old and wealthy as this is—not to say so ostentatious and superstitious, or so conscientious and religious, as it has been. These at Southampton, some of them, are perhaps as characteristic specimens of the old charities, as can be found.

Take “Thorner's almshouse” for an example. This was a citizen of the place,—a Dissenter,—who died in 1690; and is the same person who gave, if I recollect rightly, £500 to Harvard University. That came from an estate in London, and this establishment was founded out of the residue of the same estate. How different the results! Not less so than the sites are distant from each other. This is devoted to a small number of poor widows who receive two shillings a week!

Another of these whimsical institutions has been merged in the Poor House, as to its management, but still continues to maintain a master and six lads, to be bred for the woolen trade, in which Southampton has had a considerable share from a very ancient date.

Then, here is Taunton's charity, for twenty boys.—Originally, they were to be bred for the sea, but now a trade is allowed them; and in either case, five guineas are provided to be given them on their first sailing forth into life. Connected with this bounty are sixteen annuities, of £10 each, to “decayed” old men or women—who,

I need not say are never wanting whenever the bait is held out.

There is a modern case of the same fantastical philanthropy—that of a Miss Bird, who, as late as 1820, left £1400, in three per cents, to go, after the decease of certain servants, to six poor single women of the town; £5 each per annum, for life, after 60 years of age—and belonging to the Church of England. For these worthies, the good woman has thoughtfully provided, also, an annual dinner, all the minutiae of which, down to the fowls, bacon, joints, vegetables, pudding, etc., are solemnly regulated by her will; including, also, a glass of wine, to drink her health withal, and half a guinea for a clergyman to say grace on the occasion—in a gown. The waiter is allowed half a crown, too, and the cook a whole one. Certes, here is a charity which “blesses him that gives, and him that takes”—but most especially, I should say, the latter.

Another description of these benevolent drolleries is preserved at the ferry, in the shape of a curious little old Cross-House, of which the tradition is, that the founder, having taken a fatal cold herself in waiting for the boat, established this shelter by a special legacy, to protect posterity from a like misfortune.

A very different curiosity—and not quite so charitable—is a vast massy tower, of Henry the Eighth's erection, once used for a fortification, but now used for a jail! I doubt if Christendom can show a more formidable-looking insinuation of the sort. The walls are of immense thickness, as well as great height. The windows are deep, gloomy port-holes, which a man must be wall-eyed indeed even to see through,—much more to make his escape. However, as grotesque as the appropriation of such a structure to such a purpose seems, there is a decent economy in it, to say the least. It is not all the old muniments that have come to so good an end. If it never should keep any more enemies out of the kingdom it may keep some of the rogues in; and Americans certainly will not complain of that provision.

FORTY YEARS AGO,

Literature meant solid learning, and was supported by common sense. Refined nonsense had no advocates, and was pretty generally kicked out of doors.

Forty years ago—men of property could labor, and wear homespun to church. Women could spin and weave, make butter and cheese, whose husbands were worth thousands.

Forty years ago—there were but few merchants in the country—few insolvent debtors, and very rarely a person imprisoned for debt.

Forty years ago—the young ladies of the first respectability learned music, but it was the humming of the wheel, and learned the necessary steps of dancing in following it. Their piano forte was a loom, their parasol a broom, and their novels the Bible.

Forty years ago—the young gentlemen boed corn, chopped wood at the door, and went to school in the winter to learn reading, writing and arithmetic.

Forty years ago—there was some respect paid to old age, to the minister of the parish and to Sunday.

Forty years ago—there was no such thing as balls in summer, and few in winter—except snow balls.

Forty years ago—if a mechanic promised to do your work, you might depend on his word, and if a gentleman pledged his word, the thing would be done.

MARRIAGES.

By Rev. A. B. Grosh, 26th ult., Mr. LEMUEL PITTMAN, to Miss ELIZABETH CUSHING, all of this city.

In Leyden, March 21, by Rev. J. A. Aspinwall, Mr. HORATIO A. AUGUR, to Miss MARGARET J. MUNN

Also, on the 28, by the same, Mr. JOHN TRIPP, to Miss LUCY ANN DOYLE, all of Leyden.

At Clinton, March 16th, by Rev. S. R. Smith, Mr. HARRY JONES, of New-Hartford, to Miss HANNAH BLISS, of Smithfield.

In Guilford, January 6th, by Rev. N. Poolittle, Mr. DAVENPORT PARKER to Miss WAITY SHELDON.

In Oxford, February 9th, by the same, Mr. MERCHANT WARREN, of Greene, to Miss ADALINE MOURTON.

In Hamilton, on the 10th of January, by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. PRESTON SMITH, to Miss LOVINA PORTER; In Cazenovia, on the 5th of February, by the same, Mr. SAMUEL BASSELL, of Sidney, Delaware county, to Miss JANE ELMORE, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Oxford, Chenango county, on the 26th of October last, LUKE METCALF, aged 73 years.

All deaths have not the same effect upon us; but by the one we now record, we are reminded that a good man has fallen and a strong pillar has been removed from the Christian church. He has been cut down “like a shock of corn that was fully ripe,” and called away from our midst to his everlasting rest. His life was a practical commentary upon the glorious doctrine of a world's salvation, and a true exhibition of pure morality and virtue. On a review of his past course he might have adopted the following language—“I put on righteousness, and it clothed me: my judgment was as a robe and a diadem. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame. I was a father, to the poor; and the cause I knew not I searched out. When the ear heard me, then it blessed me; and when the eye saw me it gave witness to me: because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me; and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.”

May the abundant consolations of divine mercy, and the cheering hopes of immortal life, as refreshing to the afflicted soul as the dews of heaven to the thirsty plant, be the rich portion of the surviving partner and mourning relatives. N. D.

In the town of Norwich, on 15th of March, of apoplexy, Mrs. CHARITY BENEDICT, aged 55 years.

The subject of this notice was esteemed in life and lamented in death. We can not say of the deceased, as of her bereaved husband and children, that she was a believer in the final restitution of all things; yet by a well ordered life she exhibited the spirit and principles of the Christian religion, and we trust she has gone to that haven of eternal rest, where in God's own time, she will rejoice in seeing all for whom a Saviour died, emancipated from the bondage of sin and death, and admitted to the joys and purity of immortal life.

At his residence at York Mills, on March 18th, Mr. ASA CHAPMAN, aged 69 years. Mr. C. had for some time, been a sufferer from dropsy—and endured the keenest pain for weeks, with the greatest composure and Christian fortitude. He had been a firm believer in the salvation of all men for many years, and died as he had lived, rejoicing in that comforting truth. Some attempts were made to shake his faith, without success—and there were those who ventured to report, even before his death, that he had abandoned his profession. But it was his happiness to proclaim his hope of universal salvation while he could speak. Mr. C. was an honest and upright man.

His funeral was attended by a large concourse of those who knew his worth and respected his memory.

Communicated.

In Hopkinton, 7th ult., of apoplexy, Mr. ELI ROBERTS in the 68th year of his age. His funeral was attended by Rev. J. Simonds.

In Oran, on the 22d of January, last, Mr. CALVIN FOSTER, aged 38 years. Br. Foster was a Universalist in the true sense of the word, and died rejoicing in the hope that is like “an anchor to the soul, sure and steadfast.” Sermon by Br. Woolley, from Psalm cvii: 8.

In Pompey, on the 1st of March, Mr. WILLIAM K. LEWIS, aged 24 years. Mr. Lewis was a young man of good repute in society, and has left a wife and one child. Sermon by Br. Woolley, from Matthew vi: 10.

In Pompey, on the 1st of March, Mr. TIMOTHY SWEET, aged 85 years. In faith Br. Sweet was a Universalist—in practice an honest man. Sermon by Br. Woolley, from Romans xii: 36.

In Monroe, Ohio, February 11th, Mrs. JULIA ANNA PEACOCK, (consort of Jacob Peacock, daughter of Nathaniel Webster and eldest grand-daughter of Benjamin Abbot, of that place,) in the 21st year of her age. She died in the full assurance of a glorious immortality, retained her senses to the last. The funeral was attended by Rev. Mr. Preston, Methodist, and a discourse delivered in accordance with his text—“For me to live is Christ, to die is gain.” Com.

A GRAND-FATHER'S LETTERS TO HIS GRAND-CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

LETTER FIRST.

MY DEAR CHILDREN—Ye are now far removed from your grand-pa, who has now but little hope of ever seeing you again in this state of existence. But your removal has not, in the least, diminished my desire for your improvement, your progress, and your happiness. Indeed I do think I feel a deeper and more tender concern for your welfare, than when ye were present with me. And as my years forbid the prospect of many more days, I feel as if I should like to employ the few that may be left, in working out something that may contribute to the welfare of my dear children and pupils—in making out a legacy of counsels, and instructions, and exercises, to which ye may look back in future years, with a grateful sense of its having aided you in forming your opinions, principles, and habits, and as a memorial of a grand-father's love. And whether I am spared to write you many letters or only a few—to leave you a large or but a small legacy, I do beseech you, forget not a grand-father's affectionate endeavors to raise you above the average and ordinary attainments of humanity, and to cultivate the seeds of good within you into a more near approximation to the Divinity. And now may he who loves you more than any or all your earthly parents and friends—may He be the God of your youth, and your guide through each succeeding year, and my fondest wishes, and most fervent prayers will be all fulfilled.

You will remember that in conversation, I have repeatedly endeavored to impress on you the many important advantages which you would without doubt, derive from commencing each day of your lives in a solemn, thoughtful, and prayerful mood. To this topic my thoughts do frequently revert. I deem the daily practice of such a mode of beginning the day, as of first importance, and therefore, no unsuitable subject for my first letter to you. I hope your own experience can furnish confirmation of the truth and reality of all the benefits which the reports and statements of others have told us, in regard to this practice. If I could only effectually persuade you to the performance of this one little task, I should not think all my labors and all my anxieties ill-rewarded. It would lay the foundation for many, I might say all, other excellencies. Do then, my dear children, do for my sake, often meditate upon what I have said to you upon this subject; often turn to the brief recapitulation of my conversations on the subject in this letter—and as you value self-satisfaction, and peace, and prosperity, forget not, in the morning, the presence of your heavenly Father; and forget not to spend a few of its first moments in serious thoughtfulness and prayer, as if you really did feel that God was of a truth present with you.

You may recollect that I endeavored to persuade you to the practice of morning seriousness and devotions, by adducing the testimony as to its benefits, which those who have experienced them, have left upon record. You may remember the following by Morton, "That Christian has no reason to expect the blessing of Heaven upon the duties of the day, who fails, in the morning, to give his first thoughts and affections to God. As soon as we awake, our hearts should be in heaven. We owe God, in the morning, the first fruits of our reason; before we think of other things, for every day is but the lesser circle of our lives,

We should begin with God, before earthly things encroach upon us, and season our hearts with the thoughts of his holy presence. That is the means to make the fear of God abide upon us all the day." The testimony of the amiable and interesting Henry Martyn, (Memoirs by Sargent,) is peculiarly impressive to my mind. He says "setting a watch over my first thoughts, and endeavoring to make them humble and devout, I find to be an excellent preparation for prayer, and a right spirit during the day." In another part of his memoirs we find a reflection bearing indirectly on this subject. "How many of my days are lost, if their worth is to be measured by the standard of a prevailing heavenly-mindedness." The eloquent Jeremy Taylor speaks in this wise of the benefits of considering the Divine presence: "It is an excellent help to prayer; it is an excellent defence against evil influences according to the saying of St. Anthony, 'There is one way of overcoming our spiritual enemies—spiritual mirth, and a perpetual bearing of God in our minds,' it is apt to enkindle holy desires of the enjoyment of God, because it produces joy when we do enjoy him; it helps to recollection of mind, and restrains the scatterings and looseness of wandering thoughts; and it establishes the heart in good purposes, and leadeth to perseverance in holy living, when we see ourselves placed in the eye of God, who sets us on to work, and will reward us plentifully." Dr. Channing, whose works are almost daily in your hands, has beautifully and forcibly said: "This morning devotion, not only agrees with the sentiments of the heart, but tends to make the day happy, useful, and virtuous. Having cast ourselves on the mercy and protection of the Almighty, we shall go forth with new confidence to the labors and duties which he imposes. Our early prayer will help to shed an odor of piety through the whole life. God having first occupied, will more easily recur to the mind. Our first step will be in the right path, and we may hope a happy issue. If our circumstances will allow the privilege it is a bad sign when no part of the morning is spent in prayer; if God find no place in our minds at the early and peaceful hour, he will hardly recur to us in the tumults of life. Our piety is suspicious, if we can renounce, as too many do, the pleasures and benefits of early prayer, rather than forego the senseless indulgence of unnecessary sleep. What! we can rise early enough for business. We can even anticipate the dawn, if a favorite pleasure or an uncommon gain requires the effort. But we can not rise, that we may bless our great Benefactor, that we may arm ourselves for the severe conflicts to which our principles are to be exposed. We are willing to rush into the world, without thanks offered or a blessing sought. From a day thus begun, what ought we to expect but thoughtlessness and guilt." Dr. Channing, yea all of these pious men, have spoken impressively and feelingly, "from the heart to the heart," just because they have spoken from their own experience of the truth and reality of what they affirm. May ye all be able, from your own experience likewise, to speak at an early day on the same subject with the fervency and the forcibleness of real feeling. May ye know and feel the pleasures and the benefits of early prayer.

I shall only add to the above testimonies in favor of the blessings and the benefits of a prayerful and reverential frame of mind, and feeling and acting as if in the presence of our exalted yet compassionate Parent, what may be considered the testimony of the All-Knowing himself. In Genesis xvii: 1, you read according to the common version, thus:—"The Lord appeared unto Abram and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect." Since the first day on which I read this verse in the original Hebrew, and long before I viewed it in the light according to which I am now about to use it; I thought this translation did not give either the sense, the force, or the beauty of the passage. I then, and yet would translate the latter part of the verse:—"Conduct thyself as if in my presence, and thou shalt become very perfect." This appears, to me the true meaning of the original words. I have not met with any similar translation or view of the passage in any of the Commentators, but this want of confirmation from the authority of others does not, in the least, detract from my confidence in its being the intended sense, nor do I less highly prize the consolatory and cheering nature of the testimony. Indeed, in this view of the passage, it has been to me a frequent and most animating subject of meditation. I can imagine that our heavenly Parent, who is engaged in elevating and drawing all men to an approximation to His perfection, thus, in His word, and likewise in the lessons of our own experience, is saying to each of us, His dear but distant children, "I have so arranged and ordered the constitution of the external universe and of the human mind that many things tend to suggest to your thoughts an early, a constant, at least an oft-recurring recollection of my nature, my character, and my operations. In the morning, especially, are there many circumstances and events which are designed to withdraw your thoughts from things below, and to elevate them and fix them upon me. The feverish agitation of your spirits produced by your daily employments, and your intercourse with your brethren, your quiet sleep and rest have allayed and soothed. Like the Sabbath—the day of repose of body and spirit, the morning is a period of stillness and solemnity. All without is peaceful and tranquil, and your spirits are so constituted as naturally and spontaneously to sympathize with the scene. The returning light of day, and the calmness of surrounding nature tend to direct your minds to the 'Father of lights' and the 'God of peace.' The spirit yet unsullied and unabsorbed in the love and pursuit of the world, naturally breathes an early aspiration after emancipation from the darkness and the doubts of its feeble being and infantile powers, and longs for more knowledge, more certain and more satisfying insight, relative to all things, but chiefly the things that concern its peace. Wearied with the storms, the toils, and restlessness of the world, and of tumultuous passions, the peacefulness and tranquillity of morning suggest the prayer. 'O that I had the wings of a dove, that I might flee away and be at rest.' Or the thought of the duties, trials, and temptations which each day brings along with it, suggests the desire and the effort after a more vigorous resistance of evil, and a more energetic 'following-after' that which is good. And of a similar tendency are many of the suggestions which a new day brings. When you have indulged in such meditations, and cultivated the benign influence which they exercise upon the feelings and moods of the mind, ye have been sensible of a better spirit, of a nobler employment, of an upward progress. Forget not these peaceful and pleasant moments, but endeavor often to renew them, and to recall your thoughts to the contemplation of what I am, and what I would have you and all my intelligent offspring to become. From such occupation of your thoughts there will arise, (ye can not doubt it from what you have already experienced), a deeper and more habitual impression of my being ever present with you. Ye will endeavor to make your thoughts and your actions more free from imperfections and guilt, more worthy my inspection and approval. Thus will your superiority over, and subjugation of your evil and vain propensities be strengthened, and your powers and habits of well-doing be confirmed. Having begun the day as if in my presence, ye will be more likely to remain in my fear all the day long. As I said unto Abram, I say to you, by cultivating and maintaining such meditations and such impressions of my presence with you, ye will be daily making progress—daily dying unto sin or wrong-doing, and living unto righteousness or right-doing. The feeling of my presence and approval will animate you to virtuous efforts more and more strenuous; and my felt disapprobation will check the beginnings of evil, and will bring with it a repentance that needeth not to be repented of. Continue so to walk, and at length ye shall be perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect.”—Such is an expansion of the sentiment contained in the above quoted verse.

Now, that the testimony of these good men and of God himself may bear fruit in your souls, and make you, like Enoch, to “walk with God,” is the fervent desire and prayer of one who dearly loves you.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER X.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

RELIGIOUS OPINIONS.

That man is by nature, a religious being, is a truth so evident, and so universally acknowledged, that it has passed into an axiom. A religious propensity or a desire to worship is one of the constituent principles of the human mind. Wherever a human being is found, throughout the globe, this religious principle is perceived, leading him to seek out and adore some object, power or being, whom he believes exercises a control over his enjoyments and his destiny. If he can not perceive properties calling for worship in one object, he will in another—if he is ignorant of, or disbelieves in the existence of one supreme, intelligent Being, he will worship three or a thousand—or will reverence a beast, a reptile, a block, or unintelligent matter. This religious propensity, like the other powers of mind, must be cultivated and enlightened, ere it can impart all the benefit of which it is capable—and when so enlightened, it becomes the source of the purest happiness within the reach of man on earth. But when it is uncultivated and swayed by ignorance, doubt or superstition, it leads to the belief of the wildest vagaries of the imagination and to much mental pain.

An enlightened and consistent religious belief, should be viewed by youth, as one of the first and most important of human acquisitions. It forms a stable and secure basis, upon which all the proper enjoyments of life can be safely founded. All other sources of earthly happiness, depend upon many contingencies, and are liable to fluctuation and decay. But a reasonable and scriptural system of religion, when once firmly settled in the mind, is subject to no variation from time or events. It is a pure stream of running water, whose fountain is far removed, alike from the scorching heat of Summer and the icy chains of Winter. Prosperity can not dry it up, neither can adversity freeze it. In seasons of success, it heightens every comfort, and it turns the edge of the keenest afflictions. It is a friend that never forsakes; but stands by the firmer, when its assistance is most needed.

I am aware that youth, generally, are inclined to view the subject of religion in an unfavorable light. But I attribute this disinclination to the manner and form in which the topic has been presented to them, rather than to any innate aversion. They have been led—or, rather misled—to look upon religion as something gloomy, melancholy, fearful—as something calculated to deprive them of the amusements and enjoyments proper to their age—something that makes life sad, tasteless and wearisome. But I would say to the youth whose eye is resting on these lines, that such views of religion are radically and wholly erroneous. Words of purer truth were never uttered, than those contained in the poet's stanza :—

“Religion never was designed
To make our pleasures less.”

It never was designed by its Author to take from you one enjoyment, proper to you as a rational and moral being, or to deprive you of a single emotion of true pleasure—it never was intended to make you melancholy or in any way unhappy. But the object and influences of the pure religion of the Gospel, are directly the reverse. So far from depriving you of enjoyment, the religion of the Redeemer would make you happy. And to this end it is designed, to point out to you, the true pleasures from the false—the sources of real gratification, in distinction to those that are deceitful and unsatisfying. It would enable you to distinguish between the pure gold, and those objects which are but gilded—between the substance and the shadow. True religion would induce you to avoid those practices, sometimes falsely termed pleasure, which lead to degradation, wretchedness and ruin, and which always leave the sting of death; and in their place, would impart those enjoyments which are pure and permanent, and which increase in value as age advances. True religion is not designed to overshadow the pathway of life with the dark clouds of despondency, but to cheer the track of existence with the bright sunshine of peace and contentment—a sunshine that will beam upon you with its most vivid brightness, in those moments when you would otherwise be surrounded by darkness and despair.

Do you not perceive, my young friends, the great importance of endeavoring to cultivate your religious faculties? Would you avoid unhappiness and degradation? would you enjoy pleasure, comfort, peace? Obtain correct views of religion, and you will assuredly escape the former and secure the latter, to as great an extent as imperfect mortals can expect in this state of existence. I have said correct views of religion, because erroneous religious sentiments, can not produce these beneficial results. Indeed error in religion, is one of the most fruitful sources of wretchedness. There are false sentiments sometimes conveyed under the garb of Christianity, which fill the mind of the believer with pain and anguish inexpressible—and the more firmly they are believed, the more dreadful are the consequences. But these sentiments, remember, pertain not to the religion of Jesus Christ. They are errors engrafted upon the lovely system of the Gospel, in those long centuries of darkness and ignorance, which soon succeeded the apostolic age. With proper scrutiny these errors can readily be detected. There is such an incongruity, such a want of harmony, and such a perfect contradiction between them and all the prominent and benevolent characteristics of the Gospel, that the clear and unprejudiced mind, can at once distinguish between their teachings and their origin. While the teachings of one, are every thing kind, merciful, and benevolent, the other promulgates all that is dark, and horrid, and cruel—while one originated from infinite Wisdom on high, the other is the unholy fruit of the disordered imaginations of men!

In forming your religious opinions, it is necessary that great caution be exercised, or you may imbibe error instead of truth. I will mention a few rules that will assist you in your researches on this important subject.

Let reason be the guiding star in all your investigations. God has formed you reasoning beings; and he could have had no object in imparting this high faculty, but that you should exercise it on all subjects within your cognizance. To disregard the dictates of this reason is derogatory to your character, extremely dangerous to your peace, and an abuse of the most valuable earthly gift of your Creator. You should perceive the truth of these remarks, and permit them to sink deep into your minds, before you commence settling your religious views. With reason, unswayed by passion or prejudice, for your guide, you can hardly err in religion; but deprived of its directing light, all is darkness and uncertainty, and without fail, you will grope your way into that error which generates misery.

I am aware that it has been fashionable with certain sectarists, to decry the exercise of reason upon the subject of religion. But you should distrust all such exhortations. They are never resorted to except to support error and delusion—they are never brought forward but as a last resort to chain mankind to doctrines and creeds that are passing away before the increasing light of Gospel truth. Reflect. Suppose you were to comply with such instructions, and adopt the rule not to consult your reasoning faculties in regard to the subject of religion. Do you not perceive the degradation of such a condition? Do you not discover that you would be liable to adopt as truth, every absurdity, every wild vagary of the human imagination, however incongruous or monstrous? Your wisdom will dictate the propriety of avoiding a course so dishonorable to your high endowments. You will make it an invariable rule never to adopt a sentiment within your comprehension, that is not in perfect accordance with reason.

I would here caution you that there is an obvious and important distinction between a principle that is unreasonable, and one that is above reason, or beyond the reach of your reasoning faculties. That the flowers of the field and the trees of the forest, grew from the earth in a gradual progression, is reasonable—to maintain on the contrary, that they sprang forth at once, in full growth, and proportion, would be unreasonable—but to account for the whole process by which this phenomenon is produced—to understand the art by which nature paints the rose and the lily, in colors so beautiful and dazzling as far to surpass all man's imitative art—is beyond reason! Let these distinctions be kept in view, and applied in your religious investigations. That it must have required a Being possessing infinite intelligence, and omnipotent power, to create all these countless worlds and systems scattered through immensity of space, and originate those laws by which their motions are guided with so much precision—is a reasonable proposition.—No sane mind can throw off this conviction. But whence that mighty Being came, the mode of his existence, and the manner of exercising his powers, are subjects entirely above our reason—beyond the utmost stretch of our limited capacities. Were these subjects audibly explained to us by an angel from on high, we could not comprehend them with our present feeble powers. But because our weak faculties can not grasp these topics, shall we revert to the other extreme, and declare that no God exists? Consistent, well-balanced minds do not reflect in this manner. The one would be to the same degree unreasonable, that the other is above reason. It is your prerogative and your duty, to follow and adopt the conclusions of reason, as far as your faculties can ascend. But there is a limit which will bound its upward progress, and here your researches must cease—it is in vain to endeavor to penetrate beyond this bound—your every effort will be baffled. But because you can not exceed this limit of the human intellect, should you doubt or disbelieve that which is reasonable, within your comprehension? The scholar who should contend that because he can not solve Euclid's problems, therefore he has reason to doubt that two added to three, makes five, would be considered extremely ignorant! Does it not display equal inconsistency, to disbelieve one of the most reasonable and self-evident truths that ever appealed to the human mind—viz., the existence of an intelligent Creator—simply because the human faculties can not span infinity, and understand the mode of his being? Every discerning youth, will at once perceive the absurdity of such a course, and avoid the rock upon which so many have foundered.

I deem it important again to warn you against the influence of fear. This debasing passion should not be permitted to exercise any control in your decisions upon religious sentiments. Fear was not made umpire of the mind, to decide between truth and error—for it can not possibly distinguish the one from the other. If you permit fear to usurp the throne of reason, and to reign with triumphant sway over the reflections and conclusions of the mind, you commit treason against your own nature, and enter into a bondage more grievous than the chains and stripes of bodily slavery. Give the mental reins into the hands of fear, and you will be driven into fallacies the most absurd, and errors the most pernicious. Never, therefore, allow fear to intermeddle with the decisions of your mind, for it is the criterion of brutes, and not of rational beings.

DIVORCE.

BY REV. G. W. MONTGOMERY.

"What therefore God hath joined together, let no man put asunder." Matt. xix: 6.

Nothing can be more evident, than that there is a vast difference between sin and virtue—all the difference that there is between life and death. The Scripture tells us, that "the wages of sin is death." If, then, the effect of sin be misery, and the effect of virtue be joy, certainly it was never intended that the bonds of matrimony should be published between them. Nevertheless, man has united them. If you look into community, you must discover that the good principles discoverable there, are mixed with fashions, quaint notions, vicious maxims and evil practices. One man shall eulogize benevolence, as an admirable duty, but he will join with it the miser's plea, "charity begins at home;"—so it should; charity should begin at home; but it should not turn hermit and always stay at home. One man will advocate temperance in drinking, but he will form an ill-matched couple, by being intemperate in eating and dressing. So you will find it the case, in a great many things—man has united good and evil; and what has been the result? Look at the dark pages of crime, and see!

Man has also formed a union between truth and error, when God intended that they should be as separate as light and darkness. When I say that a union has been formed between truth and error, I do not mean to be understood, that man has amalgamated truth and error, for they can no more mix, than oil and water, but he has brought them together, and formed a hideous piece of patch-work of old and new cloth.

When Christianity came from the hands of Christ and the apostles, it was like a vigorous, beautiful statue; perfect in all its proportions; giving delight to the mind and joy to the heart. But, as the converts from the Judaic, Pagan and philosophic schools poured in, many of them retained some of their old notions, which they supposed would be an improvement to Christianity. One after another, they hung these upon the form of truth, until its beauty was obscured, its power limited and its influence palsied. In this condition it has come down to us, struggling with the vices and hypocrisies of many of its followers. The consequences of bringing truth and error together, are most lamentable. We have only to witness the contentions among professors, to trace the bloody river of persecution, to detail the misery which has flowed from superstition, in order to be convinced, that it is dangerous to unite what God has separated, as it is to separate what he has united. Hence when we see a man whose religion makes him afraid, we can be as certain, that such a man holds error with truth, as we can be certain that "perfect love casteth out all fear."

"What therefore, God hath joined together, let no man put asunder."

To every student of the sacred records it must be evident, that God has made an intimate connexion between the Redeemer and the world. He has made this connexion by gift—"ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." Ps. ii:—"The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hands," John iii: 35. He has made it by the sacrifice of the Redeemer, on the cross, that he might save his people from their sins.

But man, in his own belief, has, to a measurable extent, dissolved this connexion. For, notwithstanding the labors and death of Christ, his exertions, and his beseechings, still no representation is more common, than that a large portion of the human family will be separated from him forever. And, if the usual application of that passage in the 16th of Mark, which says, "he that believeth not, shall be damned," be correct, then the greatest portion of the human family will be lost, for if only those are to be saved, who, in this life, exercise faith in Christ, then, infants, idiots, and the vast multitudes of heathen, as well as numbers who live in Christian lands, must shrink away from the presence of Christ. What person can contemplate this picture without horror? To think that myriads of intelligent beings shall wail in endless anguish without possibility of reprieve, is of all things most terrible. And what is still worse, though it is passing strange that it could ever have been believed, the songs of the saints are supposed to become more bright from the shrieks of the condemned. Ah, it cannot be true. It must be fallacious. The very fact that God has united the world to Christ, is sufficient of itself to prove its fallacy, for you might as well think of separating heat from the sun, or motion from the earth, as to separate what God hath put together by his power.

We have assurance, that in the fulness of time, Christ will cement this connexion more fully, because he "is the head of the church," Ephe. v: 23, as Paul expressly affirms. What church? I answer, not any of those so called among men, which contain comparatively but few of the children of God. Who and what is the church of Christ, the world greatly mistake about. True, it is well for any number of persons to join together, as believers in Christ—but let not such a body of men claim to be the exclusive church of Jesus. They may be a fragment of his church, but not the whole of it—for, and I speak with all solemnity and proper feeling, you will find as much benevolence, as much true faith, and the spirit of Christ, out of what is commonly called the church of Christ, as in it.

Who then, form the church of Christ? I answer, all men, and strange as the answer may seem, shall give evidence of it. Paul once said, "Husbands love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it; that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word: that he might present it to himself, a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish," Ephe. v: 25, 26, 27. Now observe—Christ gave himself for the church, that he might cleanse it from impurity. This language can not be applied to any one particular modern church, since modern churches claim to have formed themselves, because they are free from impurity. If they have no impurity, then they are not the church to be saved from uncleanness, and of course, they cannot apply the language of Paul to themselves. Christ died on the hill of Calvary—all believers of every sect, admit this. For whom did he die? "But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor; that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man." Heb. ii: 9,—or as the beloved apostle expresses it, "and he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." 1 John, ii: 2.

From this concurrent testimony, it must at once be seen, who is the church that Christ by his death will purify. I know that this opinion militates with the common notions of this subject, but it is such a militation as the benevolent heart must desire to be true. That all men form this is still clearer, from the expression of Paul—"And hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all." Ephe. i: 22, 23. He also says in another place—"But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ—and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God." 1 Cor. ii: 3.

Observe; Christ is the head of the church—he is the head over all things to the church—he is the head of every man. Surely, this fact proves the intimate connexion of the world to Christ. But this is not all—as Christ is the head of every man, so is God the head of Christ—which fact exactly agrees with the 15th of 1st Cor., where we are informed, that when Christ shall have subdued all things to himself, he will give up the kingdom to God, even the Father, that he may be all in all.

Will it be necessary for me to show, that Christ will perpetuate this connexion? Will it be necessary for me to cite the promises, the language of the prophets and the preaching of the apostles, to convince people that Christ will see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied? I am persuaded not; for no foe can separate Christ from any creature with whom God has connected him.

In reference then, to this truly glorious fact, we can say—"What therefore God hath joined together, let not man put asunder"—for there is danger in it—error will grow out of it, and evil consequences always spring from error, to the marrying of happiness.

CREDULITY.

Nothing is more frequently repeated by atheists, and nothing comes with less grace than the assertion, that it requires the greatest stretch of credulity to believe in the existence of a God, and the believers in his existence are often entreated to renounce their sentiments, that they may rid themselves of its imputation. But of all human beings, the atheist should be the last to call others credulous, for until he can show that there is no credulity in believing that countless millions of "suns on suns, and systems on systems" were formed from atoms which originated from, were made of, and created by nothing—that there is no credulity in believing that all things are working to no end and for no purpose—that there is no credulity in believing in an eternal succession of causes uncaused, or in denying that every effect must have had a previous adequate cause—that there is no credulity in believing that men and animals sprung from the earth like mushrooms, vain will be his attempts to deliver us from what he considers the height of credulity. ANOTHER LABORER.

Br. GROSH—I have the satisfaction to inform you that Br. William Rounseville, who has been for some months preparing for the ministry, has just entered upon his active labors. A few weeks since he delivered a lecture to my society, to their entire satisfaction. As Br. Rounseville intends to pass a few weeks during April and May, in lecturing in Otsego and Schoharie counties, I take this method of recommending him to the confidence of our friends.

If moral worth, associated with a sound mind, and aptness to teach, are qualifications for the Christian ministry, Br. Rounseville will succeed.

GOD'S IMPARTIAL GOODNESS.

BY W. ROUNSEVILLE.

Friend, dost thou doubt the record which saith that "God is good to all, and his tender mercies are over all his works"? If so, hast thou attentively studied the book of nature? Hast thou not rather read it as the school boy cons his daily task, more from necessity than choice. Well, if thou hast, or if thou hast not, another page, rightly perused, can do thee no harm.

Look, then, with me, at yonder sun, as his flaming disk emerges from behind the dark foliage of the eastern hills. How beautiful! This splendid appearance is not for us alone, to behold. Thousands welcome the bright harbinger of day to our peaceful shores. Observe how he darts his enlivening rays on "herb, tree, fruit and flower." Yonder splendid mansion, where dwells in pompous splendor the rich man, is already glistening in his beams, though perchance the inmates are yet fast locked in the embrace of Morpheus, as if unmindful of his blessings.

In yonder beautiful vale, is situated the humble cottage of the peasant. Already has the sturdy "son of toil" commenced the customary labors of the day. Do you not see him as he scatters the seed on the lengthened furrows? Even he looks happy and contented. The good dame has also commenced the daily avocations. Already (perhaps while you and I were in bed,) has she neatly arranged her cleanly utensils with which she prepared her morning meal. If so, we might learn even from the poor an important lesson. But let that pass. Observe with what a calm, sedate, yet cheerful countenance, she pursues her domestic pursuits. Those happy little ones that you see frolicking on the green carpet of nature, will soon be seen wending their way to the distant school; but we will not follow them there, our business is with nature.

And now, what say you friend—does God deal partially with the poor? Were it not that ceremonial formality has closed the avenue to the interior of the dwelling of the rich, we might receive, from a short survey of the scenes within, a fund of instruction—but we must even be content to observe what passes without the walls. Yonder individual, who, by his appearance, we might judge has just arisen from his couch of down, is master of this edifice, and the adjoining ground. Can you not discover with what an air of satisfaction, he looks around? His very step proclaims his importance—at least his importance with himself. All he sees is his own—he is monarch of his dominion—the autocrat of his plantation.—Think you, my friend, he would exchange situations with yonder laborer? Would yon laborer exchange with him—and like him be harrassed by the cares of riches? Could we have taken a peep at him, as the bell tolled the solemn hour of midnight, perchance we might have seen enough to show, that wealth, alone, brings not happiness.

But while we have been engaged in these observations, the sun has almost reached the meridian. Let us seek the cooling shade beside yon purling rivulet, nor murmur at the oppressive heat when that heat is necessary to arouse and bring into life the dormant energies of the vegetable world. Then, let us seat ourselves on this moss-covered trunk, and contemplate the goodness—Ah! we are not the only tenants of this delightful grove, "nature's songsters" have already sought the pleasing shade of nature's bowers. Knowest thou, my friend, that he who careth even for the sparrow, has fitted up for the "tenants of the warbling shade" this canopy of green? But whether for them or for us, it may teach us wisdom.

And for what purpose does this pure and gurgling rill meander through the mead, and pursue its unwearied course in laughing melody, until it is united with the mighty waves of the prince of waters? Cast your eye far along the beneath the umbrageous foliage and answer me, why? Yes, you already know. That beautiful fawn, which you have seen cautiously sipping the grateful element, had become faint and feverish had not the kind Parent of all been careful of every individual of his creation. You saw that playful trout, as in his happy gambols, he ruffled the placid surface of that little pool or cove formed by the projection of that miniature promontory. This clear and beautiful stream is his abode, where with myriads of the finny tribe, he sports in the same sunbeam that cause the germination of vegetation; that gild alike the palace of the rich and the cottage of the poor; that enables us to read and admire the beauties of nature, and the goodness of nature's God. The same rays fall alike on the possessions of the evil and the good. Nowhere that the eye of man has reached, but feels his invigorating beams. Nor is yonder rising cloud, although it portends a fearful tempest, an evidence that our God is not good to all. But let us hasten homewards, ere the descending waters shall overtake us.

Here, from this piazza, we can behold the progress of the storm. No noise is now heard, but the incessant pattering of the falling rain, and the awful tones of the peals of thunder, as it reverberates through the distant hills. All silent now are "man, and beast, and bird;" as if awe-struck at this tremendous display of the power of that God who "rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm."

But, see, on the Western skirts of the raging cloud, the sun again breaks forth in all his lustre, as if rejoicing to look once more on this fair earth ere he sinks behind the occidental hills, and at the same moment appears in the opposite point, the many colored bow, blest emblem of the faithfulness of our God.

Ask you now, my friend, if God is good to all? Ask you, if he is good in every thing he does for his wide creation? Yonder setting sun that, now, with a milder radiance illumines this portion of our earth—that passing cloud that has watered the thirsty ground, and instilled into the vegetable world new life—the vivid lightning which, by its influence, has purified the surrounding air of its sulphurous vapor—those feathered tenants of the forest, whose notes of gladness we now hear redoubled and prolonged, as if celebrating the praises of their Creator in songs of gratitude—those powers of mind, by which we have been enabled to contemplate these pleasing scenes—all these—aye, every thing in nature, declares that "God is good to all." And thus has he been since the first dawn of creation. Friend, will you answer me? When will he change?

DIALOGUE—ANTIQUITY OF UNIVERSALISM.

BY ROGARTUS HARNOR.

Partialist and Universalist.

P. If Universalism was really taught by Jesus and his apostles, why do we never find it so much as named on the page of history, until our own days?

U. The doctrine might exist, without being called by that name.

P. Very true; but I do not even find the doctrine in ancient history.

U. Have you ever read aught concerning Origen?

P. Yes, he was one of the great lights of the church in his day—I believe he lived about A. D. 200.

U. Yes—he died A. D. 253. His most celebrated work, in which he advocated the final restoration to holiness of fallen men and angels, was published A. D. 230.

P. Was he not an exception to the Christian world around him, in his belief on this subject?

U. So far from it, that his avowal of it seems to have created no surprise and excited no opposition. Besides, it had been taught by the Gnostic sects, A. D. 90 to 150—by Clemens Alexandrinus, 196—by the preceptor of Origen and in the Sybilline Oracles, 150—all of which writings were generally read and circulated, and considered Orthodox in their day.

P. But was not the doctrine of endless misery as generally taught at that early period?

U. Not that can be ascertained with any certainty. Ignatius, A. D. 108, seems to refer to punishment in a future state, but in a very vague manner, and without saying any thing of its duration. It is possible that about this period, some of the Christian church began to suppose that none but the saints would be raised in the resurrection; and to incline to the belief of the annihilation of the wicked. Barnabas in the year 131, is the first who used the word everlasting, or eternal, to describe suffering, but the same word is used for the same purpose in the Sybilline Oracles, and by Origen and other writers who did not believe in endless misery. The use of this word, therefore, affords no proof of a belief in any other than a continuous or indefinite punishment. Justin Martyr, about 160, and Irenæus, about 190, taught the annihilation of the wicked; but no one yet appears to have believed in the doctrine of endless misery.

P. Are you certain that Universalism was taught without opposition at this time?

U. Quite certain—for it was a prominent point in the teaching of the various Gnostic sects, who were much opposed for their heresies; but the doctrine of universal salvation is never once attributed to them as a heresy—or named to their reproach—as it certainly would have been had it been deemed an error, or had it not been generally believed by Christians.

P. What is the earliest period at which you find the doctrine of endless misery advocated by the Fathers?

U. About A. D. 200—Tertullian and Minucius Felix stand foremost on the list.

P. Well, and was it not generally received?

U. Far from it. Thirty years afterwards, Origen's great work appeared in which he advocated Universalism at some length, without meeting any opposition; but on the contrary, general approbation.

P. But, certainly, Origen was much opposed, afterwards.

U. Yes, bitterly and severely for what were called his numerous errors; but Universalism is never named as one of his errors until about A. D. 394, and then it is censured only so far as he taught the restoration of the devil. His belief in the restoration of all men is not named as censurable, even at that late period.

P. There might have been great latitude of opinion allowed to individuals on this subject; but was not the doctrine of endless misery considered as the doctrine of the Church—as the most probable doctrine?

U. No—decidedly not. I do not say Universalism was; but endless misery was not. It was not until about A. D. 410 that it began to be generally conceded that the devil and his angels would be endlessly miserable—and about 450 the endless misery of wicked men began to become generally popular; but it was not until the year 553 that the fifth General Council formally condemned the doctrine of universal salvation, and established the doctrine of endless misery as a doctrine of the Church.

P. But how do you account for the toleration so long allowed to either of these doctrines by those who held their opposites respectively?

U. By regarding it as probable, that the Christian church was so surrounded with Pagan and Jewish opposers, that it had as much as it could do to maintain the contest with them. Of course, the great general doctrine of the truth of Christianity—the one God, the Messiahship of Jesus, and the resurrection from the dead—would be principally dwelt on, to the partial neglect of minor points and particulars. But when this outward opposition was subdued, inward controversy extended its bounds from subject to subject, until every minor point and ceremony became a subject of intolerant persecution. Hence the necessity of going, at last, to the Scriptures, instead of the Fathers, for proof of any doctrine of Christianity.

P. But if what you have stated are historical facts, how comes it that the great mass of Christians are ignorant of them?

U. Various answers might be given to that question. You will find the facts I have stated, candidly narrated in "The Ancient History of Universalism," an invaluable work, by Rev. Hosea Ballou, 2d, of Roxbury, Mass.—a work too little known and read by Universalists; and much less known by their opposers.

P. But as Mr. Ballou may be interested in making a false statement, can you refer me to some Partialist testimony on the subject?

U. Really! A Universalist is as much interested in knowing the truth, I think, as any other can be. And surely, a Partialist writer may be as much interested in making false statements, as any other! But you will find Mr. Ballou full of references to the Partialist sources from whence he derived his statements—you can examine them for yourself. And you will find him quoting liberally from the Fathers, of whose opinions he speaks—you can satisfy your mind of his correctness by an examination of the originals. Besides, Mr. Ballou's work has now been before the public for eight years; yet in all that time no writer has ever called its truth in question, complained of its want of candor, or attempted to refute its statements.—These things would certainly have been done, had it been vulnerable, and therefore, you will admit, the silence of our opposers is a tacit admission of its correctness—consequently, my statements here made, drawn from that work, may be greatly relied on.

FORTITUDE.

Fortitude is a superior female quality, and may properly be classed with the Christian virtues. It not only ornaments above gold and emeralds, but ennobles women. It is inseparably connected with strength of mind and an independent spirit, and closely allied to moral courage. The latter enables us to combat and subdue external evils—the former, to meekly endure the trials of the heart. It "yields the peaceable fruits of righteousness," and a reasonable action in every emergency, however sudden, unexpected, or afflictive. It is the offspring of much reflection, and a well cultivated understanding—beautifully consistent with female delicacy, and leads to honor and excellence, heightens amiableness, as do the lights and shades a well executed painting. It gives dignity to gracefulness, and sublimity to loveliness; and though the sphere of its possessor be ever so limited and obscure, it will be recognised and appreciated by minds of improved intellect. It affords equanimity to the emotions of the heart, and promotes a healthy action in all the mental faculties.—energy to the weak, and elasticity to the (otherwise) dormant springs of the soul.

In whatever female mind this precious germ is quickened, may it be cherished and cultivated to its utmost state of maturity; that thereby the mind's diseases may be eradicated. The vicissitudes of human existence daily teach us the necessity of fostering this sustaining principle.

SALVATION.

"Salvation! O, the joyful sound!

'Tis pleasure to our ears;

A sovereign balm for every wound,

A cordial for our fears."

This is, indeed, the most gladsome and inspiring theme which can occupy our minds. It raises our thoughts from earth to heaven, and leads us to contemplate with joy the unfading glories of that eternal inheritance reserved for the children of mortality. The term salvation, in the Scriptures, is used in a variety of senses. In our remarks we employ it in reference to that great deliverance from the empire of death, unfolded in the Gospel. This salvation is in its nature, independent of works. Man has not power to save from the dominion of the grave. Like the present life, his existence beyond the present mode of being is the gift of God.

As believers in the truth taught by Jesus Christ, it is our privilege to rejoice in the firm persuasion, that we are destined to live, when these our earthly tabernacles are dissolved, and all that is mortal dies. Our present life affords us much more happiness than misery, and is, therefore, a blessing. Were the Scriptures silent, then, respecting the nature of future existence, we might consistently suppose that it would be blissful and anticipate it with joy. We are not, however, left to infer; the Scriptures are sufficiently explicit on this subject. This future state is spoken of as "an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away," "a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

How joyous and soothing the thought, that when the toils of life are o'er, and we have done with things of earth, we shall enter those celestial mansions, the final residence of our spirits. Here, all of every nation and kindred are to be gathered, to go no more out forever; for this shall be our everlasting home. Jesus, the Son of God, came in his Father's name to proclaim this great salvation. And we rejoicingly say,

"Salvation! let the echo fly
The spacious earth around,
While all the armies of the sky
Conspire to raise the sound."

A TREE IS KNOWN BY ITS FRUITS.

But it is hardly possible to determine the quality of the fruit, though the tree be viewed by the most scrutinizing eye. A well proportioned and thrifty tree may be barren; or if productive, yield nought that is palatable or valuable. The towering pine and sturdy hemlock, whose beautifully ascending trunks attract the passing gaze, whose waving branches mingle with the clouds of heaven, and whose tops reach the "blue ethereal sky," afford not the "mellow peach," nor yet the "juicy grape;" but hard and husky are their scaly buds, unfit for the taste and wants of man and beast. E'en the stately "monarch of the hill," furnishes not the goodly fruit that bends the bough of the humble apple-tree.

And yet, if we were to judge the fruit by the tree, even the ascetic's appetite would laugh in anticipation of the autumnal gathering. And what might he not expect from yonder wide spreading oak, compared with the crabbed pear-tree; or graceful elm, compared with his entwining vine, which creeps in silence around its protector, and hangs its pendant, purple clusters from the outstretched arms of its supporter?

What now rejoices the expecting farmer, and cheers the social circle of New-England's winter evenings, would be cast aside as nothing worth, if the fruit of these high pretending trees could feast the appetite, as their appearance does the vision—and the southern planter would regard them as fit only for the mouth of the slave!

There is no way of ascertaining the quality of the fruit, except by an actual test. "Taste and see" whether it be good; and having done this, you will be prepared for two decisions—first, the quality of the fruit—and secondly, the character of the tree which produces the fruit.

Reader, depend not, then, upon the high pretensions of men, but look at the fruits which they actually produce, and tell me when thou hast ascertained, which is the better—that system which teaches that God exercises his goodness towards all his offspring, and has provided a remedy which will certainly be applied to all their diseases; or that which teaches that God can not or will not heal but a part of his own children.—Which?

Edm.

True cheerfulness is a mark of christian resignation. He who would be happy himself and useful to others, must be reconciled to the Most High.

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, APRIL 14, 1837.

SECOND LETTER FROM BR. SKINNER.

Richmond, Va., March 30th, 1837.

BRs. GROSH AND HUTCHINSON—It is now nearly two weeks since I last wrote you—a length of time considerably beyond what I had intended when I wrote on the 17th inst. But circumstances have not been favorable for writing earlier.

I remained in Philadelphia a whole week from the date of my last—the first five days at Dr. W. F. Eachus' Infirmary, under medical treatment, (which proved of essential service to me); and the last two days I was detained by a cold equinoctial storm. For as I was not obliged to hurry, I chose not to expose myself to new colds by travelling in cold and rainy weather.

On the morning of the Sunday which I spent in that city, I attended public worship at the Lombard-street church, and heard an excellent and impressive sermon from Br. A. C. Thomas. The interior of this house has recently undergone an entire renovation, the pulpit being removed from the south side to the west end, and the gallery and entrance from the north side to the east end, and the whole newly furnished and fitted up in elegant and commodious style, very greatly improved from its former condition. Two very neat and commodious rooms, are fitted up in rear of the entrance to the house for the male and female departments of the Sunday school, and also for the weekly meetings of the Young Men's First Universalist Institute. The congregation here was very respectable, in the morning, though much thinner than usual as I learned; the weather being quite unpleasant.

I regretted that the inclemency of the weather and the state of my health did not permit me to attend the Callowhill-street church in the evening, to hear Br. S. W. Fuller. I learn that the congregation here is always large and the house frequently thronged.

After remaining in Philadelphia until Friday, the 24th, and visiting Fair Mount, the Museum (in which the skeleton of the big mammoth stands, not the least of its curiosities,) and receiving many tokens of kindness from the friends here, together with about fifty per cent. improvement to my health, I took my leave, and started for Baltimore, by steam-boat, at 7 o'clock, A. M. I should have been much gratified, had it been convenient for me to have gone by the way of Lancaster county, and visited father Jacob Grosh, at Marietta, but as the weather was uncertain, the travelling by stage said to be bad, owing to the state of the roads, the vegetable kingdom not sufficiently advanced to make the country interesting generally, and I felt anxious to get along with the greatest ease and despatch that could be combined, I chose the most direct and ready passage.

The day was very pleasant, the mode of travelling by steamboat and rail road all the way—i. e. steamboat down the Delaware river, rail road across the State of Delaware, and another steamboat down the Elk river and Chesapeake bay to Baltimore on the Patapsco, where we arrived at 4 o'clock, P. M.; in just nine hours after leaving Philadelphia. Not knowing where any of our friends resided, I stepped into the office of the steamboat immediately on landing, and inquired for the residence of Br. L. S. Everett. And, what was a somewhat singular coincidence, Br. E. (who afterwards informed me that he had not before been down at the dock at the landing of the steamboat, since he resided in the city,) had just entered the office to inquire for a package from New-York, and overheard the inquiry. He at once recognized me, made himself known and took me to his house, where with his kind family, I was very agreeably entertained until the following Monday morning.

On the evening of my arrival I called on Brs. Samuel P. Skinner and Sebastian F. Streeter, the latter of whom,

I knew not, till then, resided in the city. They have just entered into partnership, and are engaged in editing and publishing the Baltimore Evening Transcript, a daily paper, which, in their hands, will be well conducted and receive an extensive patronage. I cannot, however, but regret that the talents of both these brethren can not be enlisted and entirely devoted to the promulgation of the glorious Gospel of the world's reconciliation to God; in which capacity it seems to me both of them are so well calculated to shine.

Our cause in Baltimore is now in a promising condition. The old Tabernacle which the Universalists hired as a place of public worship during Br. O. A. Skinner's residence there, has for some months been closed against the Universalists, and they have had no convenient place to meet in. This circumstance stimulated the more zealous brethren to decided efforts for the erection of a house of worship—a subscription of over $12,000 was raised, and a splendid and spacious brick edifice, seventy by ninety feet, has been raised in a pleasant and favorable part of the city, and is now progressing towards completion. A very fine room in the basement has been finished off for present use, forty-five by seventy feet, with a fine toned organ, a pulpit and seats for five hundred people, and was occupied last Sabbath week for the first time. Much praise is due to the brethren generally here, but especially to Br. Everett, for the zeal and fidelity with which this enterprise has been undertaken and persevered in. I attended divine worship here last Sabbath, and was highly gratified to witness the zealous and promising efforts to reorganize the suspended Sunday school in which the aged, the middle aged and the young participated.

Br. E. preached in the morning and administered the ordinance of baptism to four interesting little lambs of his flock, which were presented by their parents at the altar of the Lord. I preached in the evening, for the first time since I left home. For although I had resolved not to preach any more under some weeks, especially where another preacher was present and could supply, yet as Br. E. was quite importunate and as I have always found it one of the most difficult tasks I undertake, to keep my mouth shut, I consented.

On the whole I was much pleased with Baltimore, and with its society as far as I became acquainted with it.—It has a population of about one hundred thousand, is quite pleasantly situated, possesses great commercial advantages, appears to be very healthy, and its population is distinguished for hospitality and urbanity. It is emphatically the city of monuments, the most lofty of which is that of Washington, from the top of which (for I had the curiosity to ascend it, for the purpose of viewing the city, the harbor, the bay, and surrounding country,) the people below look like the fabled Lilliputians of Gulliver.

The Southern Pioneer, which has been published here for some years past, and has generally been an ably conducted and useful advocate of truth, you are already apprized recently exploded by the injudiciousness of its managers; more especially by the rashness and vindictive frenzy of Robert Smith, who, I hope and believe, will never again have the opportunity of injuring the cause of Universalism as much as he has done.—The Pioneer in consequence, reverted back again into the hands of Br. Everett, its former publisher, and has since been transferred to and united with the "Union," at New-York, of which Br. E. becomes Corresponding Editor—a very judicious and good arrangement I think, and hope much good to the cause may result therefrom.

On Monday morning, the 27th, I took leave of Baltimore at 9 o'clock, A. M., and by rail road reached Washington at 12. M.—visited the Capitol, the President's house, the public buildings generally, etc., etc., though as I had only the half day to tarry in the city, my stay in any one place could not be very long. As we "small folks" do not see the President except we have important business with him, unless we chance to be about the white house in the morning, when he sees and is to be seen by every body, (he being generally occupied in the afternoon with the affairs of State in connexion with some of the heads of department,) and as I did not arrive till noon, I of course had not the honor of seeing or taking his Excellency by the hand.

I was the most interested with my visit to the Capitol. For although the halls of Congress were deserted and the busy bustling throng of law-makers and law-breakers, office holders and office seekers, spectators and all the ceteras that swarm the city and the Capitol during session of Congress, had now departed; and nothing was to be heard save the occasional and unfrequent steps of some solitary visitor like myself, as he trod the marble floor of the spacious Rotunda or traversed the windings from wing to wing, from room to room, from chamber to chamber, amid the lofty pillars or massive walls of marble heaped together in the mighty structure, or ascended the long flight of stairs leading to the top of the dome, whence a wide prospect opens to view, of the city, the river, and surrounding country; yet the very ground on which I stood, the very floors on which I trod, the very rooms through which I passed, and every pillar, and every stone, and every seat, seemed calculated to awaken deep thoughtfulness and call forth serious reflections.—Here was the place where the wisdom and the talent, and the patriotism of the warmest and best friends of freedom and the rights of man had been congregated in years long past, in the days of our patriotic fathers.—Here was the place where have emanated some of the wisest and best of laws—laws calculated to impart and secure the blessing of freedom and equal rights to born and unborn millions of our favored land—to elevate this young empire of freemen to honor, distinction and glory, both at home and abroad—cause tyrants to tremble and monarchs to turn pale on their thrones, even across the wide waters of both the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.—Here was the place too, where the delegated wisdom, talent, learning and patriotism of a family of twenty-four young Republics continue annually to meet, to discuss the all-important civil and political topics and interests of the States and of the Union. Here, too, was the place where mind meets mind on the political arena, in the mighty contest of principles, unawed by the tyrant's frown, unterrified by his threats, uncorrupted by his flatteries, unchained and uninfluenced by his smiles, and where the unbought and uncorrupted politician dares to utter his honest convictions and principles, whether they agree or disagree with the views of others, whether in office or not in office. Here is a feature in our republican institutions of which every true American is proud, and justly so. It is true that the untrammelled freedom of our discussions, sometimes exposes us to the ridicule and affected contempt of the minions of European monarchs. But what of that? None but tyrants fear it—none but the corrupt oppose it and none but dastards or political poltroons would seek to trammel discussion or chain the free born mind.

It is, however, undoubtedly true of this nation, as of all nations and all ages, that there are both weak and corrupt men in our State and our national legislatures—men who act from hasty prejudice, or from selfish motives, or both. But then there are always others of a different stamp and of better hearts, to watch their movements, and in the end they are generally detected, and an enlightened public award to them their just deserts.

Hence we have in our national Congress many long and many foolish speeches, many short and many wise ones—laws made and unmade—principles avowed and disavowed—bills proposed, amended, abrogated—laws partial and laws general—frequently "much ado about nothing"—many whose combativeness leads them to contention, and who speak merely for the sake of opposition, without having apparently any other motive—many lawyers who speechify by the hour or half day merely for the sake of practicing in the art of speech-making, or (where the love of approbation is large) to have their speeches reported for their constituents to read. Yet notwithstanding all these things, (and some of them are evils and that, too, of a very vexatious character,) our political machinery works pretty well on the whole. And on surveying the Capitol both externally and internally, and calling up all the associations it was calculated to awaken, I could not but feel a glow of national pride arising in my heart that I was an American, and that I, as well as every other American, have an interest in that noble edifice.

The Capitol makes a noble appearance. The grounds about it are elegantly laid out and beautifully ornamented with a variety of choice trees; and much expense is being laid out this Spring in further ornamenting the surrounding grounds with trees and shrubbery. But I must not detain you longer with what will perhaps prove but a dull account of the Capitol.

I took the steamboat lying in the Potomac, that evening, lodged on board, and started about 3 o'clock, A. M.—reached the inlet nine miles from Fredericksburg, about nine o'clock, took stage to the latter place, and thence came by rail road, through a generally barren and uninteresting country to this city, where I arrived at 4, P. M., same day, (28th,) in comfortable health, and without accident; whence, and in relation to which place, you will shortly hear from me again.

Yours truly,

D. SKINNER.

DR. CHALMERS.

There is an instinctive desire in every man, prompting him to seek a knowledge of the personal character, habits and general appearance of the great men of whom much is said, and who fill a wide place in the public mind. The needed information is generally anticipated in such cases, by figuring to ourselves a personal appearance, manner and deportment, every way suited to our ideas of dignity and greatness. Thus forgetting, that the powers, as well as the direction of the mind, do not greatly depend on muscular strength, or physical beauty. And our consequent singular and whimsical disappointment when we come to see and learn the truth, is not illy exemplified in the lady, who, on being introduced to Mr. Pope, the author of the "Essay on Man," could not repress the exclamation—"good Lord! what a contemptible looking wretch he is."

In 1827, I received from a gentleman then residing in Philadelphia, formerly of Glasgow, Scotland—and who had just returned from a visit to that city—the following verbal sketch of the life and pulpit labors of the Rev. Thomas Chalmers. The personal character and general reputation of my informant, leave no room to doubt its correctness—and though ten years may have expunged from the memory the recollection of some trifling particulars, the whole is substantially as then related.

Mr., now Dr. Chalmers, had received a good education at one of the Scottish Universities, and was settled as a parish minister in rather an obscure part of Ayrshire. Here he performed in a very indifferent manner, the functions of his office—spending much of his time in the society of a few country gentlemen, in hunting, fishing, and other sports still less reputable, and was considered to be decidedly skeptical. In this situation he was called on by the publishers of the New Edinburgh Encyclopedia to furnish an article on the general evidences of Christianity. This call put him upon the examination of the principal works on that subject; and among these "Butler's Analogy" particularly attracted his attention and regard. To this work he owed his proper conversion to the belief of a divine revelation: and to it the public is indebted for the well written article on Christianity in the Encyclopedia. And the influence which the bishop's arguments had over the mind of Chalmers, will be observed by all readers of his works, in the repeated and various allusions which are made to the "Analogy."

From this period his ministry assumed a new form and power. Instead of the formal and lifeless services which had previously distinguished his ministry, he became zealous, devoted and indefatigable. A new order of things followed. His congregation increased in number, improved in morals, and respected his character. And while his talents and piety were unquestionable, he

THE SWORD OF THE SPIRIT.

BY D. K. LEE.

"Take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God." Eph. vi: 17.

"The sword of the spirit"! whose beautiful sheen,
Like the star which o'er Bethlehem's hush'd city was seen,
When the shepherds, o'er watchful, forgot once each fold,
While the angelic tale of "glad tidings" was told—
Like that star fix'd aloof, it beams radiance abroad,
Lights the pathway of hope to the palace of God—
Illumines the grave, filled with darkness of night,
And points faith to glories that dazzle her sight.

"The sword of the spirit"! not forged from the ore
Of that armor, the fuses of Immanuel bore,
When they led him a captive to Calvary's height,
With a thief on his left, and a thief on his right—
Where the blood of the Martyr pour'd forth like a rill,
The prediction of prophets, though stern, to fulfil—
When the sun's bright effulgence in darkness was pent,
And the veil of the temple in sunder was rent!

"The sword of the spirit"! not wielded by those,
Who have watch'd over Zion like merciless foes—
Who have pillaged her flock, desolated her fold,
And have fed on her fruitage, not purchased with gold:
No! nor wielded by him who his brother would slay,
For announcing the fall of hell's tyrant, that day—
When, exulting, to heaven the ransom'd shall go,
With "the sword of the spirit," that conquered the foe.

"The sword of the spirit"! that beautiful sword,
Which is mighty to slay—"is the word of the Lord."
It was wrought from his justice, and temper'd in love,
And curved like the arch of his temple above:
And he gave it to man, beaming bright as it was,
With the shield, and the helmet, to fight in his cause—
Let us wield it, till Satan's grim cohorts have thrown
The last spear, and their ramparts all piecemeal are strown!

"The sword of the spirit"! O, shall we not cling
To its love-beaming hilt, until Death has no sting—
Till distorted and pale, he is hurled from his throne,
And the Lamb, o'er the grave the last victory hath won?
Ah, yes! 'twill be ours, till the dead all arise—
Read "the word of the Lord" in Eternity's skies,
And throng the rich courts by the cherubim trod,
Singing, "Blessing, and honor, and glory to God!"

SHORT CATECHISM.

QUESTION.—Can a mean man be a sincere believer in Universalism?

ANSWER.—No; Universalism is a liberal doctrine,—based on a broad and liberal foundation. He that embraces it, therefore, must become at once a liberal man; and the scripture saith that the "liberal soul deviseth liberal things." Hence the conclusion, that meanness is incompatible with the doctrine of universal grace.

Q.—Can a proud man be a consistent Universalist?

A.—No; because Universalism is a republican sentiment and knows no artificial distinctions among men. It teaches, moreover, that mankind are brethren—children of one common Father—and heirs of one common destiny. Hence Pride and a Pharisaical spirit are contrary to the very genius of Universalism.

Q.—Can the malicious and revengeful man be a true believer in the doctrine of universal Love?

A.—By no means.—For this doctrine enjoins forgiveness of injury and love even to enemies. The wrathful and vindictive cannot therefore practise Universalism or be under its benign influence.

Q.—When then you see the mean man, whose soul would scarce be discoverable through the aid of a solar microscope—or the proud and haughty man, who looks with contempt upon his equals and betters—or the vindictive and malicious man who nurses wrath against his neighbor in his heart, until its blackness casts a dark hue over his countenance—when I say, you see all this, what conclusion do you draw from the premises?

A.—Why, that in all ages of the world, there are imposters and hypocrites, who defile the temple of the Living God and "make merchandise of the souls of men"—who "steal the livery of heaven to serve the devil in," and, after having "devoured widow's houses" and "defrauded the poor of their inheritance," "for a pretence make long prayers, to be seen of men."

Q.—What would be a just recompense of reward for all such?

A.—They should be banished all decent society, and be delivered over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.
So be it then—Amen.

MARRIAGES.

In Wilna, 25th ult., by Rev. J. H. Whelpley, Mr. JOSEPH HASTINGS, to Miss RACHEL VAN ANTWERP, all of Wilna.

In Boston, N. Y., February 16th, by Ev. J. Lewis, Mr. ISRAEL P. SACKETT, to Miss HANNAH ALDRICH.—February 22d, by the same, Mr. SANFORD JONES, to Mrs. PHEBE MCNELLY.—March 1st, by the same, Mr. WILDER RICE, Jr., to Miss ASENACH PRENTISS.

In Brownville, March 30th, by Rev. J. Britton, Jr., Col. LEVI TORREY, to Miss LARISA I. OSBORN, all of that place.

In Newport, March 28th, by Rev. W. H. Waggoner, Mr. DANIEL GILES, to Miss NANCY KEITH, daughter of Mr. James Keith.—In Fairfield, by the same, on March 30th, Mr. WILLIAM HARRIS, to Miss MADALENA KEELER, daughter of Mr. Seth Keeler.

In Fort Plain, March 2d, by Rev. L. C. Browne, Mr. REUBEN H. SCHUYLER, to Miss NANCY THURBER.—March 16th, by the same, Mr. MATTHEW WALRADT, of Morris-town, St. Lawrence county, to Miss SARAH KLOCK, of Oppenheim.—In Mindenville, same day, by the same, Mr. ALFRED B. DAVIS, to Miss LUCINDA FRELICK, both of Minden.

In Lebanon, on the 30th ult., by Rev. E. M. Woolley, Mr. FRANKLIN B. HOPPER, to Miss SARAH MCCONNELL.

In Rochester, March 22d, by Rev. George Sanderson, Ald. SCHULER MOSES to Miss SUSANNAH P. MORGAN.

DEATHS.

[The following was laid by one week, on account of its length, and thus was forgotten and lost finally, last Winter. By especial request we give it a place without much abridgment. A. B. G.]

In Boston, N. Y., December 5th, 1836, of dropsy in the chest, Mrs. LAURA LE CLEAR, consort of Mr. Aaron Le Clear, aged 39 years, and one day. Though a member of the Baptist church at the time of her death, (from which she had repeatedly asked a dismission,) Sister Le Clear was an avowed Universalist. For many years she was unable to have intercourse or acquaintance with Universalists, and hence enjoyed the consolations of her faith alone. But for the last two or three years, the doctrine having been preached in this town, she became a zealous advocate of the doctrine, and finally a member of our society. For the last two or three months, her bodily sufferings were frequently intense, and her departure almost daily expected. In this situation she bore full and ample testimony to the saving power of the Gospel of universal salvation, by bearing her afflictions, with Christian resignation, and assuring all that as her end seemed more near, her faith grew more strong.—She died as practical believing Universalists always do, confiding in the promises of God in Christ, and supported by the hope of a sinless happy immortality for all Adam's race. J. L.

* * Herald, please copy the above and the two following.

In Boston, N. Y., March 14th, Mr. AMASA ALDRICH, aged 44. His death was occasioned by a heavy blow upon the back part of the head, from the falling of a large fragment of the branch of a tree from the height of about forty feet. The blow, as may well be supposed, caused a violent concussion of the brain, and probably some depression of the skull, thus depriving him in an instant of his senses and speech, in which state he continued, about 7 hours, and expired.

In the death of Br. Aldrich, the Universalist society in this town have sustained a very great loss—the community in general, one that must be sensibly felt—but to his relatives, and especially to his own family, the loss of him must be not only very great, but positively irreparable. May the Friend and Protector of the widow and the fatherless sustain them in their affliction, and apply to their bleeding and almost broken hearts the balm of life and immortality presented in the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

The funeral was attended on the 16th, in the Free will Baptist meeting-house, and the occasion improved by the writer of this, in a discourse founded upon 2 Sam. xiv: 14. J. L.

In Boston, N. Y., March 16th, of a lingering pulmonary complaint, Amos SMITH, Esq., in the 62d year of his age. Some 2 or 3 hours before his departure, he stated that he had been studying the Scriptures and reflecting upon the subject of religious truth for 2 or 3 years, and that he had recently become convinced, firmly and fully convinced, of the truth of the doctrine of the final holiness and happiness of all our race; remarking that he could now die in peace, rejoicing in the confident assurance of meeting a ransomed world in the regions of perfect purity and immortal bliss. On being told that an unusually large congregation, comprising persons of various religious creeds, clergymen as well as laymen, had been assembled that day, at the funeral of Mr. A., mentioned above, he expressed a most ardent wish that (if it were possible) he could have health, and strength of lungs, and an opportunity to address such a congregation, upon the subject of the faith he had just embraced. He manifested, however, no unreasonable anxiety respecting it, but meekly acquiesced in the divine will; though it doubtless seemed to him, at that moment, that he could present the doctrine of the restitution in so clear and convincing a light, that people must see its truth, and embrace it.

He retained his reason to the last, conversed familiarly upon his approaching exit, named the undersigned as the one who it would be his choice should conduct the services at his funeral, bade adieu to his family, and calmly fell asleep in death. JASON LEWIS.

In Concord, March 23d, an infant child of Mr. E. Sampson.

In New-Hartford, on the 1st inst., an infant daughter of Milo N. and Eliza Byington, aged two weeks.

In Salisbury, March 16th, Widow RUTH BARTLETT, aged 62 years. She died as she had lived, rejoicing in the faith of universal salvation. Funeral on the 18th—sermon by Br. Waggoner.

In Canajoharie, March 14th, WILLIAM HENRY, son of George and Lucy Ann Dygert, aged seven months.

In Fort Plain, March 22d, an infant son of J. C. Searl, Esq., aged seven weeks.

In Scio, Allegany county, January 16th, MARY NICHOLSON, daughter of Henry Nicholson, in the 8th year of her age. Funeral discourse by Br. J. H. Sanford, to a large congregation of different denominations, from Matt. v: 4.

In Diana, on the 19th ult., LUCIAN, infant son of Sherman and Sally Blanchard.

The consolations of the Gospel were tendered to a numerous congregation by Br. Whelpley.

In Westfield, Chautauque county, February 24th, FRANCES, twin daughter of Riley and Thirza Harrington, aged fourteen months. Funeral sermon by Br. Eaton.

In Hanover, March 11th, Mrs. EUNICE RATHBONE, aged 72 years. She was a firm believer in the fulness of the Gospel, and adorned her faith in life and death. May the sustaining power of the same, cheer her aged partner under his affliction. Sermon on the 13th, by Br. Eaton, to a large concourse of mourning friends and sympathising neighbors.

In Alexander, July 30th, 1836, Mrs. MARIETTA HAVENS, wife of E. S. Havens, and eldest daughter of Widow Vashti Moores, aged 21 years. Sermon by Br. Babcock to a numerous and respectable congregation, assembled to testify their respect for the deceased, and their sympathy with the mourners.

In Gaysville, Vt., February 16th, Mr. DAVID EATON, father of Br. T. C. Eaton, of N. Y., aged 59 years. He had an attack of the numb palsy rising a year ago, and had not enjoyed the full possession of his physical strength or mental faculties since. He appeared to be in a decline for several months previous to his death, and the complaint which finally terminated his earthly existence was the dropsy. His reason forsook him a few weeks before the dissolution of his body.

He had long been a believer in the doctrine of the ultimate purity and happiness of the great family of man, and the practical influence of this heavenly sentiment was happily illustrated in the upright conduct, the exemplary life, the religious habits and benevolent actions of Br. Eaton. He has left a desolate widow, a numerous family of children, several brothers and sisters, and other relatives to mourn his departure from earth to heaven. The body was conveyed to the meeting-house in Hancock, and a discourse delivered by Br. T. Brown, to a large and attentive audience, from 1 Pet. i: 3, 4.—Universalist Watchman.

In Dansville, Steuben county, N. Y., December 9th, 1836, JEREMIAH MOSHER, aged 54 years. Br. Mosher was long afflicted with cancer, to which was added consumption in his last days. In his youth he embraced Universalism, not by hearing it preached, but by reading the Bible. For many years he stood alone in his views, while he refuted the arguments and bore the scoffs of his bitter opposers. But his last were his happiest days.—An example of patience and resignation, he left this world, while even his enemies were constrained to say he was, emphatically a Christian. By his request the funeral, discourse was delivered by Br. A. Upson, on the 11th, to a numerous circle of mourners and a large concourse of neighbors.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.....NO. III.
BY S. R. SMITH.

DOCTRINE OF THE TRINITY.

It is far from being an agreeable reflection, to feel compelled to grapple with two adversaries at one and the same time. Yet there are connexions and relationships of such a nature and character, that you can never disagree with one of the members, without involving a controversy with the whole family. Such is our present predicament. There is an affinity so intimate, between the existing infidelity, and the corruptions of Christianity now strenuously maintained by a large majority of professing Christians, that it is believed to be utterly impossible to do justice to the former, without giving offence to the latter. It is matter of consolation, however, that if those corruptions can be removed, the skepticism and unbelief which have been built upon them, will want their present foundation; and many Christians gain a more intelligible and consistent faith. To aid in effecting these objects, is believed to be worthy of more exertion, than has, at all times, been employed by those who have seen and deplored its necessity.

A second reason for skepticism or infidelity, is undoubtedly to be found in certain doctrines ranked among the fundamentals of the Christian church. These are, and have been very nearly the same for some fourteen or fifteen centuries; whether considered as appertaining to Catholics or Protestants. The first of these in order as well as importance, is the favorite doctrine of the trinity—the actual existence of three distinct and equal persons in the Godhead.

There is something so revolting to reason, so repugnant to all our ideas of number and consistency, in this prevailing dogma, that it is matter of wonder—not that so many, but that so few, comparatively, reject the whole system of which this is supposed a part. For it plainly involves, not only the palpable absurdity that three are one, and one is three, but several others of similar character and equal importance to the simplicity of truth. It supposes that one, separately and individually, is equal to all three—and three, only equal to one. It also supposes that, however they may differ from each other as individuals, they are yet precisely and eternally alike—that though one may be a son and another a father, neither existed prior or subsequent to the other—and that while one is exclusively just, and another merciful, yet they are alike merciful and just.

Now it certainly ought not to be considered marvellous, that a system including such opinions, or supposed to embrace them, should be rejected as erroneous; or that those who have not been at the pains to ascertain, or are not disposed to perform the labor of ascertaining whether the Bible inculcates such opinions, should treat the whole as a miserable piece of jugglery, designed by its mysticism and unintelligibility to impose upon the ignorant. And it must be confessed, that few things could be devised, more effectually calculated to drive men into infidelity. Such has doubtless been its tendency in the minds of thousands; while others have bowed their reason before it in patient submission, and confessed their inability to understand its nature, or to explain its principles.

However absurd men may sometimes be, there is yet a general disposition to appear consistent. And if we make a few exceptions, they commonly are so, as far as their means will allow. And strange as the fact may appear to some, there is a tendency to consistency even in matters of religion. This is demonstrated by the splendid labors and success of the reformers, and the repeated attempts at innovation upon antiquated systems. But in some instances, of which the doctrine under consideration furnishes an example, this tendency is counteracted by special considerations. For there is probably not a living man who would be a trinitarian, if left unmolested to the formation of his own system of theology—a probable fact, that would by no means diminish the number of sincere Christians.

But Christian professors, so far from being permitted to determine this subject for themselves, have in some sense, been compelled to adopt that doctrine, however revolting to their reason. The strength of the religious feeling induced them to make the profession of its belief, when they could not reconcile their understandings to its singular absurdities. They were religious themselves, and desired the communion of kindred worshippers; and in order to obtain this privilege, yielded up their ideas of consistency on the altar of the standard doctrines of the church. But there is every reason for believing, that could the blessings of social and Christian fellowship have been as certainly obtained and as fully enjoyed without assenting to the doctrine of the trinity, its profession had never been made. And this, without impeaching the purity of the motives, or the sincerity of the profession and conduct of a single individual of the vast multitude of trinitarian worshippers.

We do not stop here to parley with the unbeliever, for flying off in a tangent from Christianity, because he found this doctrine of the tri-personality of the Deity in the hands of its professors. At present, our business is with the fact, that it is considered a constituent of the Christian doctrine—why and how it has been transmitted down to our own times, and what causes still operate in its perpetuation. The same causes, in general, which have operated in the transmission of this dogma through successive ages, for about fifteen hundred years, are yet exerting their influence in its preservation for some time to come. Yet as certainly as truth is mighty—as that superior means of investigation prompt their more effectual use—so certain will the time come when it will be expunged from the symbols of the church; and one God, in one person, will be every where acknowledged and adored by the professing Christians. The skepticism to which it has given rise, will then cease to be, and one new reason exist for the conversion of the unbeliever to the virtue, peace and hopes of a consistent system of religion and a Heaven-derived Gospel.

It need scarcely be said, that, for many ages, men were literally compelled by the application of human laws—and secular laws too—to profess the doctrine of the trinity. And that these alone were sufficient to fix that, or any other system of views, in the public mind so firmly, as to secure their transmission from age to age, while the state of civil society would permit such laws to exist. They gave the first impulse to the doctrine in question, which diffused it over the Roman empire—not without opposition, but with final success. The familiarity of habit, the want of means by which to institute and carry on a full and satisfactory examination of the subject, and sundry other causes which continue their respective influences, secured and perpetuated the triumph of an opinion which began its reign in contention and blood.

1. Among the more prominent of these causes, we may reckon the direct influence of public opinion over the great mass of mankind. It seems to be presumed that the majority in such matters, must be right—and that what is generally believed, and has long been believed, must of course be true. This is congenial with the extreme unwillingness evidently felt by mankind, to perform the labor of ascertaining the truth by personal investigation. Hence they too commonly acquiesce in public opinion, on the supposition that competent persons have, at some time, ascertained in a satisfactory manner, the truth of the subject in question. How much the doctrine of the trinity owes to this consideration, alone, we presume not to determine. But it is not difficult to perceive that those who profess it on this ground, and those who reject Christianity because that doctrine is maintained by its professors, judge and act from nearly the same reasons—because neither class has examined the subject!

2. Others, again, adopt and profess the doctrine of the trinity, because they have perfect confidence in their religious teachers. They are fully assured of the learning and talents of their spiritual guides—that they have devoted the labor of their lives to the study of the Scriptures, and that they could have no sufficient motives to deceive themselves, or to impose upon mankind. And they therefore consider it safe to believe the doctrine, though they never expect to understand it themselves, nor to be able to explain it to the understanding of others. The feeling of inconvenience to which this subjects them, is allayed by the satisfactory assurance, that there are those who see through, and can explain the subject in a clear and convincing manner. These teachers, in the mean time, may in turn argue in much the same way; and may consequently be as conscientious in propagating, as their hearers are in believing what neither can explain or fully understand.

3. Another reason why this doctrine maintains its ground in the Christian church, is, that it is considered a sacred subject, and must not be examined. That there is a sort of impiety in calling in question the verity of so ancient and well-established a doctrine of the church; and that he who should dare do this, would jeopardise his religion here, and his happiness hereafter. It is not difficult to conceive the terror and dismay with which these considerations would strike the heart of many candid and upright men; nor the expedients to which they would resort, rather than hazard the visitation of such alarming consequences. And though compulsion is a strong term when so applied, it is probably very near the meaning of that certain something, which controls the profession of men so circumstanced.

4. Another consideration which has great weight in enforcing assent to the dogma of the trinity, is, the almost universal impression that if it be not a matter of reason, it is one of revelation; and that revelation may require the belief of any position, however repugnant to reason. The influence of this belief, has been further strengthened by the equally general opinion, that human reason has become so monstrously perverted in consequence of sin, as to be wholly insufficient for determining the propriety or impropriety, the truth or falsehood of any subject appertaining to religion. Hence, the wise and the unwise, the learned and the ignorant are alike deterred from reasoning on the trinitarian hypothesis, from a fastidious diffidence of the capabilities of the human mind to grapple with a subject so much above its powers of comprehension. The whole subject is therefore resolved into one grand and indefinable mystery, and to be received as such, because no finite powers can fathom its profundity.

Such are the prominent reasons why the singularly absurd doctrine of the trinity, not only has been believed, but continues to command the assent of a large proportion of the Christian world. Its rudiments were laid in the philosophical opinions of some of the early Gentile converts to Christianity: and it was superinduced upon the doctrine of the Gospel from the very natural desire, while that was unpopular, of rendering it respectable in the eyes of the world—hence it was invested with the machinery of an ineffable mysticism, and the celestial splendors of a trinity of divine persons. Ecclesiastical authority, aided by the strong arm of the civil law, enforced a general acquiescence in its supposed or assumed truth, and habit, and the reasons above assigned, sustained its orthodoxy through successive generations.

But the trinity was never a doctrine of the Bible—and but a very small number of passages from that book could ever, by any possible effort, be pressed into its service. And of that few, there is not one which does not, without violence, admit of a totally different meaning and application. It would be an abuse of time, and of the patience of the reader, to introduce the proofs of these facts in this place. It is sufficient for our present purpose to say—that the Bible knows but one God; one mediator, the man Christ Jesus; and one holy spirit of truth and grace. This we are required to believe, not merely because it is matter of revelation, but because it is also consistent with the dictates of sober reason.

It is denied, therefore, that this absurd dogma constitutes any part of Christianity—it can be spared from the fabric without disturbing a stone of the original structure. Nay, more—its entire removal would be like taking an earthly incrustation from the diamond, and allowing it to display its native brilliancy and purity. Nor can it reasonably be supposed that it was originally a part of the Christian system, so long as that claimed an adaptation to the human mind under all its varieties and gradations of knowledge. For none can presume, that the doctrine of the trinity is a subject of very easy apprehension. The most capacious intellects sink under the effort, and acknowledge their inability to comprehend or explain its nature.

But the infidel seems never to know that this doctrine is not one of Christianity. He has never been at the trouble to compare it with the doctrine of the Bible, from which it is professedly taken, but takes the existing opinion as a legitimate part of the great economy of divine revelation. In this he imitates the most passive believer in the trinitarian hypothesis, and places implicit confidence in the discernment and fidelity of its teachers. A fact, of which he is probably not aware, and which should teach him more charity for those whom he sarcastically denominates a priest-ridden multitude, and reproaches with being blindly led by the nose. It is difficult in such a case, to determine which betrays the greater blindness—he who adopts, or he who rejects a system without examination. Whichever it may be, one thing is certain and apparent—they are alike ignorant of the facts on which they ostensibly found their respective determinations. And the claim of either to superior discernment, is equally preposterous, since the views of both are the result of any thing rather than knowledge.

This, however, is not the view which the unbeliever takes of the subject. He conceives himself a philosopher, and fancies that great deference is due to his judgment, because he has detected one or more absurdities in the doctrine of the trinity. And is this all—really all that he has done? No—he has on the strength of his discovery, become—not a more enlightened and rational Christian, as he should have done, but an infidel! He should have known, that the discovery of absurdities in that doctrine amounts to nothing; for there is probably not a believer of it in all the Christian world, who ever thought it reconcilable with the deductions of reason.

Admitting, then, what is perhaps not to be denied, that the unbeliever has been made so by the doctrine of the trinity; still there is little merit in seeing difficulties in a system which are seen more or less clearly by every one. The only important difference is, he rejects not only that doctrine, but Christianity with it—while some believe in the Gospel without that dogma, and others maintain both together. And we can not but think that system built upon a very unstable foundation, which rests upon the single consideration of the impossibility of the truth of an absurd theory, when that theory, whether true or false, can not affect the truth of the subject in dispute. Infidelity, so far as based on the doctrine of the trinity, appears to be founded on a mistake—and it is not easy to see how a system can be true, when its premises are false.

We do not blame the unbeliever for rejecting the doctrine of the trinity—but the vast importance of the subject, should induce him to examine with great care, whether that doctrine is any part of divine revelation. And that the subject is important, every one must perceive and feel, who reflects that the direction and improvement of the religious feeling, the highest and most worthy motives to the practice of virtue, and the hopes and comforts flowing from the belief in a future state of glory and felicity, depend on the belief or disbelief of Christianity. He therefore who rejects the Christian system, because, in the process of ages it has received the addition of a few human devices, acts much like one who should refuse an ancient gold coin, because its pristine brightness had been obscured.

ENCOURAGE YOUNG PREACHERS.

BY M. CLARK.

Much is said at the present day, upon the subject of good and bad preaching, and as the test of good preaching, with many people it is enough to know that the preacher is a college bred man, possessed of high literary attainments, and stands high in the ranks of popularity; and, alas for the good of the cause! quite too many are ready to praise the sermon, for no other reason, than that the man is a popular preacher. Such a hearer goes home highly pleased, and is ready to exclaim "that's the preacher for me; he reasons so close, and goes so deep into the subject that neither I nor any one else could understand him!" On the other hand, if the young man comes to deliver his message of good news, or glad tidings, though a good man, and able to give as good a reason to sustain his positions, yet he is heard by many with a cold indifference that is uncongenial, with the true spirit and principles of the Gospel—which not only serves to discourage him from future usefulness, but gives the people good reason to think, (if not to say,) "we have got too many among us who think more of popularity than truth."

Why are these things? Is the fault in the preacher? We answer unhesitatingly, No. Where, then, is the fault? It certainly exists somewhere, and we think it best to have it exposed. To me the reason is obvious—the fault exists in those who had rather stay at home, and do nothing; which we all know to be a tedious business for a man of industrious habits; or go to a Partialist meeting, and be abused and misrepresented, because the preacher has taken a peep through college, can say a few big words coupled with half a dozen flourishes, and can confound rather than instruct the mind. Such persons indirectly support the greatest errors rather than go fifty rods to hear a plain practical discourse, just the kind of preaching that is most needed.

Take for example the preaching of Paul and Peter, whose names stand first in the ranks of Universalism, and what do we find there, but plain, practical preaching; yes, it is so plain that the wayfaring man, though possessed of but ordinary understanding, need not err. I wish it not understood that I am opposed to the refined talent of popular preaching, or preachers—no, by no means; the more intelligence the better—but I ask, is it a good reason that because we can not always have just such a preacher as we desire, we will have none at all? No, brethren, this will not answer—we might as well say because we can not have a coat from just such a piece of fine cloth, and have it made by just such a tailor, we will have none at all—or because we can not have our table spread with just such food as our vanity dictates, these hard times, we will go hungry! The truth is, no man knows his intellectual powers until he has made a trial. Who, that ever sat under the preaching of the lamented John Freeman, could but exclaim, that he had been both edified and instructed; and if he had imbibed any bad habits, he would make the solemn resolve to do better? But was Br. Freeman always as able and eloquent as just before his decease? And had he lived, and still been encouraged, would he not have continued to improve? Depend upon it, that unless we support our young preachers, we shall soon be enveloped in the whirlwind of fanaticism. I deal not in personalities—but "I speak as unto wise men"—"whoso readeth, let him understand."

TENDENCY OF UNIVERSALISM.

BY REV. E. R. CROCKER.

Is the doctrine of Universalism of a licentious tendency?

The Orthodox community, as they arrogantly style themselves, would have the world believe, that our own blessed doctrine, teaching the ultimate reconciliation of all men to God and holiness, is of a very licentious nature; that its tendency is deleterious, and directly calculated to flood the world in every species of abomination. But, on the other hand, they would have the world believe, that their own precious doctrine of the forgiveness of punishment, and clearing of the guilty, is most salutary and healthful in its tendency. Now if Universalism in its tendency, is so destructive to morality and religion in community, while, on the other hand, the doctrines of Partialism are so reformatory in their nature, why have they not, as they have been, and are yet so generally believed in Christendom, worked their moral effects upon the community?

Reader, cast your eye over the Christian world; notice particularly the present state of morals and religion in this boasted land of Bibles and free inquiry; behold how generally the doctrine of a partial, limited salvation has gained assent in the minds of men, and then soberly put the question to yourself, Why are not the people better, if, as the advocates of a partial system of grace and salvation contend, their doctrines are so purifying and healing to the morals and religion of the community? The doctrine which teaches the endless torture of a part of our race, is very generally believed throughout the world, both in civilized and barbarous, in Christianized and unchristianized countries. Now if this doctrine of endless sin and suffering is so salutary in its tendency, so healthful to the morals of the world, since it is so generally believed all over the world, why is not the world of mankind, by its purifying effects, made better? Certain it is, that the whole world lies in wickedness; and certain it is, moreover, that the doctrines of Partialism, so healing (?) in their influence, have not regenerated the world; and certain (I believe) it is, that this partial theory will never redeem the world from the thralldom of sin.

My respected Partialist friends, I would recommend to you, since you have made your residences in glass houses, to be careful how you hurl stones at the houses of your neighbors. Remember that glass is glass, all over the world. Remember Haman. But to return.

It is a very easy thing to make charges against the tendency of any doctrine, however pure in itself such doctrine may be, and healing and salutary in its tendency. But let such charges be proved. My Partialist neighbor may, if he pleases, tell me, that my doctrine is bad in its influence upon the hearts and consciences of men; he may preach this to the community if he pleases; he may warn the people against their attendance upon the preaching of Universalism; but what care I for all this? Let him remember that when his doctrine was unpopular among men, the same hard things were preached against his darling tenets of endless horror and damnation.

But what is there, in that doctrine every where spoken against, so deleterious and soul-destroying?

We grant most cheerfully, and with all assurance and good nature, that the doctrine teaches, that all will, ultimately, be made holy and happy, by the renovating power, and soul-saving mercy and goodness of our kind Parent in heaven; we concede most cordially, that God has sworn, that all shall swear, that they have righteousness and strength in him; (see Isa. xlv : 23, 24;) moreover, we grant, the doctrine teaches that Christ will, in the dispensation of the fulness of times, gather together all things, or reunite all things, in him. (Eph. i: 9, 10.) But is such doctrine licentious in its tendency? Now be careful, proud Partialist, how you answer. Is it licentious? You must answer in the negative, or you fix an everlasting stigma upon the word of God. Ah! what the Bible teaches, friend Partialist, call not thou licentious. You must, Sir, confess the doctrine of the universal holiness and consequent happiness of every sentient being, (as the Bible teaches the doctrine in the plainest, most unambiguous, and positive language imaginable,) to be not of a deleterious tendency, but of a most healthy and soul-healing nature; for you can but see, the same fate awaits the Bible and our doctrine of universal emancipation from sin; what one teaches, both teach; condemn one as licentious and demoralizing, and you condemn the other.

But again: just look at another feature of our doctrine; compare and contrast it with your punishment-forgiving, and guilt-clearing system.—Our doctrine teaches that, “though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be unpunished,” that “every man shall receive according to his deeds, whether they be good, or whether they be evil,” that (God) will by no means (Christ, therefore, is not appointed as a means) clear the guilty” etc., etc. Now let every man, from his heart, believe this, and what inducement has he to do wickedly? None, none. Ah! my dear friend Partialist, you see how the case stands; see, Sir, why people do wickedly! ’Tis because they flatter themselves, there is a way of escape. Yes! and Partialism has so taught them to believe! So I see not, but it is the Partialist system, after all their hue and cry about the awfully licentious tendency of Universalism, that bids a bounty on sin; that teaches that man may sin with impunity; that there is a way of escape from deserved punishment, the Bible to the contrary notwithstanding. Oh! Partialism, Oh! thou God-dishonoring and man-debasing system, where is thy blush!! Sinner, remember, O! remember, that God will by no means clear the guilty, and well will it be for you, if you will practice righteousness and break off from your sins.

DIALOGUE.—PARTIALIST AND UNIVERSALIST.

BY ASHLEY CLARK.

P. Good evening, Sir. You appear to be a stranger. Are you a professor of religion?

U. I am, Sir.

P. How long have you made a profession?

U. About fifteen years, Sir.

P. Well, how do you enjoy your mind? Do you enjoy religion?

U. Why, yes Sir, I think I do. I enjoy my mind very well. Perhaps as well as could reasonably be expected, considering the many difficulties I have to encounter.

P. Oh, difficulties? Pray tell me what those difficulties are?

U. Why, Sir, I belong to that sect, and believe in that doctrine “which is every where spoken against.”

P. Every where spoken against! What doctrine is that?

U. It is the doctrine of “the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy Prophets since the world began.”

P. Oh, you are a Universalist, I perceive. Well, that is a delusion—a device of Satan.

U. Yes—yes—I supposed you would say so; but as I am blamed only for maintaining that God “Will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth,” I will endeavor to suffer it patiently, as did “all God’s holy Prophets” and apostles—as Paul says, “For therefore we both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those who believe.” If Jesus expired on the cross for the purpose of accomplishing this glorious object, and the apostle suffered reproach for believing it, I see no inconsistency in supposing that “It pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell, and having made peace through the blood of the cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself—by him, I say, whether they be things on earth or things in heaven.” But still, I know if I maintain this doctrine, I shall be subjected to the reproach of those who “trust in themselves that they are righteous, and despise others”—as the Pharisees did in our Saviour’s day. All such characters appear to be opposed to God’s “will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times, he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth, even in him.” I see you appear to be as much opposed to this doctrine as any one; I will therefore omit any further quotations from Scripture in proof thereof, lest you become enraged, and we get in a quarrel, so good bye—good bye.

RELIGIOUS TRUTH AND PRACTICE.

If what is truth with regard to science, art, politics or morals, is a question of interest to every sentient being, how much more so, is that of religion! No truth is so important as religious truth. Others involve more particularly physical convenience, and enjoyment—they relate only to earth-born things, upon which the rust of time is laid; but that of religion embraces both earth and heaven. It searches into the nature of those laws by which matter and mind are so harmoniously governed, seeking their adaptation to the wants of frail human nature. It inquires into the purpose of the Most High towards man; in the gift of temporal being, and penetrates the vista of the grave, to ask, What shall be his eternal destiny? And the answer each individual finds to these questions, will have a bearing for weal or woe, upon his subsequent life.

False opinions of the character of God and his government, have produced by far the greater part of human misery. What has prompted man to erect the stake, and kindle the faggot, and bring his brother up for a sacrifice? What has “stamped the wrinkles deeper on the brow” of the childless father? What has driven the thorn into the soul of the widowed mother? It is false religion. Talk as we may, the affections can not bear her polluting touch, unscathed. Her influence hangs like an incubus on the heart, crushing all its joys, and blotting out for ever its cherished hopes. It has no balm for the heart of age, way-worn and seared with the trials, the vanities, and the sins with which the pathway of life is so plentifully strown. It has no sympathy with the loves and joys of youth-time; but sad and fearless is the change its reception produces upon the minds of the gay and the glad-hearted. Then, why should the human heart cling with such tenacity, to what is at perfect variance with all its best and holiest affections?

But while there are so many different systems of religion, each professing to bear the impress of a Divine origin, it is asked, How are we to discover the true one? And some minds not being able to answer, consequently, reject all. Now, why are not men as consistent in their religion, as they are in their politics, or any business of life? We should deem that man insane, who, because there are such varieties of civil government, should deny the use of any—or, should refuse to till his farm, because his neighbors differ as to the manner in which it should be done—yet there is as much sense in the one, as the other.

But I would ask, has not the great Author of all existence given us a testimony of his truth, which, coming as it does recorded by the pen of inspiration, leaves us no excuse to err; and as Christians we should hold it sacred; and when it is said, “that the truth gives us all peace and joy in believing,” have we not a never-failing criterion, by which to judge? Truth is not error, nor error truth; but they are opposites, and the effect produced upon the mind by embracing the one, must also be opposite to that of the other. Then if the truth gives us all peace and joy in believing; error must produce misery unutterable.

Reader, have you never seen false religion exemplified? Look around you! see that mother. Why that despairing look—that bitter sigh? Ah, she is thinking of her child, who has gone down to the grave unrepentant, and unpardoned! He was a sinful one, yet she loved him as mothers always love; but now he has gone, past the hope of redemption—she hears his doom, “thou cursed,” and dare she love him now? Yes; but with a fearful, hopeless love—a love whose bitterness will consume the heart. Look again! Why has that sister left her home on such a dark and boisterous night, to go to the house of prayer? And why does she weep, as she prays? Ah, she believes her brothers and sisters exposed to the “wrath of an angry God!” They are dear to her—she has shared their griefs, and their joys, from infancy to maturer age—the guardian care of the same mother, has ever been over them—and must she part with them forever; as, one by one, they go down to decay? Must their voices be hushed at the touch of death, never to be heard again, except in curses and unavailing cries for mercy? “O, ’tis a fearful thing to love what death may touch,” with no strong hope of a blessed re-union!—Look yet again. Why does that man pass by on the other side, with a scornful smile and averted eye? Oh, he is not “like other men”—he is “sanctified, holy, pure”—the favored of Heaven! His brother man is a sinner, unconverted—God hates him, and must he love him? No, for he is commanded to be God-like. He was once his friend—they have mingled in the same social circles, enjoyed the same sports; but what does that avail? His creed sunders all ties of love—he has learned that “friends must part—must part, to meet no more—at the judgment seat of Christ.”

Reader, you have seen all this, and more; and did you never ask, if it was the spirit of Christianity—the fruit of the religion of him, who “went about doing good;” and who ate with publicans and sinners?

Christians, who believe in a limited salvation, if your faith does not give you “all peace and joy in believing,” be assured it is false! Pause, then, and inquire—lest in opposing the doctrine of universal reconciliation you are found “fighting against God!” If Universalism is true, your doctrine is false. Bring them up, then, and apply the test—to the Bible they will stand or fall. But if you refuse, and aggravate human misery by fostering error, what will be required at your hands?

And you, who have embraced the truth, perchance might pause and ask, what have we done, and what are we doing for its advancement? You have the best of all doctrines, and the only one which harmonizes with nature, and revelation; and you should be the best of all people. You have no cold and partial creed, to chill the generous emotions of the heart, or palsy the energies of native piety. If you fail in goodness, then, where is your excuse? Your creed embraces no evil—the fault is not there. WHERE IS IT? A SISTER.

A GRAND-FATHER'S LETTERS TO HIS GRAND-CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

LETTER SECOND.

MY DEAR CHILDREN—In my last letter to you I endeavored to impress upon your minds a sense of the benefits which have been found to arise from commencing every day with thoughtfulness, seriousness, prayer, and a reverential feeling as if in the presence of our heavenly Father. I hope you have been trying to realise these benefits in your own experience. You will, at first, find it somewhat difficult to restrain yourselves from vain, loose, wandering trains of thought and conversation, but by manly and determined perseverance, you will find all difficulties diminish and disappear—you will enjoy the ennobling consciousness of having overcome, and not having yielded, basely, to obstacles in the path which conscience and right reason prescribed and approved—and, lastly, ye will have formed for yourselves a most valuable and profitable habit. Persevere then, do persevere.

Whatever your hands may find to do—whatever may be the employment in which you first engage, I shall presume that the next occupation of your minds, will in general, consist of meditations upon some subject of a sacred, serious or Scriptural kind. Your own thoughts may suggest one—or you may repeat to yourselves some passage of Scripture—or you may read of the sacred writings some few words or a larger portion, in order to find therein a subject of morning meditation. I have found it a good practice to select a subject on the previous evening, either from my reading, my trains of thought, or some portion of Scripture. When a subject is thus fixed upon, before morning with its many avocations and calls for thought does arrive, a great deal of otherwise wasted time is, generally, saved from being consumed in unsuccessful attempts to select or fix upon any one out of a number of themes of thought. If you have found your time thus fruitlessly and vexatiously employed in endeavoring to select a subject, try my plan of fixing upon your topic for morning meditation upon the preceding evening. Take, for instance, one of the books of the New Testament, and go through it by reading successively small paragraphs or other portions, every day. From your day's reading you will always be able to find, at evening, some subject for your next day's cogitation.

There can not be a more suitable preparation for your meditating upon the contents of the Bible—that is, the book of books—than the mood of mind with which I would have you endeavor to commence each day. For we never derive from a perusal of the Scriptures, such a blissful and beneficial influence as when we approach them in a solemn, serene and prayerful mood. It is a good and a seemly custom, inherited, I presume, from our pious and Puritan fathers, and which you may sometimes witness in some truly devout and simple-hearted family, to preface the reading of the Scriptures at the morning and evening sacrifice, with a brief invocation of Jehovah's blessing. When I witness this antiquated but venerable usage, my heart fills with holiest thoughts. We know such to have been the custom with pious men, and we have on record many invitations and recommendations to preface our consultations of the holy Word, with a solemn invocation of the holy Spirit. "If any one lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not." Considering the great importance of the truths which we find most clearly revealed in the oracles of God—of the unity of God—of his relation to us as a Father—of life and immortality beyond the grave, and of many other truths, it would well become us to discipline our hearts to a devout veneration and gratitude to God for our acquaintance with these ennobling and consoling lessons. Think often of the advantages which have been, or may be derived from the truths of revelation, and you will gradually increase in your gratitude to God for making us acquainted with them, and likewise in your highly valuing and deeply loving those pages in which they are recorded. It has been beautifully said:—"Go, visit a desolate widow with consolation, and help, and fatherhood of her orphan children—do it again and again—and your presence, the sound of your approaching footstep, the soft utterance of your voice, the very mention of your name, shall come to dilate her heart with a fulness which defies her tongue to utter, but speaks by the tokens of a swimming eye, and clasped hands, and fervent ejaculations to Heaven upon your head! No less copious acknowledgement to God, the author of our well-being, and the father of our better hopes, ought we to feel when his Word discloseth to us the excess of his love." Endeavor, then, to become more deeply sensible of the advantages accruing from the revelations and the lessons recorded in the Bible, and you will come to its perusal in a more grateful, attentive and inquiring frame of mind. Coming to read in such a state of feeling, you will hardly read in vain and without profit. And the result of cultivating such sentiments, and of frequent perusals of the sacred records under their influence, will be, that it may be said of you, nearly as Paul said of Timothy, to wit, that from the age of childhood ye have known the holy Scriptures, and have found that they are able to make you wise unto salvation.

The lesson which I am now desirous of teaching you—the practice which I am endeavoring to enforce, will recommend itself to your approval and adoption, if you will try such an experiment as I now suggest to you. Some morning or evening, sit down to a perusal of a portion of God's word without having set apart any moments for devout and solemn thought—without any sense of the greatness of revealed truths—without gratitude to your Father in heaven—without any prayer for profit and practical application—with your feelings unattuned, hot and hurried, perhaps from business, conversation or amusement, and compare the fruits and impressions of such an interview with those which follow from one conducted in the manner I have indicated. This comparison made by yourselves will impress upon you all that I have been trying to enforce. You can not rise from such a consultation of God's word without feeling, that though the page has been open before you, you have brought little away with you; the words being hardly understood by the intellect, and not having made any impression upon the affections or the conscience. "Its accents are drowned in the noise which hath not yet subsided within the breast." Taught by your own experience, and reminded by those who would love to see you prosper, endeavor to bring your minds into a composed, collected and reverential frame before you read, or meditate upon the contents of the sacred records. And may your souls "flourish with the fruits of righteousness from the seed of the Word, which liveth and abideth forever!"

To hear such glad tidings of his beloved grandchildren, would verily gladden the heart of

INCIDENTS OF REAL LIFE.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

"Pray, Mrs. F., did you attend the meeting the other day," said Mrs. M., a lady of great piety, so called, to one of her neighbors, a woman of great goodness of heart, though making no particular pretensions to sanctity. "I did, madam," was the reply.

Mrs. M. And how did you like the discourse? I hear this teacher of new-fangled doctrines is preaching sinners to heaven in fine style. Really, I wonder how people of sense can approve such devices of the devil!

Mrs. F. I thought the discourse an instructive one; but if people could once be convinced that it was a device of satan, very few would countenance it. I heard nothing said about sinners going to heaven, though the preacher spake in thrilling strains of the great love of Him, who sent his only Son into the world to die, the just for the unjust, that he might reconcile the world to God. O, I wish you had heard him proclaim the glad tidings of peace and salvation to those who were sitting in the darkness of sin, and the shadow of spiritual death; and invite them to forsake the paths of wickedness, where serpents ever hiss and snare beset them on every side, and come to the fountain of living waters, and walk in the highway of holiness, where nothing can annoy—where the radiant beams of the Sun of Righteousness shine through the clouds of frailty and error, gilding the dark horizon of time, and opening to the sorrowing spirit, a vista of immortal glory, far beyond the gloomy waters of death.

Mrs. M. I seriously think that the adversary of souls helps you Universalists to gloss over the Scriptures to your own liking.

Mrs. F. I am so stupid that I can not see where it needs glossing over to favor our doctrine. The plan of Jehovah is drawn as plain, I think, as it need be, from Genesis to Revelation. As to the devil's being our helper, I can not see any propriety in his teaching us to raise the banner against himself. He must be possessed of a far better disposition than your teachers give him credit for, if he volunteers to help those who pay him so little respect.

Mrs. M. Well, well, I did not wish to get into a debate with you. I confess the doctrine is pleasing to my heart, and if its believers were pious, and lived up to the duties of religion, I should be inclined to examine the doctrine more thoroughly; but they are such scoffers, that I can not think their creed a pure one.

Mrs. F. There is the old objection, again! and it has lost none of its force. I acknowledge that our members fall far short of their great Pattern, but perhaps if they could see the pure and living principles of the Gospel enforced by a living example, they might be led to put away the works of the old man, and become renewed in the spirit of their mind. And as you doubtless consider your creed a pure one, will you point me to some one who may be taken as a standard?

Mrs. M. O, no, I did not intend to intimate that our church members were more perfect than others. They are remiss in almost all the duties of a Christian, with shame I confess it.

Mrs. F. And do you charge their failings to their creeds?

Mrs. M. No, I think it proceeds from their own wicked hearts, and their giving away to the temptations that surround them.

Mrs. F. And who gave them these wicked hearts, and placed them in the midst of temptations?

Mrs. M. Now I will not answer you, for you are dealing in catches.

Mrs. F. But will you not tell me, then, who are the scoffers you speak of?

Mrs. M. Why there is Mr. A.; he does not allow his children to go to Sunday school, and he ridicules our prayer meetings and anxious seats, and every means we have adopted for saving souls. And there is Mrs. B., too; she says she thinks it sinful for her to attend our meetings; she will not help people to go to meeting, and refuses to accommodate those who come to protracted meetings.

Mrs. F. Well, I do not blame Mrs. B. for her feelings. She is a woman that works for what she has, and six years ago, when it first became fashionable for Calvinists, as well as Methodists, to spend a week or fortnight at a time, from their needed labors, in pretended service of the Lord, she had her share of the company, and did not complain; although then a strong Universalist. A few weeks after this, I called on her upon Sunday, knowing she was sick, with two sick children—her two youngest, the eldest of whom had not been expected to live from one hour to another, for a week. It died the next Tuesday, when her infant was a week old. I found her alone, unable to rise from her pillow, a sick babe upon either side, one of them a mere connecting link between life and death. She was alone, except her husband, and had been, through the day. Her help would not stay at home, because they were just converted, and must of course go to meeting. "Well," says she, "I am lonely, but not cast down—my trust in the Lord is stronger than ever. Friend after friend, and relative after relative, have called in to see if we were alive; but, O, the world is going mad with revivals! Every one must go to hear the character of Deity blasphemed by his creatures, while the sick and the dying are left alone in the hands of the Lord, or to the care of whatever wicked Universalist may happen to call! But these bitter trials are not unmixed with sweetness. They show me how much better is my faith, than that which dries up the genial springs of human sympathy, and renders its votaries harsh, cruel and partial, as the God they worship. O, if they could feel how glorious is this hope, they would forsake their idols, and return to the living God, who is the Saviour of all men; who is the Father of the spirits of all flesh, and watches with parental care over the welfare of his offspring; and who, though they may stray far away from his precepts, into the paths of sin and consequent misery, will yet redeem them from iniquity, and bring them home to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads, for the Lord hath spoken it."

Mrs. M. I must acknowledge, that it was unchristian treatment; yes, it was inhuman to leave her alone—even if she had been well—with the probability of having to close her child's eyes in utter solitude, without the presence or sympathy of one friend. Indeed, if I thought revivals tended to make people neglectful of their duties to one another, I could not uphold them.

Mrs. F. You will find it to be the case every where, if you take the trouble to examine. I, myself, have known people in the performance of what they called duty, gather together a week's provisions and leave their homes for a camp-meeting, some twenty miles distant; and leave their young children alone, to fare as they could—to illtreat one another in their childish differences—to mourn for their mothers when the darkness of night closes around them, and cry themselves to sleep, and when morning dawns, to arise dejected and lonely! Are these the precepts of the religion of Jesus? Is this the fond care of a mother for her children?

Mrs. M. No, no, Mrs. F., this is not right. But I can not converse longer now, as I am in a hurry. I wish you good morning.

ENTHUSIASM.

Br. GROSH—The following description of enthusiasm is respectfully submitted for the consideration of the reader. He will notice the contrast between it, and the teachings of Christ and his primitive followers. By a careful examination of those teachings, he will clearly perceive that while they insisted on the necessity of "sincere, fervent and heartfelt piety to God," they also insisted that that piety should be "chastened and controlled by humility and discretion," and "without any affectation of rapturous ecstacy or extravagant fervor." If the learned author has given a true description of enthusiasm, we are confident that no Universalist will longer claim the appellation. J. T. G.

"The characteristics of enthusiasm or fanaticism, are, a blind credulity, in consequence of which its subject is led to imagine himself always to be the favorite of Heaven, and actuated by divine inspiration;—disorder and contradiction in the religious system proposed by the enthusiast; and obscurity and absurdity in his exposition of it, accompanied with dictatorial positiveness, requiring an implicit credence of his pretensions, or at least on grounds as vain and delusive as those which have satisfied himself;—a morose, unsocial, and severe system of morality;—and a contempt of all written revelation. But none of these characteristics is to be traced in the character or writings of the apostles. They became the disciples of Jesus Christ upon rational conviction, not upon internal persuasion alone, but on the irrefragable evidence of clear and stupendous miracles, proofs submitted to their senses, and approved by their reason, which enthusiasm could not have counterfeited, and never would have required; and at every step of their progress, as their faith was called to signalize itself by new exertions, or to sustain new trials, it was fortified by new proofs. The slowness and caution with which the apostles received the fact of their Lord's resurrection from the dead, fully exempt them from all suspicion of being the dupes of delusion and credulity.—Throughout their various writings, the utmost impartiality, sobriety, modesty and humility prevail. In the most frank and artless manner they do that which enthusiasts never do: they record their own mistakes, follies, and faults, and those of very serious magnitude, acknowledged to be such by themselves, and severely censured by their Master. No example of this nature can be found in the whole history of enthusiasm, and no other such example in the whole history of man. Enthusiasts, also, in all their preaching and conversation on religious subjects, pour out with eagerness the dictates of passion and imagination; and never attempt to avail themselves of the facts or arguments on which reason delights to rest.—Strong pictures, vehement effusions of passion, violent exclamations, loudly vociferated and imperiously enjoined as objects of implicit faith and obedience, constitute the sum and substance of their addresses to mankind. They themselves believe, because they believe, and know, because they know; their conviction, instead of being (as it ought to be) the result of evidence, is the result of feeling merely. If any one attempts to persuade them that they are in error, by reasoning, facts, and proofs, they regard him with a mixture of pity and contempt, for weakly opposing his twilight probabilities to their noon-day certainty, and for preposterously laboring to illumine the sun with a taper. How contrary is all this to the conduct of the apostles. When a proof of their mission or doctrine was required of them, they appealed instantly and invariably to arguments, facts and miracles. These convinced mankind then, and they produce the same conviction now. The lapse of more than seventeen centuries has detected them in no error, and in no degree enfeebled their strength. Their discourses were then, and are now the most noble, rational and satisfactory discourses on moral and religious subjects, ever witnessed by mankind. There is not one single instance in them all, in which belief is demanded on any other grounds than these; and on these grounds it is always rightfully demanded; but on these grounds it is never demanded by enthusiasts. There is not in the world a stronger contrast to the preaching of enthusiasts, than that of Christ and his apostles."—Horne's Introduction, Philadelphia edition, 1836, vol. 1, page 63.

REMARKS.

Mr. Horne seems to consider enthusiasm and fanaticism as words of precisely the same meaning, and that may be used interchangeably, which is not the fact.—Anciently they were considered nearer in meaning, than at present; but even then there was this difference. Enthusiasts (Greek, Enthousiastai, from En, in, and Theos, God,) were those supposed to have, or pretending to divine inspiration. Fanatics, (Latin, fanatici, from fana the temples in which they spent nearly their whole time) were those who manifested their supposed or pretended inspiration by outward singular conduct. Visionaries (from visions) manifested the same by singular doctrines. See Crabbe's Synonyms.—Hence even anciently, enthusiasts were not always fanatics or visionaries, though visionaries and fanatics were always enthusiasts; even as a bird is not always a goose, though a goose is always a bird.

But the present general meaning of enthusiasts, is one who manifests unusual fervor and earnestness in the prosecution or pursuit of any object—who lends his imagination to his feelings. Whereas a fanatic is more properly one who bends his feelings and judgment to his imagination. Enthusiasm is heat of imagination; elevation of fancy; ardent zeal—fanaticism is wild or excessive enthusiasm; religious or superstitious frenzy—a degree beyond enthusiasm. At least, such appears to me the difference between the modern use of the two terms; and if so, Horne is so far incorrect in the foregoing extract.

EVANGELIST.

Br. GROSH—I would be happy to receive from Br. "Apollos," some explanation respecting one of his personages described in a late number of this paper. It would seem from his words, (I do not say from the general tenor and apparent spirit of the article,) that he designed to hold up to ridicule those preachers of the Gospel who are itinerants. Else, why did he mount an "itinerant evangelist" upon his swift steed, shod with steel shoes, corked with gun-flints? I consider the profession of an evangelist, alias a preacher of the Gospel, by no means a fit subject for ridicule; and none the more so, for his being an itinerant. "Go into all the world and preach the Gospel," was the injunction of our Lord to his disciples. Was there any thing ridiculous in their doing so? Evangelists are mentioned in Acts xxi: 8, Eph. iv: 11. Why hold even the name up to derision? Especially, why use an evangelical magazine for this purpose? Besides, I have never learned that itinerant preachers are any more generally unworthy men than those who are stationary. Why ridicule them above all others? But, perhaps, there is some error of the press here. I should like to know.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

There is nothing that so shocks the feelings of some good and excellent people, as the thought of having bass viols, organs, etc., introduced into the sanctuary for the purpose of praising Him whose name alone is excellent. The Psalmist David, the sweet singer of Israel, who was, in very many respects, a man after God's own heart, and who probably knew as well what was becoming the sanctuary as any at the present day, thought and expressed himself very differently. In calling upon the people of the earth, both young men and maidens, old men and children to praise the Lord, his language is, "Praise God in his sanctuary. Praise him for his mighty works. Praise him with the sound of the trumpet: praise him with the psaltery and harp. Praise him with the timbrel: praise him with stringed instruments and organs." Surely if the Psalmist could thus call upon mankind to praise the Lord, there can be no harm in our following the injunction. In following his precepts there can be "no mistake."

DAVID.

We give the following without comment. It is at all times a painful duty to publish such things, but we understand that the public excitement in the neighborhood of Hamilton require it—even in justice to Mr. McCabe, as rumor has not hesitated to charge him with actual crime, from which, it will be seen, the Trustees expressly clear him.

A. B. G.

Hamilton, March 27, 1837.

Br. A. B. GROSH—It is with regret that we feel impelled by a sense of duty, not only to ourselves, but for the cause of truth which we profess to espouse, to lay before the public the cause which induced us to discharge the Rev. A. F. McCabe. His conduct and character, particularly, as a minister of the Gospel of reconciliation, is too far beneath that of our Saviour, "who went about doing good," and who "was tempted in all points like unto his brethren, yet without sin."

We do not, however, say that he was guilty of any tangible act, in itself considered, which was very criminal, however improper and amorous it might appear. Yet we feel constrained to say to the public notwithstanding, his fair abilities, that a reformation is actually necessary to qualify him to preach by example, as well as by precept.

We do not however feel disposed, harshly to rebuke Br. McCabe, but would entreat him as a father to set a double guard over the natural propensities to which human nature is subject; and so demean himself that he may be respected by man, and approved by God.

Yours in brotherly love,

MAGAZINE AND ADVOCATE.

A. B. GROSH, D. SKINNER, AND S. R. SMITH, EDITORS.

UTICA, FRIDAY, APRIL 21, 1837.

THIRD LETTER FROM BR. SKINNER.

Richmond, Va., April 11th, 1837.

Br. GROSH and HUTCHINSON—In my last, I brought my journal up only to the period of my arrival in this city, promising in a subsequent communication to say something more particular in reference to the place, the people, and the cause of truth. I now proceed to redeem that promise.

The country, for some distance north of this, through which I passed, is generally poor, unproductive and uninteresting; with large tracts uncleared and poorly timbered; with here and there a plantation, which I should judge would yield little more than enough to pay for cultivation; the dwellings of the owners, though decent and comfortable, by no means elegant, yet strongly contrasting with the humbler cabins and cottages of the slaves, with which they are surrounded. But on approaching the city and coming in view of the noble James river, the scene is very materially changed—the prospect brightens, and more enlivening and promising objects meet the eye. Though there is some poor land in the neighborhood, yet generally it is much superior to what it is back farther from the river.

The city is very beautifully situated on the north side of the river, on elevated ground which gradually descends for some distance, till it reaches the water's edge. It consists of two parts, the Eastern and Western, or the older and newer parts of the town. The Eastern is situated on old Richmond hill, where in the early days of this colony, vast multitudes of the unsuspecting aborigines were ranged in order before the British cannon, and by the wily and subtle pretensions of the commanding officer, made to believe that it was a god and would soon speak to their great admiration in tones of thunder; and by an equal refinement of cruelty and injustice combined, the cannon being discharged, swept the confiding Indians with the besom of destruction, by scores and even by hundreds, to instant death; inasmuch that a small stream issuing from a spring just above, was said to have been discolored with their blood for many days after the event. The tragic scene gave to the stream the name of Bloody run, which name it still bears. A considerable part of the city is now watered with this very stream.

The Western and by far the largest and most business part of the city, stands on another hill of larger extent. It has latterly monopolized pretty much all the business and fashion of the town, in consequence of which, property is greatly enhanced here in value, and greatly depreciated in the Eastern part. Here stand the State House of Virginia, the City Hall, and most of the valuable and important public buildings. The State House is a noble edifice and makes a grand appearance, whether at a near or a distant view. If I am not mistaken in my recollection of Jefferson's writings, the model of the building was furnished by that distinguished statesman while he was the American Minister to France. At the mention of Jefferson's name, in a letter dated at the Capitol of the "Old Dominion," one can hardly forbear associating therewith and repeating involuntarily, the names of Henry, Washington, Lee, and a long catalogue of worthy Virginia patriots, who took conspicuous parts in bringing about, and successfully carrying through, the struggle of these then infant colonies for their Independence. But as I am no politician, I forbear pursuing the train of ideas that to such an one would be likely to arise in the mind, and return from this digression.

The city is regularly and well laid out, and generally well built. There are many elegant and rich houses, and some very splendid mansions, with elegant grounds and princely gardens about them. The river, for some miles above here, begins to descend considerably, and pouring along in its course over a rocky bed and among many islands, its roaring though not loud, makes everlasting music for the city. Below, it gradually bends around to the South, and gently and silently meandering through a fertile valley, shows its glassy surface for several miles through the openings of clustering vegetation and overhanging trees on its banks. This is the head of tide water and of sloop navigation in the river; and vessels of large burden come up to within a few miles.

About two miles below here, is the spot where the far-famed and justly celebrated Indian princess, Pocahontas, offered herself a willing victim to the executioner, to rescue Capt. Smith. O what a deed was that! the celebrated, the beloved and cherished daughter of the great chief Powhattan, travels alone and in the night, through a dreary and unfrequented wilderness, a distance of sixty miles, and arrives on the morning intended for the execution, just in season to throw herself between the uplifted weapon of death and the victim, (a leader of the enemies of her nation,) and snatches him from the very jaws of destruction! And this was the act of a savage! Would to God there were many more such acts as this performed by those who bear the name of Christian! But meagerly was that noble princess rewarded for her generous and devoted love to the white man.

With the inhabitants of the city, I of course, have not yet had time to form an extensive and intimate acquaintance. I have become measurably acquainted with a few of them, and so far judge them to be a hospitable, polite and intelligent people. Their manners and customs, as a matter of course, differ somewhat from those of the North; though I find quite a number of Northern people here. With regard to religious matters, there is not apparently as much interest felt and zeal manifested, nor are they as much of a church-going people here, as at the North. Yet religious prejudice is perhaps as deep rooted and as difficult to eradicate, as any where else. Indeed, it may be in such communities, even more difficult to up-root prejudice and tradition, because opportunities do not as frequently present, as in those of a different cast.

The church here in which I have preached two Sundays, is entitled the "First Independent Christian Church in Richmond." It was built by the united efforts of Universalists and Unitarians, who mutually agreed to unite in building a house and settling a preacher. In accordance with this agreement, when the house was completed and dedicated, and a pastor to be installed, Rev. B. Whitman, a Unitarian, from Mass. and Rev. O. A. Skinner, a Universalist, from Baltimore, were invited to attend and unite in the services, which was accordingly done, and gave general satisfaction. All things went on prosperously and harmoniously under the pastoral labors of Br. J. B. Pitkin, who was a Unitarian Universalist, and of course held and preached the sentiments of both portions of the society.

About two years since, a wise and inscrutable Providence saw fit to remove, by death, that good man, Br. Pitkin, from the scenes and labors of earth, to a better world beyond the vale of death. Since then the society has become scattered like sheep without a shepherd. Though they have had considerable preaching, they have not been as united and happy in their choice as they were in their first pastor. All the preachers they have steadily employed have been Unitarians of the Cambridge school. Most of them—and for aught I know, all—were men of learning, talents and piety; but neither of them was Br. Pitkin, nor could make good his place. For though they preached Unitarianism in refined and scholastic discourses, they did not preach the doctrine of the "restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of his holy prophets since the world began." They not only did not preach the doctrine, but if I am rightly informed, they preached against it, or in such a manner as to be understood to oppose the doctrine and name of Universalism and spoke of the society and church exclusively as Unitarian. This of course disaffected and grieved the Universalist part (the majority) of the congregation. Moreover, I have understood that one or two Universalist preachers came through the place in their journeys, and preached when the society was destitute, and those who called themselves exclusively Unitarians would not attend their meetings.—Thus, disaffection and division ensued, the congregation dwindled down to as few as twenty or thirty hearers, the preachers were discouraged and left, and finally the house was closed last Fall, and had not been opened since, till my arrival. I found them dispersed, dispirited, hopeless and forlorn; and within a hair's breadth of giving all up and selling their house.

On my arrival, notice was published in the city papers that I would preach on the Sabbath following. The congregation in the morning was respectable for numbers. Our friends called it large for their meeting, though we should not call it large at Utica. In the afternoon or evening, at 4 o'clock, (for our afternoon is their evening here and our evening at the North is their night here,) the meeting was not as large as in the morning; though our friends thought it quite large for an evening meeting. For you should know that here the people have been accustomed to but one service per day. They think that worshipping God once a day, is quite as much as they can afford, and all that can be reasonably required of them.

Last Sunday morning the congregation was not only respectable, but even large—the church was nearly full—and all seemed to enjoy the meeting with a double relish. Every countenance seemed irradiated with joy and cheered with hope, to see so goodly a number there, and such an appearance of earnest engagement in the services. They seemed to think that all hope of a resurrection of our languishing cause was not quite extinct; but that they might again be permitted to meet in their own consecrated temple, and joyfully and harmoniously worship the God of the spirits of all flesh. The afternoon meeting was much better attended than on the first Sunday, and I do verily believe the people here might yet be made to think that twice a day was not too often to meet on the Sabbath to worship the universal Father and listen to the joyful tidings of a world's salvation. I expect now to remain here two Sundays more, and I pray God to direct and bless my feeble efforts to the strengthening of the things that are ready to perish in this city, that the friends of the Redeemer may be reunited and blessed with the labors of an enlightened and judicious pastor, who shall go in and out before them, declaring the undivided unity of God, and the restitution of all things, through the mediation of his Son. Amen.

My general health continues to improve. I am nearly well now, with the exception of a slight cold, which I took on Sunday last, by exposure to the cool air after preaching, occasioning a little soreness of the throat. I am now almost over it.

I perceive by the secular papers you have had a great fire in Utica. I most seriously deplore the calamity; but sorrow will not retrieve the loss. The particulars I have not seen except that it was in the lower part of the city. Who the sufferers are I know not.

I shall probably write you again ere I return.

Yours in faithfulness.

D. SKINNER.

LUKE VI: 29.

"And unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek, offer also the other; and him that taketh away thy cloak, forbid not to take thy coat also."

This passage and its context has been thought to exclude self-defence the first law of nature. I cannot think it does. The God of nature and the God of revelation are one and the same being. That Being is altogether true in all his ways. In his laws there can be no contradictions. What, then, do these precepts mean? I will answer according to my views.

Retaliation was common then, as it now is. Men were too apt, on the slightest injury, to suppose evil was meant, and to retaliate immediately on that supposition. Jesus condemns this. Suffer the second injury before you decide. Turn the other cheek, and if he smites you on that, you may then know the motive of the aggressor.—If he takes your cloak, wait and see whether he will take your coat, before you deem him an enemy.

Partiality also was prevalent then, as it is now. The Jews had no dealings with the Samaritans, publicans and sinners—i. e. they neither gave nor received gifts from them. Jesus condemns this partiality. He asked the favor of a cup of water from a Samaritan woman—he ate and drank with publicans and sinners—so he would have all give to every man, (i. e. without regard to sect or condition) any favor we can bestow without injury to ourselves.

But he does not exclude either self-defence or self-preservation, by proper means. For we are to do to others, as we would they should do to us—i. e. If we were indulging in practices of iniquity and injustice, (all of which are necessarily injurious to us,) we would wish to be reclaimed from them—and even if reclaimed by judicious and well-meant chastisements, we would be thankful for it. Thus, then, we must do to others, when all other means fail. If we were in want, we would not wish those to relieve us who could not afford it—but those who were able. Thus we must do with others. We must not impoverish ourselves to enrich others, but every one should give as God hath prospered him.

PRIZE TALES.

The committee to whose adjudication were submitted the nine tales received, on examining the same found them to embrace such a variety of incidents, characters and arguments, and many of them so nearly equal in merit on the several requisites which were to form the ground of their decision, that they almost despaired of pleasing even themselves by any decision they could in justice offer. From this difficulty they were partly relieved by being authorized by the Publishers of the Magazine and Advocate to award two premiums of ten dollars each, in addition to those named in their public offer. Could the Publishers possibly have afforded it they would have placed other additional premiums at the disposal of the committee—especially one other of twenty dollars, which it is believed would have greatly lessened the remaining difficulties of the committee. They found some tales of very great literary merit—perhaps even greater than others they have preferred before them—but as the adaptation of the tale to the object for which it was written was the first and greatest requisition—its Christian spirit and feeling, its second requisite—after which followed literary merit, etc., they have decided as follows—a decision in which, with a trifling exception, if any, they are unanimous.

The premium of twenty dollars is awarded to the tale entitled "The Strauger," by Miss Louisa M. Barker, of Clinton.

Three premiums of Ten dollars each are awarded to the following tales—"Good for Evil," by Miss Sarah C. Edgerton, of Shirley village, Mass.; "Guilford Bostwick, or the pains of Guilt and power of Love," by the Author of "Edward and Cornelia"; and "Universalism the only perfect system of Morality, or Father B. and the Orphans," by Rev. T. J. Smith, of Bridgewater.

The premium of a free subscription to the Magazine and Advocate for two years, (as preferred by the author,) is awarded to a brief allegory entitled "A Journey from Infancy to Old Age," by Samuel Jenkins, of Queensbury, Warren county.

And the Publishers of the Magazine and Advocate having signified their intention to grant to the authors of each of the other tales, a free subscription to their paper for one year, the committee declined deciding on their merits.

Such, as nearly as we can state it, is the verbal and informal report of the committee. And in concluding the article we would add the expression of our gratification at the faithfulness and patience with which they went through their arduous labor. The tales occupy about twenty sheets of foolscap, and about the same number of letter paper—in all upwards of forty sheets of the latter, and in all form three classes in each of which are several tales, very nearly so equal in merit as to render decision very difficult—a difficulty enhanced by their being in manuscript, instead of print. We did all we could in the way of additional premiums, to lessen their difficulties, and ensure satisfaction to the several competitors.

The Essays have not been read, but a decision will be had on them also, as soon as circumstances will permit. We trust their merits will be as honorable to their authors, and as creditable to our denomination, as are the tales—on whose tendency, interest and literary merit we highly felicitate ourselves and our readers, with no small degree of joy and pride that our efforts as publishers have been the means of eliciting them for public use. For all we may publish, is free to the use of our brethren of the press, asking only, as a matter of right and of courtesy, that they will make known the source, and give publicity to such notices relating to such efforts, as we may from time to time request them to copy.

P. S. Since penning the above, another tale has been received from a lady in Ohio. We regret that it came too late. But as soon as we can find time to examine it, we will communicate with our sister, and make known our decision in respect to it.

G. and H.

UNIVERSALISM,

In Dunkirk.—Br. Eaton writes us that our cause in that region is onward, and that public confidence is being gradually restored. "Much interest is now excited through the country. My meetings have been well attended, and our friends begin to think it advisable to form some rallying point in this section. There is no house in the county belonging to our denomination; but I am confident there will be one erected another season, if not in the present." Br. Eaton is seldom mistaken in such matters. Let but the friends, however few, zealously co-operate with him, and he will gather a large and well organized society, and ensure them a meeting-house within a year. Vide, Wolcott and Fulton.

In Oxford.—A friend in Chenango county writes us, that "Br. Smith's sermon, at the dedication of our meeting-house in Oxford, has given a new impetus to our cause and its friends in that place. They now employ Br. Doolittle all the time, whereas, before that, he was employed there but one-fourth. I think I never heard Br. Smith do better than on that occasion."—Br. Doolittle, backed by our spirited friends in that beautiful village, has proved that he is inappropriately named. We hope and trust he will continue doing much, the grace of God enabling him.

In Perry.—The friends here have employed Br. Abell the whole time, and are said to be highly prosperous and active under his judicious and zealous labors.

In Lewiston.—Our friends here, without a pastor, have commenced and nearly finished a neat and commodious house for worship, which it is expected, will soon be ready for dedication. They deserve, and we hope will find a pastor worthy of their faith and zeal, to "go in and out before them," and "feed them with knowledge and understanding."

SPECIE.—It becomes necessary again to remind our agents and subscribers, that specie should never be remitted by mail, even by Post-masters; for the postage in all cases amounts to more than half, and frequently to nearly the whole amount of specie enclosed. We have received two letters within a few days, on which we were compelled, to pay on one, fifty cents postage on seventy-five cents, and on the other fifty-six cents on one dollar.

Whether our Legislators will ever provide means for remitting small sums to Publishers remains to be seen; but until then, we wish our agents to retain all unremittable sums in their hands, until they receive more for us, or have some other opportunity to send. G. and H.

Mr. Gideon Tallman, Scipio, is informed that his paper has been regularly mailed at this office; if it has been purloined by the Post-master, it is not our fault. We have sent a duplicate copy of the first quarter, but shall expect pay for it, as we can not afford sixty-five numbers for one dollar and fifty cents. G. and H.

The Prize tale by Miss Barker, will appear in two weeks from to-day. Some circumstances connected with the Printing office, prevent its earlier publication.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The Prize tales and essays, and the articles by Brs. Smith and Austin will keep us supplied with all needed long articles, except Sermons, for some time. But a few sermons and lots of short articles are sadly wanted to vary the weekly mental feast for our readers. Must we want—must we ask in vain? I hope not.

Br. Bazin—Please send the "Expositor," if published, to the following addresses:—Geo. D. Countryman, Edward Lindsey, and L. C. Browne, Fort Plain, Montgomery county; C. T. E. Van Horne, Van Hornsville, Herkimer county, and Daniel P. Piper, Paine's Hollow, same county. I will be responsible for the above subscriptions, and endeavor to remit the money soon after the appearance of the first number.

Very truly yours,

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

EVENING.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

The hour is lovely: See the quiet beams
Of silver moonlight, slumbering on the bank
Of crested snow; like the sweet, seraph smile
That gilds the fall of infant loveliness,
When death has passed his icy fingers o'er
The beauteous brow, and bade the eddying whirl
Of life's warm, purple current cease to play!
See how the holy stars, like diamonds bright,
Are sparkling on the pensive brow of eve.
From the far depths of azure, their soft beams,
In quiet loveliness, are streaming down
To brighten up the gorgeous fane of night.
O, who can stand unmoved beneath the vast Star spangled arch, and view those brilliant fires,
That since creation's dawn have wheel'd along
The plains of dazzling ether, and not feel
His soul arise on adoration's wing,
To scale the crystal battlements of heaven;
And join the white-robed company, that stand
Around the sapphire throne, and tune their songs
To Heaven's King, and strike the golden lyres
With sounding sweeps, till the loud echoes ring
Along the amaranth bowers and crystal streams,
On whose fair banks, the trees of endless life
Bloom in unfading verdure? Lives the man
Who can deny the being of a God?
Let him go out beneath the canopy
Of the bright star-lit heavens, and ask his soul,
"Whence all this bright array of suns, and spheres,
That throng the blue cerulean?" Let him go
To the eternal mountains, those vast piles
That rear their castellated domes on high,
And o'er the vales in gloomy grandeur frown.
There, while the foaming cataract's earthquake-voice
Sends up its ceaseless anthem, till the caves
And fissured rocks peal back the solemn roar,
And earth seems trembling in the mighty grasp
Of some strong giant hand—there let him bow
His humble soul, and own creation's God!

MATT. III: 14—JOHN I: 33.

"But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?"—"And I knew him not: but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost."

The following selected notes and accompanying remarks by Br. L. R. Paige, are taken from the Trumpet of the 4th of March. By an inability to think of every thing at the proper time, their insertion in our columns has been delayed until now. The esteemed correspondent to whom Br. Paige refers, will probably answer for himself; but I can not now refrain from saying that I much approve of, have always followed, and found my experience to confirm the results of the excellent rule laid down by Br. Paige in endeavoring to reconcile passages of Scripture. And with this remark, I invite the attention of our readers to what follows.

A. B. G.

There is an apparent discrepancy between these two passages, which has occasioned some difficulty to interpreters. It appears by the context, that, as related by Matthew, John declined baptizing Jesus, and desired to be baptized by him, before he witnessed the descent of the Spirit, which, according to the other Evangelist, was the sign by which he knew him to be the Messiah. The difficulty is to reconcile the two accounts. This has been attempted in two different ways, either of which appears reasonable, and sufficiently removes the appearance of contradiction. Other methods have been proposed; but these strike my mind most favorably. I shall quote one authority of each kind.

CAMPBELL. "This has been thought by some not perfectly consistent with what Luke acquaints us concerning the connexion of their families, and particularly with what we are told, Matt. iii: 14; where we find, that John, when Jesus came to him to be baptized, modestly declined the office, and freely acknowledged the superiority of the latter. But there is no absurdity in supposing that this was in consequence of what the Baptist knew concerning our Lord's personal character, his superior wisdom, and sanctity. Nay, he might have known further, that he was a prophet, and highly honored of God, and yet not have known or even suspected, that he was the Messiah, till the descent of the Holy Ghost at his baptism. All that is affirmed here, is that till this evidence was given him, he did not know him to be the Messiah."—Note on John i: 33.

In this method of solution, Rosenmuller and others concur. That which follows is preferred by Lightfoot and others.

WHITBY. "To the question how the Baptist knew him to be the Christ, before the Spirit descended on him, it is answered by almost all the commentators on the Gospel of St. Matthew, that John the Baptist being a prophet filled with the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb, Luke i: 15, knew by the afflatus of that Holy Spirit, that he who then came to him was the person on whom the Holy Ghost should descend so plentifully, and on whom he should abide, that he might impart him to others, such matters being frequently imparted to prophets, by an immediate intimation of the Holy Spirit. So Simeon, being told that he should not die till he had seen the Lord's Christ, Luke ii: 26, had an afflatus declaring to him, that our Lord was that Christ. So Anna the prophetess, being one of them that expected his coming, by a like afflatus, was moved to speak of him as the promised Messiah, ver. 38. [Here I Sam. ix. 15-17, is referred to, with remarks.] Thus though Moses knew before from the mouth of God, and many other antecedent evidences, that he was by him designed to bring his people out of Egypt, yet God spake thus to him;—This shall be a sign to thee, that I have sent thee, when thou hast brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye shall serve God upon his mountain. Exodus iii: 12. In a word the Baptist being to preach, when he baptized with water, that another should baptize them with the Holy Ghost, God tells him that of this he should see an evidence, by the visible descent of the Holy Ghost, upon him, who from his fullness was to impart this spirit to all true believers; and when our Saviour came to be baptized, tells him again, this was that very person."—Note on Matt. iii: 14.

Perhaps the idea conveyed in a portion of this note is more clearly expressed by LIGHTFOOT thus:

"The sign which was given him, [John the Baptist,] when he began to baptize, 'On whomsoever thou shalt see the Holy Ghost descend,' etc., was not given him for his first knowledge of Christ, but for the confirmation of that knowledge that he had of him before; and for his assurance and confidence to point him out unto the people. And such a one was the sign given to Moses; Exodus iii: 12; not for his first instruction, that he was sent by God, but for his confirmation in that wherein he was before instructed; nor that neither so much for himself as for the people."—Harm. Eten. Matt iii: 14.

I do not take it upon myself to decide which of the foregoing interpretations is most correct. It is sufficient for my present purpose that neither is absurd; and that either is sufficient to remove all apparent difficulty in regard to the two passages under consideration.

My mind was led to this subject, by a remark in the "Magazine and Advocate," February 10, 1837. A writer, for whose opinion on many points I have much respect, speaks of the "irreconcilability" of these two passages. He then says,—

"By consulting Doddridge you will find two attempts at reconciliation, of which I presume neither will prove satisfactory. Of all the solutions of the difficulty of which I have either thought or heard, this appears the most probable;—As Matthew did not attend our Lord till long after this transaction, it is most likely that he was misinformed."

The evident meaning of this, when divested of all gloss, is that Matthew has stated what is not true, being wrongly informed on the subject; and thus the contradiction is removed. I very much regret to see any one adopt such a summary method of leaping over apparent difficulties; and especially do I regret to see such a method adopted by the writer from whom I have quoted.—What reliance can we place on the Scriptures, if we suppose that the sacred writers were not guided by the spirit, at least so far as to prevent them from testifying falsely? Such a course appears to me to involve a denial of every thing and any thing which can be called inspiration. I am unwilling to believe such was the design of the writer in the "Magazine and Advocate." But I confess I know not in what other manner to interpret his language.

It seems to me that a "more excellent way" to be pursued in difficult cases, is this. When I find two passages seemingly inconsistent with each other, or contradictory I use due diligence in endeavoring to reconcile them. If I fail, I consult such writers as are within my reach. If I still fail, I resolve to wait patiently, till more extensive reading or more mature reflection shall enable me to understand the matter more clearly. In no case do I allow myself to imagine that an Evangelist has testified falsely, even by reason of wrong information. I choose rather to attribute all doubt to my own short-sightedness and imperfect knowledge, than to question the veracity of the sacred writers, and the truth of their record. And some dozen or fifteen years experience has confirmed my opinion that this is a prudent course. Many passages which I formerly could not understand, now appear plain; and I doubt not that I shall hereafter understand many things which now appear dark. But at all events let me live and die in the belief that the Scriptures contain a true record, and that all which was actually written by the sacred writers is entitled to full and implicit credit. Especially in cases like that under consideration, where there are two or more methods of avoiding contradiction, let my right hand forget its cunning before it be used to affix the stigma of falsehood on any portion of the sacred record, which comes to us duly authenticated.

CARDINAL WOLSEY.

HAMPTON, England, February, 1837.

The great attraction here, is the famous Old Court, which is indeed really worth coming these 15 miles out of London to see. Let me remind you first of what it has been in other days.

It was built, you will remember, by Cardinal Wolsey, who began it in 1515, at the height of his grandeur: and what that grandeur was, especially for a private subject, three centuries ago, and under the eye too of Henry VIII., a few of the details will enable you to judge. History records that when he resided here, he retained not less than eight hundred persons in his suite. The list of these would fill my sheet; and something of a curiosity it would be to a lover of American simplicity. Take for a specimen twelve doctors and chaplains in attendance on his table:—not to mention four learned counsellors—eight grooms of his chamber—"fourteen footmen, garnished with rich riding coats"—four minstrels—and nine or ten Lords, with each their several servants:—and yeomen, cooks, pastry cooks, clerks, carvers, cup-bearers, ushers and pages without end; thirteen of the latter in the laundry alone. When Wolsey at Henry's command, received the French Embassy at the Treaty of the Tripartite Union,—eight of the noblest French blood, with retinues in proportion,—two hundred and eighty beds were provided for the guests; and furnished in princely style, with basins, ewers, candle-sticks, etc., of solid silver to every room. I can the more easily believe this account since I have walked through the palace, which is no mean journey for half a day.—Why, here are eighteen rooms—halls rather—devoted to the fine arts alone. In the Guard Chamber, besides pictures, arms for a thousand men, are hung upon the walls, which are nearly forty feet high, like most of the others. Some of them are still longer; the hall of Cartoons of Raphael I should say over a hundred feet. American meeting-houses might be stuck in here, if the roofs were off, by the dozen. It is a great hamper of palaces by itself. I am told by a gentleman, who lives near by, that one thousand two hundred chambers can be well fitted up for guests. Wolsey indeed must have used as many. Indeed, under the royal favor, extended, as it is understood, to rather decayed candidates for it, who may be called the shabby-genteel, over sixty families of that description are at this moment largely accommodated within the walls of the palace:—servants and whole establishments included, of course. And yet, as I walked through the palace, it seemed deserted. I felt a melancholy sense of solitude. What a daring magnificence this, for a subject of Henry VIII.—No wonder the King was jealous, and the Cardinal ruined, although when the former significantly asked him what he was building his palace for, with all a courtier's skill he answered, "For your majesty's acceptance," and made him a present of it on the spot! It was a compliment worthy of Wolsey, but it did not save him. It did not secure him even the burial of his body according to the wishes of his death-bed. The magnificent sarcophagus which he provided with that view, has recently, after a long period of obscurity, been appropriated to the Tomb of Nelson in the cellar of St. Paul's. What a lesson to human vanity! And yet not the first from the same text: for more than a century ago, when George the First resided here, the great hall, which he fitted up for a theatre, was opened with "Henry VIII. or the fall of Wolsey!"

A GRAND-FATHER'S LETTERS TO HIS GRAND-CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

LETTER THIRD.

MY DEAR CHILDREN—I will occupy this letter in "putting you in remembrance" of several lessons, which I have not unfrequently inculcated upon you "while I was yet present with you." I will recall to your recollection the principal of those methods, in which I have orally instructed you to exercise yourselves upon the subjects of your reading and reflection from the sacred writings. And much of what I would have you do in reference to these, will equally apply to your study of other compositions—indeed of any composition, writing, or book.

I will suppose that you have fixed upon a paragraph, chapter, or other portion of the Bible, as the subject of your morning meditations, perhaps to be continued throughout the day—the theme of your high-way and by-way reflections. That I may be more specific and better understood, I shall suppose that the passage you have fixed upon is that which consists of the several beatitudes, as they are called, or the description of those whom the Founder of our religion declared happy or blessed, in Matt. v. 3-12.

Your first object is undoubtedly to endeavor to understand what was meant by the speaker or writer. Reading and reflecting for this purpose, you require to adopt a different mode of procedure from that which is proper when you read for practical or devotional purposes.

One thing, then, which I would always have you to attempt is, to form a distinct and vivid representation in your own mind, of every such scene as is susceptible of it. In the instance supposed, you can picture to yourselves, the appearance and expression of Jesus while addressing the multitudes this famous discourse—the sermon on the Mount. An acquaintance with Jewish Antiquities, and especially with the Jewish manner of dressing and of public speaking, will enable you to fill up the picture by clothing Jesus and his motley crowd of auditors in appropriate dress and costume, and make you represent the speaker, not, as is the custom now, in the standing attitude, but in a sitting posture. These pictures which you form to your mind's eye, you may attempt to embody upon paper by drawing, or by such a description as a painter could draw from, or by a combination of both. Wherever the subject admits of it, endeavor to make a picture of the scene or circumstances in your mind, if not upon paper. You will find that, by so doing, the scene, the discourse delivered, and all connected with it, will be very deeply, I might say, indelibly, impressed upon your memory.

Another exercise in which you may employ your thoughts upon such a passage, consists of making out such questions as you would put to a class of younger persons than yourselves to see if they understood it, or to lead them to understand it. This you can do mentally, that is, without sitting down to write out your questions. This, however, when you can filch a fragment of time from other necessary avocations, I would strongly urge you to do also. There are printed questions upon the several books of the Bible for the use of students and Sabbath-school teachers; and it would be an interesting and instructive employment, when you have made a considerable collection of questions, to compare them with those which have been printed, or with those of any of your brothers, sisters or cousins.

You may suppose that you have been trying to make one or more of your mates or acquaintances, understand a verse or two as you understand them; and then make out such questions as would try them whether they understood you or not, or such as would prove, afterwards, whether they remembered what you then said. These questions put into writing, or upon record, will be a remembrance to yourselves of the sense in which you once understood the passage, or may be used to prove whether your memories have retained what, by supposition, you have endeavored to imprint upon those of others.

Another useful employment which you may adopt, consists of making out such questions as you would put to one who was able to answer you, in order that you might more fully understand the sense of what you have been reading. After making use of all the reflection you can, and of all the helps within your reach, there will frequently remain a feeling as if you were not fully satisfied—there will be questions which you would put to one whom you supposed better acquainted with the meaning of your author. These make out distinctly, and put into words, and if you can find opportunity, put them into writing, and preserve them. When next you make the passage a subject of meditation, it will be useful to recur to them. And when some new book, or some well-informed man comes in your way, it will be pleasant if you can procure from them a solution of your difficulties.

Making out in other words the meaning of any passage or paragraph—that is, in words different from those employed by the writer, yet conveying the same signification, you will find a useful occupation. You may do it in about as many words as are employed by your author—or you may express his meaning in the manner of a paraphrase, that is, in a more round-about or circuitous manner of expression—or, after having read a passage and reflected upon it, you may, without again having recourse to the open volume, express in words what seems to you to be the meaning of the writer. This is not only a profitable mode of employing your minds, but it will much assist you in the acquisition of a readiness in expressing your thoughts in writing—in the rather neglected art of composition.

Lastly, there is one request that I would earnestly make of you. It is this: before requesting of any one their opinion of any passage of any writer, or before having recourse to any exposition, commentary, or other explanation, make out for yourselves, an opinion upon the subject,—form some idea of what is, or what is not, meant,—sum up what you do know about the passage and the subject,—and be distinctly aware of where you are in doubt, or whereof you are in ignorance. Form some distinct ideas of your own, before you care to know, or use means to know, what may be the opinions of others. One advantage of this will be, that you will become habituated to think for yourselves—a most invaluable habit—and you will likewise be prepared to be, not the passive recipients of other men's opinions and creeds, but attentive and qualified considerers and judges of the truth, and fairness, and value of their conclusions and belief. By this mode of study, your progress may be but slow, but the value of your acquisitions, the deeper impression made on the memory, and the value of the habits and mental powers which you acquire, amply compensate for this seeming slowness of progress. You will, thus, be the fabricator of your own minds so to speak—that is, of their powers and capacities—and the workers out of your own knowledge and mental progress, instead of the mere drone-like devourers and retailers of the opinions and performances of others.

Learn to be fearless, independent, and judicious thinkers, to think for yourselves, and so you will confer the greatest favor you can upon,

Yours affectionately, _____

THE INFLUENCE OF EXAMPLE.

BY REV. WM. QUEAL.

It is the duty of Christians to understand the influence of their example upon others. For if they are true to their profession, much good is produced in the social compact and in community; according to the greater or lesser circle in which they move.

Mankind derive their habits, not from precepts altogether, but from example. Then, as that example is virtuous or vicious, it will exert that influence on others. We are well susceptible of virtue, and reverence spontaneously its appearance in others. No person is so vicious as not to feel some restraint, when in the presence of a human being whose heart is replete with benevolence and truth, and whose daily deportment corresponds to such profession. The practical Christian is the monitor of the vicious, and by his example, the unthinking, the profane, the dishonest, the profligate and lost are reformed, and brought to exclaim "Lord Jesus, be merciful to us sinners!"

While, then, a good example can remove innumerable evils and afflictions, let us practice the principles of Christianity, which will certainly effect and secure a permanent good, by leading earth's bewildered sons into the glorious liberty of the children of God. We may then properly ask, Reader are you a Universalist; and if so, are you making use of all the means within your power to advance the cause of Gospel truth in the part of Christ's vineyard where you reside? Does your example show that your "faith is one that works by love, and purifies the heart"? Are you determined that the holy cause of religion which you have espoused, shall not fail through want of exertion on your part? If this is your determination and you thus act, God will crown your labors with success.

It is a lamentable fact, that in many of our societies there is a want of cheerful and cordial reciprocation of duties by some of the members: The pecuniary expenses have to be borne by a few liberal individuals, or if they relax their exertions after having their patience worn out by nominal friends, the precious cause of our Redeemer for a time is buried in the dust, and the cruel banner of endless sufferings waves over the walls of our Zion. Where this is the case, societies can never flourish for any great length of time. A want of mutual interest will retard the wheels of any righteous system.

If every Universalist would consider himself as a chief pillar in our denomination, and act as if its whole fate depended upon his exertions, our societies would be established upon a firm foundation, and the "very gates of hell" could not "prevail against them." Never was the time so important as the present, for every one to act individually and collectively, who are interested in bettering the condition of human society. Our cause is in a prosperous condition, but we can retard or increase its influence by our examples. May God enable all who profess, to be zealously affected in a good cause.

ROMANS VIII: 20.

"For the creature was made subject to vanity, not willingly, but by reason of him who hath subjected the same in hope."

Br. Grosh—In number 14 of the Magazine and Advocate, I observe that Br. Sadler has made another effort to substantiate his views of the above passage of Scripture. Br. Sadler "dislikes the mode of determining Scripture by the arbitrary laws of language." Probably he does not dislike the method more than I dislike his mode of violating the laws of language to make a sentence (which before discorded with no part of Scripture) agree with an opinion of his own origination, and which adds nothing to the beauty or harmony of the Bible. Br. Sadler knows that the meaning of a passage must always be determined by the arbitrary laws of language, unless that meaning, when so determined, contradicts something which its author had previously written. Does the passage, according to my view, disagree with any other portion of the Apostle's writings, or with any part of the whole Bible? If so, let Br. Sadler show wherein. If not, then the laws of language, which must decide in such case, pronounce my views correct.

Br. Sadler says that "the New-Testament writers did not use classical Greek, but corrupted it with Hebraisms and provincialisms, consequently not on etymological principles." Has Br. Sadler offered any evidence that the passage under discussion, is either a Hebraism or provincialism? Has he advanced any reasons for supposing that it contravened etymological or classical rules? No—it may be contrary to etymological and classical principles; and a may be is the only evidence that can be given—evidence, on the virtue of which no person is justifiable in altering a passage of the holy records.

Again—"The apostles did not regard grammatical construction as much as they did sentiment and idea, so that it need not surprise us if they made errors in syntax—especially, if we consider the unlettered character of the apostles." Were not the apostles wise enough to know that people would judge of the "sentiment and idea" they wished to convey, by grammatical construction? If they regarded "sentiment and idea," would not their regard for these lead them so to construct their sentences that the "sentiment and idea" could be correctly understood by their readers? Will Br. Sadler attempt to alter the apostle's construction, declare the sentiment conveyed by the grammatical construction of the passage not to be the one intended by its author, and place his view in its stead—a view no more consistent with the rest of Scripture than the one now afforded by the grammatical construction of the passage—and all on the ground that it may be so? And who was the "unlettered" apostle who framed the passage in question? This ignorant and "unlettered apostle" was he who was brought up and educated at the feet of the learned Gamaliel.

Again—"Copyists would be extremely likely to vary grammatical construction to suit their particular notions," and for all these reasons, "but little reliance can be placed on the grammatical sense of a disputed passage." Copyists would be extremely likely not to vary the grammatical construction of a passage to suit their notions, and one likelihood is worth as much as another, where there is no proof on either side. But how does it happen that copyists would alter a passage like the one before us to suit their notions, and leave others untouched which would be far more displeasing to any notion which could not endure this passage than this is? for if there is any doctrine which can not be sustained with this passage as Br. Sadler would have it read, that doctrine will find harder things in the Scripture than this to get along with.

As Br. Sadler's next paragraph simply contains opinions which must fall if the succeeding paragraphs be incorrect, I pass on to notice his remarks on Macknight's translation. He says, "Macknight renders the passage, which he calls a literal translation, thus, 'For the creature was subjected to vanity, not willing it, but by him who hath subjected it,' etc. By supplying the agent understood or implied, this translation shows my interpretation correct, 'For God rendered the creature subject to vanity, not willing it, but by reason of him who subjected the same to hope.'" Br. Sadler says, "by supplying the agent understood or implied, this translation shows my interpretation correct." Why, then, did he not simply do this? No—he first supplies the agent, then makes that agent the nominative, in doing which the verb, which is in the passive voice, is by him put in the active voice; the noun ktisis (creature), which in the Greek, is in the nominative case, and is nominative to the verb in the passive voice, is turned from the nominative into the accusative or objective case governed by a passive verb turned into an active. And all this twisting and distorting of a passage is done to substantiate a view, which, if substantiated, would not improve a particle upon the present one. Br. Sadler says, "For God rendered the creature subject to vanity, not willing it," etc—the Greek says, "For the creature was rendered subject to vanity, not willing it," which makes a vast difference. The word God is not in the passage at all. But allowing Br. Sadler to suppose this was implied, I ask him by what authority he makes an implied word nominative to a verb which already has a nominative expressed, translates this verb, which is in the passive voice, in an active sense for the purpose of finding something for his implied nominative to do, and then renders the regular nominative to this passive verb as if it were in the accusative or objective case, and governs it there by a passive verb used as an active verb? "The way of the transgressor" of all the rules of language, "is hard"—hard, indeed.

Again—he says "Though hekousa (was made subject) is in the feminine gender, that does not absolutely determine its relation.....Macknight, in his preliminary essays to the epistles, says 'the masculine is sometimes put for the feminine, even by classical writers' and quotes examples—of course vice versa." This vice versa business is a bad one. Why not say "two negatives are equivalent to an affirmative, and vice versa, two affirmatives are equivalent to a negative?" "the active voice governs the objective case, and vice versa the objective case governs the active voice?" This vice versa is incorrect. There is a rule in every Greek grammar for the masculine's being often used for the feminine, but none for the feminine's being used for the masculine, as in the nature of things there could not be. The reason why the masculine was sometimes used for the feminine is this.—Among the Greeks, woman was esteemed far inferior to man. Man was the noblest being on earth—woman was but his slave. When a writer wished to ennoble or dignify a female, he coupled her name with a masculine adjective, by which he was supposed to confer upon her the honor or dignity of man—while, on the contrary, to couple a feminine adjective and masculine noun together would have been to degrade the masculine; from which we see that the same reasons which led them to put a masculine adjective with a feminine noun, did not exist to cause them to put a masculine noun with a feminine adjective, and especially when the masculine was no less a person than the Deity. Br. Sadler can find no rule for placing a masculine noun with a feminine adjective, neither examples where it is done; and consequently the adjective hekousa can not agree with the word God either expressed or implied, and of course must agree with the noun ktisis.

What Br. Sadler says about the relative taking the gender of its consequent, amounts to nothing, till he shows his authority for putting a relative where there is none, and thus transforming the Greek of the whole passage. "Hence," he says, "if in this case the relative were supplied as it might properly be, (reading 'waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God who hath subjected the creature to vanity, not willing it,') the gender would be used as in other cases, with our application." I have shown that the gender can not be used at all with his application, and the "other cases" he mentions are not in existence. Now with this rendering (in the parenthesis) of the verse in dispute, together with the one preceding it, I ask what becomes of the little word "For," which commences the twentieth verse, and which does not here appear?

Br. Sadler closes with giving what he conceives to be a literal translation of verses 20 and 21—"For to vanity God appointed the creation, not willing it," etc. I would conceive the following to be rather more literal, if not a great deal so—"For to vanity the creature was appointed or made subject, not willing it," etc. The truth is, Br. Sadler's translation is not in any respect literal; and he himself, by the whole tenor of his article, has confessed that his translation defies all grammar rules, when every person knows that a literal translation is one which is made in strict accordance with grammar rules.

On this subject I have done—I trust forever. If, Br. Grosh, you will be kind enough to publish this article—longer than I intended it should be—entire, I will feel truly thankful to you, and think I can promise you safely that I will not trouble you again in regard to Romans viii: 20. E. B. V.

Schenectady, April 17, 1837.

NOTE.—Br. E. B. V. will, I trust do justice to my motives, if not to my judgment, for the omission of a few passages of his article. I trust, also, he will let us hear from him again, even though the subject should not be Romans viii: 20, nor the article a controversial letter. Our readers will feel easy, I hope, about the discussion—two of the disputants are out of the field—and "one stick of wood," they say, "will not burn long alone." Of course, the end is near at hand. WHAT WILL DO TO DIE BY?

BY ASHLEY CLARK.

Brs. EDITORS—Did you ever hear a person say, that something would do to live by, but would not do to die by?

There is certainly something. What do you think it is? They do say it is Universalism. Yes, the old song, "Universalism will do to live by, but will not do to die by," is sung over, and over, and over again. Though it is thread-bare, and even worn out, the old song is too good to be laid aside.

What distress it must bring a person into, to think, when about to leave this world, he shall be saved from sin, death and sorrow, and crowned with a glorious immortality, and join with all the ransomed family of man, in singing the deathless song of redeeming grace, throughout the wasteless ages of eternity! O, such a thought is distressing!! Who—O, who could endure the thought for a moment?

But, says the objector—"It is not the thought of heaven and happiness that gives distress—but it is the fear of going to hell. This is what distresses the Universalist, when on a dying bed." The fear of going to hell!! Is this Universalism? Is it not Partialism? Does Universalism teach us that we, or any of our fellow-creatures, are going to hell, to endure misery without end? This is Universalism with a witness! No; this is not Universalism—it is the want of it. It is Partialism. It is the very system which harrows up the soul with sensations of horror and despair. It expects damnation, endless and unutterable. It distrusts the goodness of God. It despairs of His paternity. It looks upon him as a frowning Deity—a destroyer of our race—a being indignant and revengeful. It expects a separation of the human family. It looks upon our friends and fellow-creatures as the objects of God's wrath and vindictive ire. Not so with Universalism. Universalism looks upon the Deity as a Father—a friend and a munificent benefactor. It expects heaven and happiness. It anticipates a happy immortality with all the ransomed creation of God.

And yet it is said Universalism will not do to die by!! What is the reason it will not do to die by? Is it because it imparts comfort and resignation in that trying hour? Or is it because it is supposed to be false, and the person professing it, now believes its falsity—renounces it—and dies a miserable death? Admitting this to be fact; who can not see that it is not Universalism that he dies by? Nor is it Universalism that is the cause of his miserable death, but the reverse—viz. Partialism. He now believes that Universalism is false and Partialism true. He is then a Partialist—believing in the doctrine of an endless hell, and as a consequence, dies a despairing, miserable death!

But Partialism will do to die by. The want of Universalism will do to die by. The thought that millions of our fellow-creatures shall be separated from the rest, and wail in endless despair—O, this is a pleasing thought! Delightful theme! It fills the soul with joy unutterable! To think of the endless separation of our fellow-creatures—brethren, friends and neighbors—what joy and consolation it imparts! This is Partialism. Partialism will do to live by, and it will do to die by; and Universalism will do to live by, but—but—but—it will not do to die by!

Reader—if you are not consummately silly, you will not say “Universalism will do to live by, but will not do to die by.” For if Universalism be false, it will not do to live by. If it be true, it will be better than any other system to die by.

ANNIHILATION.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

There are many minds at the present day, that seem disposed to cherish the doctrine of annihilation. There is a reckless spirit abroad, that would deprive man of all hope of another state of being. There would be some excuse for this spirit, if it offered any thing better than it took away. But it is like taking away our bread, and giving us poison; like driving us from our peaceful home, and leaving us in the unsheltered wilderness; like quenching the sun, and leaving humanity to grope its way in everlasting darkness. Annihilation presents cheerless views of death. Who can look on the end of life with composure, that indulges the dreary thought that he is to take up his abode in the dark and dreary grave forever? The sentiment dishonors God, inasmuch as it supposes the Deity “to spare every thing corporeal, and destroy every thing mental.” Sound philosophy teaches that positive destruction of matter is unknown in all the works of God. True, every thing changes its form, but in all the mighty revolutions of nature, nothing is lost. Annihilation presents an unfinished plan in the creation of God. According to this theory, there seems to be a great end in every department of the creation, except in the formation of the human mind. Here are splendid powers which seem far too vast for the imperfect scenes of this life. A noble plan is laid, but left unfinished. There is a fine Spring, a beautiful Summer, but no harvest. It is as though the sun should come forth in all its splendor, and just begin to throw his smiles over creation, then sink down in everlasting night. Like the painter, who spreads his canvass, and images forth a few leading features of his hero, and then dashes the work from his presence. Like the statuary, who wakes up the sleeping marble, and chisels out a plan of his great work, and then leaves it unfinished forever. These emblems bearly shadow forth the weakness and absurdity of the theory which confines the operations and enjoyments of man to this earthly scene. There is not one ray of comfort to be found in the sentiment. Indeed it entirely extinguishes all hope, and ends every noble desire. In fact, there is a close connexion between a belief in the entire extinction of intellect, and immortality. It gives a man ignoble views of himself. The whole intellectual and moral creation is at once brought on to a level with mere animal life. The grave shuts the scene; the mind is no longer to hold intercourse with the Eternal Spirit that pervades and fills the universe. Hence, the affections become blunted and the social feelings dampened. Who can feel to cultivate the intellect, when all its powers are so limited in their duration? The soul, in view of its extinction, can hardly aspire after sublimity and moral excellence. A multitude of beings are around us, but they are like shadows on the plain. All association ends with life. Death reigns triumphant over all the scene. But blessed be God, light breaks in upon our world from above. Hear the voice of Jesus, “Let not your heart be troubled, ye believe in God, believe also in me,” —“because I live, ye shall live also.” —“Fear not. I am the first and the last. I am he that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am alive forevermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death.” —“This mortal must put on immortality.”

“ * * * * * And see,

’Tis come,—the glorious morn—the second birth
Of heaven and earth. Awakening Nature hears
The new-creating word, and starts to life

In every heighten’d form, from pain and death
Forever free. * * * * *

A CALL TO PREACH.

Messrs. EDITORS—Your readers will recollect that in an article which appeared in your paper last Autumn, over the signature of “B.,” I assumed the position that a call to preach, consists in a disposition to do so. Permit me to assign some reasons, in addition to those which that article contained illustrative of the correctness of my views on the subject.

St. Paul, upon taking notice of the operations of his mind, exclaimed, “Wo is me if I preach not,” by which he meant, that he should be unhappy, unless he became a minister of the Gospel. He had been converted by a miracle, and sent by the Saviour in person, to preach to the Gentiles, and therefore had every reason to believe he could be more useful in that capacity than any other. And therefore he felt disposed to preach.

Now though it is true that St. Paul was expressly called by Jesus Christ in person, and by miracle, will it be said that any body else ever was? If so, who are they? Will some individual not more orthodox than John Knox, inform me? That some persons have a call from his Satanic Majesty, is perhaps sometimes the case. I am unwilling, however, to do even that “old serpent,” the devil, the injustice to admit that he actually calls every one that claims that honor!

I recently heard J— L—, a deacon of the Baptist church, in S—, Rensselaer county, N. Y., say, with a firm conviction of the truth of the assertion, that soon after he “got religion;” he had a call to preach, which upon inquiry and reflection, he ascertained was from the devil! I observed to the deacon, that the being whom he named, could not be serious in calling men to promulgate a doctrine to which he is opposed. The deacon replied he had no doubt but that the devil was in earnest about it. I then said, what I believe is true, that inasmuch as the devil has been employed in the acquisition of valuable knowledge, for several thousand years; certainly ever since, (to use the sublime language of the bard.)

“In Adam’s fall
We sinned all;”

he, the devil, must, by this time, be too shrewd and wise to call men to preach who are entirely unqualified for the great work. It is rather humiliating to acknowledge it, but nothing I could say, shook the deacon’s faith in the poor old devil’s call.

Messrs. Editors, I very much regret that so pious a man, as deacon L— should seriously think, that the “Enemy of all righteousness” is so friendly to him, as to give him a special call! But my regret is diminished, by the consideration that the deacon has concluded not to obey the call.

How any man of intelligence can believe that such a being, as a “fallen angel,” exists, in the shape of a snake; I am at a loss to determine.

And he who maintains that any kind of snakes feel interest enough in the diffusion of the truths of the Gospel, to call deacons and elders to engage in the work, evinces less reason than mental hallucination. But I stop here.

The reader will pardon me for having dragged criticism down from her lofty bowers, even to ridicule sentiments which “shock all common sense.”

Deacon L— is engaged in an honest calling at his residence; and, in all human probability, he will pursue it, at least, until the good old gospel-loving devil renews the call. It is possible that the devil overrated the deacon, at the time he called him to preach. “It is devoutly to be wished” that this article, should it meet the eye of old Nick, may convince him of his error; for, in that case, the deacon will have the consolation to remain, through the residue of his earthly pilgrimage, in the “blessed retreats of private life.”

I am, Messrs. Editors, decidedly in favor of a “preached Gospel.” Men, we know, are bad with it; but as Franklin truly said, they would be worse without it. Let it be preached then. And let those who are qualified, and whose conduct exhibits lucid proof that they are honest, be liberally sustained in their high vocation. N.

FACTS.

1. One of the earliest defences of Christianity against the attacks of its enemies, was written by Origen, an eminent Universalist of the third century, and one of the most learned and excellent men of the age in which he lived.

2. One of the first, if not the very first, treatise published in the United States on the deleterious “Effects of ardent spirits upon the human body and mind,” was written by the well known Dr. Benjamin Rush, a believer in (to use his own language) the final “salvation of all mankind.” He was also a warm friend and correspondent of the beloved Winchester.

3. The first associated body of religionists that publicly passed a formal resolution censuring the use of ardent spirits, was the Universalist Convention of the New-England and other States.

4. The first theatre and the first circus in the United States used for religious purposes were those used by the pious Winchester, of whom it is needless for me to speak, his praise being in all the churches that love the faith of a world’s salvation which was delivered to the saints.

What will our Partialist brethren, who contend that no good can come of Universalism—that no good thing can come out of Nazareth—say to these things? DAVID.

REVISED MARRIAGE LAW.

“If either of the parties between whom the marriage is to be solemnized, shall not be personally known to him, the minister or magistrate shall ascertain, to his satisfaction, the identity of the respective parties.”—Revised Stat. vol. 7, chap. viii. tit. 1, sec. 10. Edition of 1836.

The above is the law as it now stands. It will be perceived that the amendment relieves clergy men of much trouble, in certain cases; and for the benefit of those who may not know of the amendment, I have thought proper to send it for publication. L. C. B.

REASONS FOR BELIEVING PARTIALISM.

Every person who believes in his own salvation and in the endless damnation of others, believes, first, from the consideration that God is partial—or, secondly, from the consideration that he has merited God’s favor. Reader, are you a Partialist? If so, which proposition do you adopt? The first, or the second? Methinks it is the second. Well, recollect, that is Pharisee righteousness. Do you believe in an endless hell for any one—believe it for yourself. Then we will believe, and not then, that you are destitute of any righteousness.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

From the Millennial Harbinger.

No. 6.—Mr. Campbell to Mr. Skinner.

DEAR SIR—After a silence of so many months, occasioned by circumstances well known to you, permit me to resume my pen:—

NONE of my readers will accuse me of any effort on my part to provoke this controversy with Universalists on their peculiar sectarianism. The proposed discussion with Mr. Skinner, from his own showing, was transferred to him by Mr. Montgomery, of Auburn, New-York; and Mr. Montgomery, on his own responsibility, assumed the place of Mr. Spencer; and Mr. Spencer simply addressed me one letter on a single query, without any proposition of a discussion, which query I answered without the slightest intimation of having undertaken, or being about to undertake, a debate on such questions. So the matter terminated, as I supposed, to the satisfaction of Mr. Spencer, from whom I have never since heard.

From October, 1835, till February, 1836, there was a profound silence on the subject of my reply to friend Spencer. In February we published Mr. Montgomery's letter, and replied to his queries in the same number. Silence again ensued, and continued till in June last, when I had an introduction to Mr. M. in the house of brother Shepherd, of Auburn, when I received from him what I understood to be a challenge on the subject of my reply to him of February, 1836. It was, indeed, with much apparent modesty couched in this question:—'Will you,' said Mr. Montgomery, 'publish letters from me in reply to you on the subject of Universalism?' or, 'Will you continue to publish letters from me if I continue to write on the subject of my letter to you.' In one of these forms of expression I was addressed on that occasion; and I am pleased to see that in Mr. M.'s letter to Mr. Skinner he has fully admitted it, in these words:—'brother Skinner—June 29, 1836.—Mr. Campbell is now here. It was to see him that I delayed writing to you. I called upon him this morning to know whether he would publish my letters, if I continued them. I did not at first allude to a substitute. He objected to me on account of my youth.'

All men of sense, to say nothing of sensibility, will, I doubt not, interpret this as I then did, into a very plain challenge to discuss the merits of Universalism with Mr. Montgomery on the pages of the Harbinger. I looked upon the young gentleman, in the bloom of 25, or thereabout, as quite a promising Goliath, and upon the whole thought it safest to decline the combat: yet, as one does not like to be called a coward, I got off honorably, telling him that as I was going 'down East' to the regions of light, I would, when nigher the sun-rising, in Boston, or somewhere thereabout, rather encounter some of the older giants, the Anakims or Zamizummins of Universalism; for if I killed him, these sons of Hercules would say I only killed a mere stripling, which would be unmanly and dishonorable. I very gravely, indeed, inquired of my redoubtable friend the names of the mighty men in Boston, and he gave me a full statement of their respective merits. But, Sir, it may be gratifying to yourself, as well as the public, to know that he represented Mr. Skinner, of Utica, to be as competent as the best of them; nay, perhaps, 'a more ready writer than any of them.' Of this, however, I will not say much more, lest some might think that the fame which he gave me of yourself was the cause of my passing Utica without a call.

But it has come to pass, that notwithstanding his writing to the constellation of Boston, apprizing them of his communication with me, and my intimating to Mr. Balfour, whom he represented as the most learned, if not the most gifted of them all, my willingness to discuss this subject, especially from the attitude in which Universalism stood since Dr. Ely and Mr. Thomas had given a new volume on the subject; I received no invitation to discuss the question, though, as I learned, most of these gentlemen heard me speak while in Boston, and perhaps allude to their dogmas. Having received no invitation, I gave none: for to offer challenges is not my custom. Every public discussion which I have had on any religious question, has been on an accepted challenge. On this occasion, then, I appear in my usual attitude.

But now that I am before the public in defence of the sanctions of the Gospel, of the basis of God's moral government and of all political government, against a system of religious and moral belief which makes Satan a metaphor, hell a fable, and punishment after death a mere bugbear, I trust I have found an honorable, talented, and learned disputant; a gentleman indeed who will sustain that character to the end. As such, I will respect and address him.

He has, however, been too eager for the combat: for he has rushed into the arena without a single proposition, stipulation, or preliminary arrangement.

Were he asked, What are the propositions which we have agreed to discuss? What are the rules of this discussion? How long is it to continue? Who is to open and close it? What are the rules of evidence to be relied on? What the authorities to be admitted? etc. etc. I can not imagine what answers he would give. For my part I would respond, in general terms, that I never had a stipulation with Mr. Spencer, or Mr. Montgomery, or Mr. Skinner, on any one of these matters.

Certainly Mr. Skinner will admit that there ought to be some such previous understanding, and that I ought to have at least half the contract or stipulations on these very important points, if we intend that the public shall be benefited by our labors. He might spread the controversy over the whole face of the Atlantic, as in his letter published in our last number, and the discussion might continue for years without any beneficial result.

If, indeed, a written discussion had been duly proposed by 'Spencer' in 1835, or by Mr. Montgomery in 1836, and if all the propositions and rules of discussion had been agreed upon and published to the world, Mr. Skinner, in accepting the place of such parties to a discussion in 1837, might have commenced, sans ceremonie, as he has done, and gone a-head, as he seems disposed to do, as though he were hasting out of cannon shot of the enemy. But neither of these gentlemen were ever parties to a discussion with me, and consequently Mr. Skinner, in taking their place, as he seems to wish to do, is without law, or rule, or stipulation in the case; and had he not been rich in resources, he ought to have saved his nine columns, or nine feet of argument, till we had got some point or proposition logically before us at which to have aimed his artillery. At present he has lost much ammunition by not waiting the arrival of his opponent. However, it has gone to our readers without comment, and it is to them so much clear gain.

I will not, indeed, incur the censure of all literary men by beginning a debate without a clear and definite understanding of the points at issue, and the rules of discussion. It will serve no purpose for Mr. Skinner to waste time in telling me that he prosecutes a controversy begun; for there was no controversy begun: nor that he continues to sustain a proposition agreed upon; for there was no proposition agreed upon: and hence Mr. Spencer and Mr. Montgomery write on different subjects; and Mr. Skinner has got a little of every thing in his first letter. He may say, indeed, that I have agreed to have a discussion on the peculiarities of Universalism, and have accepted him as a disputant on the recommendation of Mr. M. as a substitute letter-writer on something connected with the party; and he may say that I proposed an oral, but that he preferred, and seized, instantly, on a written discussion of something; and that I proposed certain considerations in my letter to him of the 29th November, and that he answered them on the 23d December, as now published in both our Magazines; and that, without again hearing from me, he commenced and published a very long article while I was attending to a discussion which kept me from home for ten weeks; and that he practically claims the right of beginning when, and where, and how he pleases; and of continuing, ad infinitum, or otherwise, as he pleases. All this, and perhaps more, he may say: but I say, and will stand to it, that we have not agreed upon the questions to be discussed, nor upon the rules of the discussion, nor upon the evidences to be relied on, nor upon the extent to which we shall prolong the investigation, and that these are essential matters with all logicians and with all persons who aim at perspicuity, conviction, and public utility. I shall, therefore, take upon me to show what questions I think may be embraced in the contemplated discussion, and leave it with the gentleman to say whether any or all of them shall be debated:—

1. Is there any punishment for sin?
2. If any, is that punishment present or future?
3. If future, is that future before or after death?
4. If after death, is it temporary or eternal?

Or, to embrace your views of the Gospel in a single question on which to concentrate all the force of argument on both sides, perhaps you would prefer to affirm your Gospel in one proposition, viz.—

5. Is eternal life the ultimate destiny of all mankind?

An issue can be formed on your answer to any one of these questions.

You may have a dispute about words or things. You may affirm, if you please, that—

1. There is no word in Hebrew, Greek, Latin, or English, which, in its literal and primary sense, denotes duration without end; or that—

2. The nature of the substantive only can qualify the attribute, and not the attribute the nature of the substantive! Thus whether God be eternal, or the saints forever happy, can not be proved from the words eternal or forever; but from the nature of the substantive God, the substantive saints, or the substantive happiness. This would seem to embrace one of those points on which you feel most strong. Hence, that—

3. Unless there be something in the nature of misery which makes eternal mean duration without end, no living person can prove that eternal, prefixed to misery, means misery without end; and that unless there be something in happiness which is of necessity endless, as there is in God, no epithet can be found which would certainly indicate it. Or,

4. You may affirm that gehenna, tartarus, sheol, oulen, hades, aitoon, aionos, aevum, etc., etc., separate or together, afford no certainty whatever on the future destiny of man; and thus we may have a logomachy most preposterous and uninteresting to ninety-nine of every hundred of our readers. For debates of this sort afford to the weak party a great facility of throwing dust in the eyes of the great mass, while they escape exposure in the panoply of bold and confident assertion, which with many is more convincing than all the syllogisms of logic or the whole syntax of reason.

If, then, you prefer a dispute about words rather than things, you will select one or more of these four propositions, or some of similar categories and predicaments; but if you go for things, or for approaching the main point at once, meet me on such of the first four questions as you may suppose will afford an issue, which you will ascertain by answering those questions with a Yes or No; or meet me on the fifth, which is after all, the marrow and fatness of Universalism.

Now for the evidence which may be introduced in the discussion: on which I beg leave to suggest—

1. That a future state being wholly a matter of revelation, no other witnesses than the Apostles and Prophets, or the spirit of God speaking in them, can be admitted as of any authority.
2. That their testimony on the subject is complete in the Old and New Testaments, especially in the latter.
3. That the words of the Bible are to be subjected to the canons of criticism or laws of language current in the commonwealth of letters; and that no new, or by-laws, other than those to which all writings of the same antiquity are subjected, can be admitted in the interpretation of any disputed word or sentence.

4. That King James' version shall be ultimate in every appeal to translations; or if the gentleman choose, I will not object to the new and improved version on the basis of Campbell, MacKnight, and Doddridge.

And finally for the rules of Discussion:—

1. As the challenge came from the Universalists, and as they have opened the discussion, the propositions discussed shall be so framed as that Mr. Skinner take the affirmative, and A. Campbell the negative. As for example, Mr. Skinner affirms that eternal life, according to the Scriptures, shall be the ultimate destiny of all mankind; and A. Campbell denies it.

2. The respondent shall of course close the discussion.

3. The disputants shall occupy equal space in their respective periodicals.

4. No letter shall occupy more than six pages, bourgeois, of the Millennial Harbinger.

5. The discussion shall not transcend twelve letters on each side.

6. The parties shall, as early as possible, in every month, forward to each other a proof-sheet of their letters.

7. The parties shall always confine themselves to the proposition under discussion, if there be more than one, (which there ought not if possible) so long as it is agreed to prosecute it.

Such, in our judgment, would be a fair arrangement with reference to public edification; and if our friend Mr. Skinner will assent to it, or propose any reasonable amendment, I shall proceed forthwith to respond to him on any issue which he may form on the aforesaid premises.

For the edification of our readers, and in evidence of the correctness of the views above presented, I shall offer a remark or two on the communications of these three Universalists.

Mr. Spencer appears not as a disputant, but in the attitude of a querist. His plan was to state his views of gehenna, aioon, aioonos, oleu, and aeoum, as he had gleaned them from various sources; and not finding in them as he reasoned "any punishment for sinners after death," he calls upon me in the following words:—"Now, Sir, in the Scriptures, both Jewish and Christian, can furnish evidence to prove a punishment for sinners after death, do let me have it; and if such punishment is established, then I want to know the nature of such punishment in point of duration."

In my reply to this query, discovering that Mr. Spencer was no very profound adept in verbal criticism, and especially because I wished to state a few plain facts and reasons, I did not dispute with him on the biblical import of those terms; but observed that "all he had said about gehenna and its correlates, and even more than he had said, may be admitted, and yet eternal life and eternal death remain the immutable and invincible sanctions of God's last message to mankind, and all his inferences and conclusions be repudiated by every believer of the Gospel as illogical and unscriptural."

Mr. Skinner was then mistaken, when, in his letter of February 10th, as published in our March number, page 130, he represents me as "giving up sheol, hades, gehenna, as being in themselves insufficient to teach the doctrine of endless misery." I did not say so. Certainly the gentleman can discriminate between admitting or conceding for the sake of argument, or for saving of time or labor, the plea or hypothesis of a querist or an opponent, and admitting that plea as incontrovertibly just and true. I trust, then, he will be more observant and acute in future. I never did admit it; but I was pleased, for the sake of brevity and despatch, to concede his hypothesis; and because a debate about Greek and Hebrew words to the multitude of readers is a most uninteresting matter—especially when every thing can be established without such a logomachy.

Mr. Montgomery appears to have been more attentive than Mr. Skinner to the qualification of my concessions to Mr. Spencer; for he quotes a part of my reasons for the concession, in the words following, to wit: "To the extent and application of Spencer's criticisms, and to the style of his reasonings I might, perhaps, make some exceptions; but to save time and labor, always with me a desideratum, I will concede the whole!"—Does this look like giving up the import of the terms of this controversy?

Mr. Montgomery also first appears not as a disputant, but as one praying for more light on the subject. His words are: "I therefore write to present my views on this subject, praying you to point out wherein you deem me to be in error on the momentous question of scriptural knowledge."

Mr. Spencer appears not in defence of Universalism, but as a querist. Mr. Montgomery defends Universalism against my remarks on Spencer's inferences; but with him I had no controversy about terms or inferences. If, however, I must go into an examination of the terms, I shall show that the common translation is a very fair representation of the original, and that by an English concordance it is quite possible for a mere English scholar to arrive at as much certainty concerning the future destiny of all mankind, as from all the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin Bibles and lexicons on earth.

As it would be incompatible to reply to your March letter to me, while as yet the preliminaries are open and unsealed, and no proposition logically before us, I beg to enter my caveat against one species of debating growing into esteem in some places.

The ad captandum style of controversy, a species of rhetoric for effect, is much in fashion now-a-days in Rome—and Cincinnati. I had concluded that Roman Catholics had got a patent for it in this country, but I see one of the Editors of your paper has got a hand in it some way or other. Speaking of myself, under date of the 3d of February, in reference to this controversy, you say: "If he (myself) does succeed in putting down Universalism, at which he aims, he will accomplish a great thing—a thing, by the bye, which no other man has ever yet succeeded in accomplishing." I could find some other fine specimens of this style in your letter of March, but I dare not touch them at present. Permit me to say of this stroke of policy, that the class that are caught by it are much in need of Universalism. What cause was ever put down by a single discussion, or by one or two efforts? Was corrupt Judaism—was any system of idolatry or of false philosophy thus put down and destroyed by the apostles? Has Romanism, Mahometanism, or infidelity been put down by all the efforts of a thousand years! And what does this prove?—that Romanism, Mahometanism, or skepticism is true and righteous! or those opposed to them are in error or imbecile? What else could you mean by it! Let us, then, have no more of this lure. They are silly birds that are caught in such a snare. I do not think that if the twelve apostles were with us in disguise, and to debate every day as Paul used to do, they could put down Romanism, Mahometanism, Paganism, or any other erroneous or corruptism in twice seven years. Still they would do a great deal; and we hope to do something for the truth, and to keep alive the ancient "enmity between thy seed and her seed," till the time when the saints shall possess the kingdom.

I profess in the spirit of candor and of truth to discuss the points at issue, and I trust that I shall be met in the same spirit and style. I regret that the preliminaries were not arranged before you commenced. It is better, however, as the case is, to await their acceptance, than to put to sea without compass, or pilot, or port in view. I have no doubt but much time and many words will be saved by a due regard to the oracles of reason, of logic, and of experience, in the commencement. In order to expedite, as much as possible, the discussion, I request either the acceptance of the rules proposed, or such amendments as may be substituted, by return of mail, as I shall forward this communication to you by the first mail in April.

Very respectfully, A. CAMPBELL.

INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.

Under this head, last week, our correspondent "David" briefly considered the prejudices of many well meaning Christians to the use of instrumental music in the services of the sanctuary, and adduced the testimony of the Psalmist in favor of the practice. I consider the subject important enough to add a few remarks to those he offered, trusting they will tend to the removal of lurking prejudices, and enable some to enjoy the exhilarating and joyous effects of instrumental combined with vocal devotional music.

Among the Jews, instrumental music was not only allowed, but actually commended as a portion of their temple worship, as is evident from the Psalms, prophets and many of the historians of the Old Testament. This worship, though abrogated by the Christian dispensation, has many of its parts (as singing, prayer, and reading the Scriptures) embodied in that which succeeded it.—And if instrumental music is not included, it is certainly no where forbidden—on the contrary, the apocalyptic visions of the Revelator seem to sanction it, by describing the twenty-four elders as each having a harp in his hand (v : 8); the angels as having trumpets (viii, ix); and the deprivation of music as being a part of the great judgment of God on mystery Babylon. And even Jesus, in the parable of the prodigal son indirectly approves "music and dancing," by naming them as testimonials of the joy of the father at his son's return.

It is highly probable that the Christians in Judea, after being excluded from the temple and synagogues, were unable to mingle instrumental music with their singing, and were therefore without it; but no where do we find in the New Testament, any censure of that common practice. It is also highly possible that the Christians in Pagan lands, scrupulously abstained from the use of instrumental music in their religious meetings, because to use it might seem like acknowledging the existence of the Heathen divinities, to whom every instrument of music was especially dedicated; yet no where in the epistles, do we find any injunction to such a forbearance.—From the precepts and writings, then, of the New Testament, we have much to warrant instrumental music in our worshipping assemblies—from the practices of early Christians, nothing against it—while the most prejudiced will search in vain for any express prohibition on the subject. We turn, then, to those objections founded on prejudice, and the supposed effects of its use.

The Christian church was no sooner firmly established, and all fear of Paganism removed, than all the aids which had proved so effectual to sustain the sinking cause of Heathenism in the affections of the people, were introduced to aid Christianity. And in a short time, the gods and goddesses were transformed into male and female saints, the Saviour and his apostles, and even Jupiter became Jehovah. The traveller in modern Rome finds himself in Heathendom, but with all its temples, statues and paintings Christianized, and baptized with other names. Of course, music also, in every form, became an adjunct of Roman Catholicism. Many of the early Reformers, brought their ascetic tempers from the cloister and the hermitage, and pitted them against the splendor, show, luxury and refinement of "the Unchaste Woman of Babylon," as they termed the Roman hierarchy. To show their opposition to every thing like Romanism, they commanded standing during prayer, instead of kneeling; reprobated and destroyed every thing relating to the fine arts, even to the beautifully stained glass of ancient cathedrals and churches, and the splendidly illuminated pages of ancient books of Roman Catholic devotion! Every thing, from a cross to a statue—from an ornamental capital letter at the beginning of a chapter to an ancient unrivalled painting—from a penny whistle to an organ—was "the sign of the beast," which every good Christian was bound to destroy—at least to condemn, as one of the inventions of the devil!

Time has eradicated many of these bitter and barbarous prejudices, unworthy the minds of Christians; and has worn off the sharp corners of others; but some have descended down, but little improved, even to our own day—like the cast off clothing of our ancestors, ill-suited to our wearing, and in utter discordance with the spirit of the age in which we live. If there was an excuse for our ancestors, (viz: that these seducing influences powerfully aided the church of Rome to the detriment of the reformation,) there is none for Christians at the present day, when enlightened intellect, and not sensual feelings, is the bar at which Protestantism pleads for triumph.—And, rarely music is not so inseparably connected with the cause of Romanism, that it can not be used without injury to the Protestant faith. On the contrary, it is as free to us, as it is to them; and it can be as beneficially used to excite our devotional feelings, as to aid theirs.

But the greatest objection is, to the effects of instrumental music. It excites bad association, from being used in the streets, the ball-room, the dance-house and the low revel. But is not the human voice, as well as flutes, viols, violins, trumpets, bugles, etc., etc., used in these places and assemblies—in the song of sentiment, the amorous ditty, the drinking glee and the obscene catch? Why not object to singing, then, as introducing disagreeable associations also? The organs of speech are used for cursing, swearing and blasphemy too—uses to which (to the shame of the human voice be it spoken) no violin or flute ever has its sounds prostituted. Hence the objection on this score is stronger, by far, to the use of the human voice in social and public worship, than the use of instrumental music. True—the voice utters words which have meaning; but how often is their meaning totally inapplicable to the circumstances—"a solemn sound upon a thoughtless tongue"—while the instrument avoids this incongruity, and utters sounds which have feeling, and tend to produce feelings in accordance therewith, in all who hear.

As to those who are so outrageously pious, that they can not hear a violin, flute or organ in a church without having their devotion disturbed by its sounds, I should be inclined to blame them rather than the instrument.—If their devotional feelings were really as great and intense as they would have us believe, there would be little room left in their minds for associated reminiscences of the ball-room, or the drunken revel; and even if there were, gentle pity, rather than wrath, would fill their bosoms, unless they felt themselves severely criminated by their own recollections! I will conclude this long and probably dry essay with an anecdote.

A certain aged deacon "down East," was much offended at the introduction of a bass viol into the choir. He gave no reason, save that he did not like it—it was wrong—it disturbed him. But at last, being hard pressed to say why he did not like it—why it disturbed him—he aroused recollections of his former habits in the minds of his brethren, by angrily exclaiming—"confound the big fiddle! I can never hear it without feeling a cramp in my toes!" The Deacon had been a wild young man and a great dancer!

MR. CAMPBELL'S LETTER.

Just as our last paper went to press we received Mr. Campbell's reply (?) to Br. Skinner. It will be found in another column, under the proper head. Very probably (if a copy has been sent to Richmond, Va., as requested) Br. Skinner's reply to it will be here in time for insertion in our next paper. To Br. Skinner alone, does it belong to comment on Mr. Campbell's propositions and remarks; but I may be permitted as a mere individual, to express my regret—and I think I speak the feelings of every candid reader of both papers—that Mr. Campbell did not reply to Mr. Skinner's arguments, instead of seeking, at this late hour, to recur back to explanations and preliminaries. And most of all do I regret—very deeply regret that he manifests an inclination to require such limits to the discussion as must effectually prevent any thing like a full, thorough, or satisfactory investigation of this very important subject. Twelve letters on each side, each occupying but six pages burgeois of the Millennial Harbinger, will give but seventy-two pages to a side. These seventy-two pages, will be equivalent to but about sixty-five columns of this paper in our ordinary type. Of course, nothing like justice can be done to the subject, condense the arguments as closely as possible, and reply to them as briefly as Mr. Campbell may—and consequently, the discussion must close in the very midst of it—just when it becomes most interesting, and is least satisfactory to the honest, candid inquirers after truth who read it.

In thus expressing my individual regrets, I again repeat, I do it not as intending to interfere in the discussion, or to reply to what Br. Skinner only has any proper right to answer. I only say I am very sorry that Mr. Campbell does not incline to investigate and discuss both sides of the subject fully and thoroughly.

MATTHEW XVIII: 10.

"Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones: for I say unto you that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven."

The literal interpretation of figurative expressions based on earthly things and applied to a state of spirituality, has tended much to obscure the meaning of Scripture. Whether this has happened with the passage before us, may be doubtful to some; but to my mind is evident. I do not feel myself, at present, able fully and clearly to explain it; but having long since been asked to do so, I will endeavor to clear away a portion of the obscurity now attached to it by the common opinion, in the hope that some one more able than myself may be led to complete the work.

"Do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven."—To republicans who consider the supreme ruler, however exalted, to be but a man—the servant of the people—always accessible to them—as mingling with them on terms of equality—it is more difficult to convey the sense of this passage, than to monarchists. Among the despotic governments of Asia, the king carefully secludes himself from the people, on the principle that "familiarity begets contempt." It is a great privilege to be admitted into his presence, and always to be allowed to enter before him and gaze upon his countenance is one of the greatest favors an oriental monarch can bestow. Among such people—to such people—and measurably for such people, the language of our text was uttered. By them its allusion was perfectly understood—and every spiritually minded hearer would be able, at once, to carry out the earthly practice of the figure, so far as it was applicable to spiritual things, and to reject all that was inapplicable.

To behold—to see—in Scripture very frequently means, to delight in—to feel the beauty and loveliness and grace of the object—to enjoy. As, for instance—though "flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of heaven," which is not a sensual or earthly kingdom, but a moral or spiritual one—yet if "a man be born again (or from above) he shall see [not "enter," as it is often erroneously quoted,] the kingdom of heaven"—i.e. he shall feel its loveliness and grace—he shall delight in or enjoy that "righteousness, peace and joy in a holy spirit," in which the kingdom of God consists. To "behold God," in our text, may mean the same enjoyment, but in a higher and more real degree, as the scene may be a higher, more spiritual one.

"Angels"—otherwise "messengers" as the word may be generally rendered, may possibly be used to express man in a state of immortality, in this passage. If so, the word "angels" is but another term to express the "little ones," and not to mean other heavenly beings—"guardian angels," as is commonly understood. These little ones, in their angelic condition shall always enjoy God's immediate presence, or peculiar presence. While Christians, generally, believe in separate orders of beings between God and man, as angels, cherubim, seraphim, etc., others contend that there are no angelic beings but what were once human beings—and that these terms relate merely to the different orders of human souls glorified and rendered angelic. Baron Swedenborg, mystical and visionary as he is generally supposed to be, took the latter (to me) more rational and probable hypothesis.

But lastly—there is no necessity for transferring the meaning of the passage to a state of immortality, beyond this life. The first term "heaven," may be understood of the "new heaven"—the new Jerusalem—the spiritual kingdom of our Lord which is to endure through the dispensation of the fulness of time—in which a man must be "as a little child"—for of such, (little children) is the kingdom of heaven." The term heaven is sometimes, though not often, used in this sense. See Matt. v: 12, where, from the nature of the case, I think such must be the meaning of the word. That the word heaven is thus used in the prophecies of Christ's reign, and in the book of Revelation, will not be disputed by any one. Whether it is so used in our text, or not, is left for others to judge. But certainly the spiritual kingdom of Jesus is a heaven upon earth—and in it, "these little ones" are best calculated always to enjoy its peace and joy—since, except a man "becomes as a little child he can in no wise," even enter into it.

These hints are necessarily brief and crude; for as I said before, my own mind is not fully settled in regard to the passage; nor would I feel justified in writing the above, were it not accompanied with this declaration, and under the hope that some one more learned, able and having more leisure, will further examine the passage, and make known the results of his examination.

RETRIBUTION.

"They that take the sword shall perish with the sword," was the language of our Saviour to one of his rash followers. In many instances has history proven the truth of this prediction; the spirit of which was first uttered by the Deity, in his declaration—not command, as too many understand it—to Noah, that "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." He who "knew what was in man," uttered the prediction on sure grounds. Strife begets strife—hatred engenders hatred—malicious injury brings forth retaliation, and the violent man does not live out half his days. Two instances on record—yea, three—are particularly in point. Haman erected a gallows of unusual height, to be the destruction of another—and was hanged on it himself. Lord Morton, of Scotland, invented an instrument of punishment, called "the Maiden of Morton," whose embraces were death—even the loss of its victim's head—and was the first man executed on it. The inventor of the terrible guillotine in France was more fortunate.—He lived to see his ingenuity flood "La belle France" with the blood of the fairest, greatest, best and noblest of her children, before the current of his own veins were added to the clotted ocean of human gore that flowed from its operations. But his life did fall a sacrifice to the instrument himself had invented. These coincidences all relate to instruments of capital punishment. Hundreds might be added where those who "dugged a pit for others" were the first to fall into it.—Such are the successes—such the defeats of destructiveness and constructiveness combined and perverted! How much better to devise means to save life, rather than to destroy! When will the world learn that "the very worst use you can put a man to, is to hang him"?

SUNDAY SCHOOL HYMN BOOK.

We have just received from Br. Price a copy of the new "Sunday School Hymn Book, designed for Universalist Sunday Schools throughout the United States." It is a neat little affair, handsomely got up, and filled with some special good poetry, much of it original.—Among the names of the contributors, we find that of the compiler, (Br. C. F. Le Fevre,) J. G. Adams, D. J. Mandell, L. C. Browne, H. Bacon, H. Ballou, and C. Woodhouse, all Universalist preachers, who have invoked the spirit of Christian poesy. There are numerous gems from the pens of sisters—Mesdames Z. Porter, C. M. Sawyer, and S. A. Downer. This much we learn by looking over the table of contents—for I have not found time to read the whole work, but have merely dipped into it here and there for samples, to judge the remainder by them.

There are so few Sunday schools in our denomination, (many of our brethren deeming it useless if not improper to send their children to school on Sunday, when they have been at their books during the whole week, and others not attaching sufficient importance to Sunday school instruction to induce them to get up Sunday schools,) that Br. Price can not expect many sales and great profits from this source alone. But may we not hope that our friends will purchase copies to present to their good little boys and girls, and encourage them to sing them in their little social circles? By so doing, young eyes will be made to sparkle with pleasure and gratitude—young voices will be attuned in praises to their Creator, and cultivated to take their portion in the services of the public sanctuary, and a worthy publisher be rewarded for his zeal and industry. So mote it be.

THE SOUTHERN EVANGELIST.

Alas—alas for "poor human nature"! A circular or extra of the above paper, signed by Br. L. F. W. Andrews, is before me, addressed to the subscribers to the late Southern Pioneer, (now transferred to the Union) in which the Union and its proprietor and editors are again accused of being abolitionists, and the subscribers to it are earnestly and passionately urged to abandon it, and take the Evangelist in its stead!

Every reader of the Union must know that it is not an abolitionist paper—that it has contained nothing on that subject. But I am most mortified at the—what shall I call it? dishonorable attempt to scare, drive and wheedle its subscribers, fairly and honorably obtained, into taking another paper in its stead. I could not have believed Br. Andrews guilty of such conduct either to make a few dollars for himself, or to injure one whom he deems his enemy! Nor is Br. Andrews alone—Br. Fisk—who always has professed so much romance, honor, high-minded disregard of dollars and cents—he, too, is calling on the subscribers to the Pioneer to take his paper instead of the Union, promising them that they shall be supplied on cheap terms by ☐ Zelotes Fuller of Philadelphia!! Surely, if our brethren at the South are the noble, high-minded, honorable men fame reports them, Brs. Andrews and Fisk will shrink back in dismay at the honest indignation of every subscriber to the Pioneer whom they have thus insulted with their degrading proposals—and the Union, instead of being meanly deserted, on an unjust charge, will be benefited by those efforts to injure it. I do pray these brethren may see their error and atone for it; for of all despicable things, tampering with a brother publisher's patrons is one of the worst because the littlest.

A. B. G.

P. S. Since the above was written and put in type, we have received a circular by Rev. L. S. Everett, in refutation of and reply to the extra above noticed. It deals in hard words in describing the conduct of Smith, McCune, Andrews, and Fisk, and particularly Dr. Andrews, and ably vindicates the Union and its conductors from the charges of the extra. As Br. Everett is not pecuniarily interested in the Union, and writes in behalf of others as a disinterested person, I hope his circular will induce the subscribers to the late Southern Pioneer to pause ere they follow the advice of the extra, lest they do double injustice to themselves and Br. Price, and compromise their own characters. As to what is here said, I believe it due from us as conductors of a Universalist paper to the denomination, to show that one paper, at least, is opposed to such measures to put down one publisher and benefit another—and to vindicate the character of the Universalist denomination from the stain such proceedings are calculated to attach to us. I do it with regret and sorrow that a cause exists to call for my notice of the extra; and with pity for the author, aiders and abettors of the extra. A. B. G.

EDUCATION CONVENTION.

Our readers have already been notified that a State Convention of teachers and the friends of Education will be held in this city on the 11th of May next, beginning at 9, A. M. The following named persons have been selected by the Committee of Arrangements to lecture before the Convention.

Introductory address, by Professor Potter, of Union College.

On qualifications and responsibilities of teachers, by the writer.

On Vocal music as a branch of Common School Education, by A. C. Carter, of Albany.

On Elocution, as a branch of general education, by Professor S. N. Sweet.

On the appropriate branches of Common School Education, and the order in which they should be studied, by J. W. Belkley, of Troy.

On the history of improvements in Common School books, by D. J. M. Howard, of Adams, Jefferson county.

On the present laws relating to Schools, especially Common Schools, with suggestions for legislative improvement, by Hon. Jabez D. Hammond, of Cherry Valley.

On the best plan for constructing and furnishing School rooms, and organizing Lyceums, by C. A. Anthony, of Troy.

A meeting was also held in this city on Saturday evening last, of the Teachers and friends of Education in the city, at which the Mayor presided, and arrangements were made preparatory to the Convention. It is believed and certainly hoped that the Convention will be well attended and productive of good results. A. B. G.

A SPIRITED AGENT.

Br. John E. Dalton, of Martinsville, Ohio, says that when he first came to that neighborhood, about five years ago, there was not a subscriber to a Universalist paper within several miles. Now "there are several subscribers to each of the six different kinds of Universalist papers" taken at that office, which by the way is not situated in a Universalist community. "Still wishing to see more reading on the subject, and believing that a few more subscribers might be obtained, I have undertaken to procure them." After stating several reasons why he preferred the Magazine and Advocate, one of which is because the discussion between Mr. Campbell and Br. Skinner was to be published in it, he says—"the result is, I now send you fifteen dollars, and the names of ten subscribers, to whom you will please forward the paper from the commencement of the present volume."

This money is advanced by Br. Dalton, who waits its payment at the subscribers' convenience within the year. He is well worthy the extra copy he asks for gratuitous circulation among those who can not subscribe, and the other papers sent him per his request. A. B. G.

AN ACTIVE LABORER.

A letter from Br. O. Wilcox, of Fowler, St. Lawrence county, dated March 30th, says—"I arrived home yesterday, from the last tour on my circuit. For the last five months I have travelled constantly, and preached from twenty to twenty-two times a month, so that you will understand I have not been entirely idle, although you have not heard from me. I heard Br. T. B. Robbins preach his first sermon, on the fourth Sunday in February last, with credit to himself, and the approbation of a respectable audience." A. B. G.

APOLOGY.—The illness of several hands connected with the office, by influenza or something like it, caused some delay in mailing the last and preceding papers. The cause known, our subscribers will, we think, forgive the delay. A. B. G.

BACK NUMBERS.

Agents and others will please bear in mind, that in all cases we send back numbers to new subscribers, unless otherwise ordered. This rule will be acted on until half the volume is issued—after which time, no back numbers will be forwarded to new subscribers, unless especially ordered.

We must have some general rule to go by in this matter, and from past experience we find the above to be the best, the most satisfactory in general, that we can adopt. G. and H.

FIRST OF MAY.—This day, the moving day of this region, will commence a change of residence for many of our subscribers. Let distant patrons inform us by means of the post-masters, or in some other way to save us postage. Our city subscribers will send the name of their new residences to the office, or inform the carrier of any changes or mistakes. A. B. G.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The Summer Term of the Clinton Liberal Institute (both departments) will commence on Wednesday, 24th May next.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the first Sunday in May by Br. ROUSEVILLE at Middlefield Centre—Br. M. B. SMITH at Truxton, and in Tully in the evening—Br. BULLARD at Fly creek, and in Hartwick village in the evening—Br. O. ROBERTS in Lakeville—Br. GUILD at Hobart at 11 A. M.—Br. DINSMORE in Onondaga—Br. BRITTON in Depauville at 10 A. M., near J. Barney's at 2 P. M., and in Clayton in the evening.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in May by Br. W. MARTIN in East Martinsburg—Br. GUILD in Harpersfield at 11 A. M.—Br. DINSMORE in Elbridge—Br. BRITTON in Carthage at 10 A. M., at Great Bend at 3 P. M., and at Lockport in the evening—Br. J. FRENCH in Burrville, and at Champion at 5 P. M.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in May by Br. E. E. GUILD at East Davenport at 11 A. M., and at Davenport Centre at 3 P. M.—Br. BRITTON at Depauville at 10 A. M., at Stone Mills at 3 P. M.

Br. S. R. SMITH (by the arrangement of Br. G. W. Montgomery,) will preach in Geneva on the second Sunday (14th), and at Scipio on the third Sunday (21st), in May next.

As Agent for the Liberal Institute, he will also give the friends of that institution in Cayuga and Onondaga counties, an opportunity of contributing to its funds, during his visit in that section.

Agents and subscribers to the Institute, are requested to forward their collections and subscriptions, as soon as practicable, to the Treasurer, Joseph Stebbins, Esq., Clinton, Oneida county, N. Y.

Br. BRITTON will preach on May 8th, at Lime—9th, Pleasant Valley—10th, Fox creek—11th, Peninsular Point, at such times as the friends in these places may appoint.

The Pennsylvania State Convention of Universalists meets in Reading, Pa., on the second Wednesday and Thursday in May—10th and 11th. The Council will be organized on Tuesday evening 9th.

The Union Association of Pennsylvania meets in Marietta, Pa., on the third Wednesday and Thursday in May—Council to be organized on Tuesday evening previous.

The N. Y. Convention of Universalists meets in Albany on the last Wednesday and following Thursday in May—May 31st and June 1st. List of Delegates in our next—also a list of notices for the Associations.

UNIVERSALISM IN SICKNESS AND DEATH.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

O tell me not, conceited man,
That grace impartial never can
The dying one sustain;—
O tell me not, that faith so rare
Will sink the mind in dark despair,
When death assumes his reign.

For I have stood beside the bed,
Where hope of wealth and life had fled,
And death's cold hand was near;
Then I have heard the low, faint voice,
In broken accents say, "rejoice,
My Father's name revere."

And when the tyrant seized his prey,
I heard the gasping mortal say,
"Thy will, my God, be done;"
And when life's latest moment came,
Faith, hope and joy were still the same,
With lustre bright they shone.

Then tell me not, ye over wise,
Who God's impartial grace despise,
That ought our faith can shake;
For persecution's flames may rise,
And superstition's dupes despise,
But truth we'll ne'er forsake.

Though sickness, pain and deep distress,
May round us spread, and on us press,
And haggard death draw near;
We'll bear the grief, support the load,
And praise the universal God,
Nor death, nor danger fear.

MALACHI III. 3.

"And he shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and he shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness."

The following story (I know not on what authority) is abroad in the religious world;—Some ladies in Dublin, who met together from time to time, at each other's houses, to read the Scriptures, and to make them the subject of profitable conversation; when they came to the third chapter of the prophecy of Malachi had some discussion over the second and third verses, respecting the method of purifying the precious metals. As none of the company knew anything about the process, one undertook to inquire of a silversmith, with whom she was acquainted, how it was effected, and particularly, what was the business of the refiner himself, during that operation. Without explaining her motive, she accordingly went to her friend, and asked him how the silver was cleared from any dross with which it might have been mixed. He promptly explained to her the manner of doing this, "But," said the inquirer, "do you sit, Sir, at the work?" "Oh, yes," he replied: "for I must keep my eyes steadily fixed on the furnace, since if the silver remain too long under the intense heat, it is sure to be damaged." She at once saw the beauty and propriety of the image employed, "He shall sit as a refiner of silver;" and the moral of the illustration was equally obvious. As the lady was returning with the information to her expecting companions, the silversmith called her back, and said he had forgotten to mention one thing of importance, which was, that he only knew the exact instant when the purifying process was complete, by then seeing his own countenance in it. Again the spiritual meaning shone forth through the beautiful veil of the letter, When God sees his own image in his people, the work of sanctification is complete. It may be added, that the metal continues in a state of agitation till all the impurities are thrown off, and then it becomes quite still; a circumstance which heightens the exquisite analogy in this cause; for O how,

"Sweet to be passive in his hand;
And know no will but his."

HORNE, THE BIBLICAL CRITIC.—I dined with Rev. T. HARTWELL HORNE—a name well known throughout the theological world. This extraordinary man was a book-seller's clerk, at a small salary. He distinguished himself by his industry, won the notice of a reverend Bishop, and was employed to make some indexes to a large work, which were done so well, that he was handsomely paid, and went to Cambridge and completed his education with the fruits of his labors. His celebrated "Introduction to the study of the Scriptures," in four large volumes, was the work of twenty years, and was all done in the night, after the business of the day was over. It is acknowledged to be the most accurate, comprehensive, and valuable work of the kind in the language.

Fifteen thousand copies have been sold in England and as many more in the United States, and yet the three first editions scarcely cleared expenses; the third produced him about one hundred and fifty pounds for the labor of twenty years! Mr. Horne is now engaged at the British Museum in preparing a catalogue of that immense collection. He is a living monument of industry and perseverance. He is rather small in stature, remarkably neat in his personal appearance, and quite active and robust, though now somewhat advanced, and gray-headed. His manner is free, cordial and business-like. The moment he speaks, you are at once relieved of all embarrassment, and feel that you are talking to a friend—a plain, kind-hearted, unassuming friend. His wife and daughter are just like him. They spoke of the many Americans who had called on them—Bishops Chase, M'livane, Hobart, Dr. Wheaton, E. D. Griffin, Dr. Jarvis, and Rev. Mr. Potter, formerly of Boston.—In fact they knew more about some of the States than I did. Mrs. Horne said she could always detect an American by the word possible and possibily. They (the English) say instead, perhaps, or indeed. I was pleased to find many American books in the library, and seated myself there with Mr. H. after dinner, while he wrote his sermon for the same afternoon. He completed it in about an hour, besides talking to me the while; and a good little sermon it was too, for I went with them to hear it. The parsonage-pew is close to the desk. The clerk drawled out the service in a most monotonous and pompous tone, which was really ludicrous. There was also a curate to read prayers, besides Mr. H. It seems that in England each church must have a rector, curate, and clerk. Mr. Horne's manner in the pulpit is meek, persuasive, and engaging. He uses the best words, and no more than are necessary. Yet he would never be called a great preacher. His talents are more useful than showy. Knickerbocker.

ANCIENT BELLES.—In 1607, one Wilkinson published a sermon on Proverbs xxxi: 41—"She is like a merchant's ship, she bringeth her food from afar." It contains the following passage: But of all qualities, a woman must not have one quality of a ship, and that is, too much rigging. Oh, what a wonder it is to see a ship under sail, with her tackling and her masts, and her tops and top-gallants, with her upper decks and her lower decks, and so bedecked with streamers, flags and ensignes, and I know not what; yea, but a world of wonders it is to see a woman created in God's image, so miscreated oft times, and deformed with her French, her Spanish, and her foolish fashions, that he that made her when he looks upon her shall hardly know her, with her plumes, her fannies, and a silken vizard, with a ruffe like a saile, yea, a ruffe like a rainbow, with a feather in her cap, like a flag in her top, to tell which way the winde will blowe.

ECONOMY.—"My dear, you use too much butter on your bread," said a lady who had been married late in life, to her husband—"they will not make butter for less than twenty-five cents a pound now a days." "I do not know what they make it for," answered he, "but I buy it to eat."

GOOD REPLY.—"There goes a turn coat," cried a politician one day last week from inside a store to a farmer who was passing at the time on a loaded wagon. "What would you have?" replied the farmer; "would you have a man wear his coat the wrong side out all day, because he happened to put it on so in the morning?"

DEATHS.

In Hartwick, Otsego county, very suddenly, STURKLEY ELLSWORTH, Esq., aged 67 years.

Few men have lived more respected or died more lamented than Br. Ellsworth. He enjoyed in an eminent degree the confidence of all who knew him, which has been evinced on several occasions, by placing him, in the most important posts of honor and trust. He has held a seat in both branches of our State Legislature, with credit to himself and profit to his constituents. About twenty years since he embraced the faith of unlimited salvation, which, up to the time of his death, was his stay and support. Funeral Sermon by the writer.

Within a few months, sister Ellsworth has been called to part with a daughter, a daughter-in-law, and now her husband. Verily, sister thou art afflicted—God grant you all that spirit of resignation which is inspired by a knowledge of his paternal character, and a happy issue out of all thy afflictions!

The following just tribute of respect to Mrs. Chase (the daughter referred to,) is copied from the "Milwaukie Advertiser." Mrs. C. was a Universalist in deed and in truth.

In this town, on the 5th inst, Mrs. JULIA ANN, wife of Dr. E. Chase, of Milwaukie. In the death of this woman the needy have lost a friend, society an ornament, and a husband an amiable and affectionate companion. She, with her husband, was among the first emigrants to Milwaukie. Enjoying but a few days since, health and prosperity, she saw happy prospects brightening around her; "but in the midst of life she was in death." O. WHISTON.

In Conesus, March 20th, ALFRED BUMP, (son of Daniel and Lorana Bump,) aged 9 years and 19 days. The funeral services were attended in the Methodist meeting-house by a large number of relatives and friends. Sermon by Br. O. Roberts.

In Avon, April 5th, HARRIET ELIZA WHITNEY infant, daughter of Remington H. and Rhoda C. Whitney, aged about ten weeks.

At Summer Hill, April 1st, of consumption, WILLIAM INGERHAM, Jr., aged 33 years. The deceased was much respected by all who knew him, and although he made no particular profession of religion, he met death with great composure and resignation, having no fears concerning the future, but believing that the same wise and benevolent Being who sustained him in mercy here would not leave him to suffer hereafter. His funeral was attended by the writer, (at the same place where our lamented Br. Freeman preached his last discourse, the funeral sermon of Mrs. Ingerham, the young man's mother, two years since.) W. BULLARD.

In Detroit, Mich., January 4th, Mrs. ROSANNA PITTS SHELTON, wife of John Sheldon of Rochester, Mich., aged 70 years and 24 days. Mrs. S. was attacked with palsy in 1830, and for the last three years has been almost helpless. Twenty-one years ago she united with the Baptist church in Troy, N. Y.; and for nearly three years after she was attacked with her last illness, she was agitated with doubts and fears in regard to her future well-being. But as her suffering increased and her hold on earth was weakened, her faith grew brighter, and in the belief of a world's salvation she was enabled to cast all her cares on God, trusting in his grace alone to save and bless. Her whole life adorned her Christian profession, and her end was peace.

She died at her daughter's in Detroit, and was buried there; and the following Sunday her funeral sermon was delivered at her residence in Rochester to a large assembly of sympathising neighbors by.

THOMAS WHEELER.

* * Editors in Troy, N. Y., Providence, R. I., and in Hallowell and Augusta, Maine, will please to copy.

In Cooperstown, on the evening of the 23d inst, WILLIAM NICHOLS, Jun., son of William Nichols, Esq., aged 19 years.

In the death of the above individual, society is bereaved of one of its brightest ornaments, and of one on whose cheek the rose of health but a few days since bloomed as gaily as in any that now live to mourn his loss. In the midst of youthful hope and the fairest prospects of life, the destroyer came, and like the untimely flower that withers in a day, is numbered with the dead.

In Independence, Allegany county, on March 6th, Mrs. LUCINDA LOURY, aged 27 years. She died as she had lived, unwavering in the faith of the final holiness and happiness of all mankind.

At Manchester, April 5th, WILLIAM H. M. GROVE, aged 4 years, son of E. and L. Grove.—Com.

At Canastota, April 9th, of consumption, Mr. J. Q. POWERS, aged 26 years. Few have suffered longer under this terrible scourge of our land—and none with more firmness and composure ever waited the approach of death. He has left a wife and young child—parents, brothers, sister and other affectionate friends to mourn over his early fall. He lived and died a Universalist.—Com.

THE STRANGER.

BY MISS LOUISA M. BARKER, OF CLINTON, N. Y.

"Sunbeam of Summer, oh! what is like thee!

Hope of the wilderness, joy of the sea!

—One thing is like thee, to mortals given—

The faith, touching all things with hues of Heaven."

Mrs. HEMANS.

A mild autumnal sun was shining upon the yellow woods, the brown hill-side, and the silver lake. Not a ripple disturbed the surface of the water, and the eye went down its clear depths, and beheld an inverted world of banks and trees, and sky and clouds, as motionless as the world above it. So still—so beautiful—the solitary one who should wander there, would rejoice at the isolation which permitted an undisturbed communion with his own being; till wearied with unsatisfied thought and unuttered feeling, he would yearn again for the lighter intercourse of social life. But it should be bright, pure, and rational; just such as he might expect with the little party, whose sudden appearance added to the picture the charm of animated existence.

At the loveliest point of the landscape, a little summer temple had been built on the very margin of the lake; a pleasure-boat floated below it, and a broad green-sward path led up through the trees, to the dwelling of the owner. The party was descending this path. The composed yet bland expression of countenance, and the measured yet buoyant tread of each individual, told the influence of the season; and when the boat took them off on its waveless course, not a word disturbed that deep sense of the beautiful, which had settled down upon all their hearts.

The scene and the characters belong to the realities of the past; but affection has so often retouched the dimness of memory with the hues of imagination, that she shrinks from giving "the local habitation and the name." They were of that better part of our race who can sometimes unmoor from the fastenings of this world, and go off on the calm sea of intellectual enjoyment; and the present was "one of those rare and brilliant hours," whose holier influence makes sinless the wish, to linger forever with the beings of this strange and trying, yet dear and beautiful world.

As that silent worship of nature, in which their spirits had mingled as the boat went out from its harbor, gradually gave place to other feelings, every eye became fixed upon one, whose interesting appearance at the moment, awakened a deeper sympathy than she had ever before excited. She was leaning carelessly on the boat-side, and her fine countenance, as she looked up to the little wooded promontory they were rounding, and then down to its splendid reflection in the lake below, assumed an expression of bitterness; and had she not checked the impulse that gave a slight compression to her lips, the word "mockery" would have escaped them. Then her eye grew restless, and such a speaking sadness stole over her features, that the complaint was almost audible—"Why am I doomed to look on scenes that might lure an angel from Paradise, with a weary and a sickening heart?"

"The Stranger," as she was sometimes called, had been residing a few weeks, with a very interesting family, in the little village above the lake. The circumstances which introduced her there, are of no importance to this sketch. All her protectors knew of her, when she was received into their hospitable mansion, was, that she had been fondly reared, and well educated; and so far as the world had been informed, had lived an irreproachable life. From herself they learned nothing, except what even her continued efforts at cheerfulness could not conceal—that the gifts of nature and fortune had been insufficient to impart to her a satisfying measure of happiness. The intelligence of her conversation, and her highly cultivated manners, had won their regard; and many and sincere were the wishes, "to minister to the mind diseased" of the pensive stranger. But the task was too delicate to attempt. One gentle effort to draw from her the cause of her discontent, had been repulsed in a manner which convinced her kind friends, that the story of her sadness, whatever it was, belonged entirely to "that secret self, that hath its own life," and they forbore all attempts at consolation. They even affected not to notice the cloud that would sometimes gather on her brow. But at the moment in which we left her, her manner had been so strikingly expressive, that her own awakened consciousness first reminded them of the necessity of concealing the interest she had excited. The hasty and troubled glance which she threw around upon her companions, deepened almost into one of displeasure, when she observed that a benevolent looking man, seated opposite to her, was regarding her with a look of fixed attention. Anxious to relieve her, he turned to the youngest of the party, a fair girl who was twining some flowers she had gathered upon the hill. "Sing us a song, Mary," said he; and she sang without farther bidding.

'Twere tempting fancy, to forsake

The fancies' fabled land;

To look from off this sunny lake,

And yonder sylvan strand.

And see, how bright beneath the deep,

In mirrored light, are given,

The pencilled rock, the wooded steep,

The far clear arch of Heaven.

'Tis so like life, when life is free

From passion's roughening blast;

And o'er its deep tranquillity,

The light of Heaven is cast,

Reflecting there, a world of bliss,

A realm of earth and sky;

Blending with brightest things of this,

The brighter world on high.

"It is not always so with your life;" said a pleasant voice at her side.

"I was thinking the same;" added the former speaker; "I remember, Mary, that, on the day you took us over the lake to your pleasant home, you came to my house all smiles and gladness, and returned as discontented and impatient as possible, though all around you were as cheerful, the sunshine as bright, the lake as quiet, and the woods as beautiful as they are now."

There was consciousness in the drooping lids of the beautiful girl; and she murmured something about a disappointment. But her eye rested upon her flowers, and the mood passed off. "I have learned a lesson to-day," said she. "I determined, in order to save myself from being disappointed, that I would indulge in no anticipations, and form no plans. I would not even think what I should carry to Julia. But," she continued with increased animation, and lifting up a face, "by a glad heart made radiant," "as I came down the hill, I discovered these flowers. They grew on a plant which I set last year, in a sheltered place, because I was told it would blossom late in Autumn. When Julia was here last, she told me it grew wild on her native hills, and begged that I would send her some of the flowers. I could not have asked for her a gift more acceptable, and it makes me happy to think, that when I had not even asked for it, there it was before me."

"You speak philosophy, my sweet friend," said the Stranger, "and I am inclined to think, that the flowers which grow on our paths, would always afford us more pleasure, if we were not so anxious to find them there."

"The word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth," exclaimed a deeper voice; and displeasure again shaded the brow of the lady.

"I might have known, Rev. Sir," said she, "that I was subjecting myself to a remark from you." Then, ashamed of her rudeness, she added half gaily, half ironically—"That must be a pleasant belief, that can so readily appropriate to itself, every sentiment that is uttered."

"It is so," said the minister, "and you gave us evidence in your previous remark."

"I spoke," said she, "of earthly enjoyments, only—of the few fugacious pleasures which are permitted us in this world."

"Lady," he replied, and with an earnestness he had never before employed in addressing her; "I know that I am speaking to one, who, though falsely educated, is more than sufficiently enlightened to reject the antiquated error, that this world was designed as a place of suffering, for those to whom the wrath of God denied a happier residence; that its very delights were intended as lures to transgression; and that those, only, who should make life one perpetual warfare against all temptations to enjoyment, and lie down at last on the bed of death the most weary of existence, could hope to win a crown in heaven. Nor can skepticism have bewildered within its mazes, a mind as discriminating as yours. You 'see a God employed' in the benevolent designs whose results are every where around you, and which you feel, in the capacities of your own moral and mental being. Pardon me, then, if I think you speak at random, when you talk of the few, fugacious pleasures of this world."

"Perhaps," said she, with affected indifference, "the remark might have been more the language of sensibility, than of reflection. Yet, if I have erred in estimating the sum of human happiness too low, is it not possible that others may go to the opposite extreme? I would not contend that life is all gloom, neither can I allow it to be all sunshine. The lake, beneath whose bosom the halcyon is sleeping to-day, may be roughened by the tempest to-morrow."

"If you mean, that there are in the moral, as in the natural world, certain elements which must, at times, work themselves into strife; you should remember, that the voice, which, far more powerful than the fabled halcyon, could hush at once the tempestuous waves of Gallilee, can also still the turbulence of human passion."

An ingenuous pleasure brightened the face of the Stranger, for she loved a well turned remark; and willing to continue a conversation which had become pleasant to her, she replied, "I was thinking of the passiveness with which we yield to external influence. Are not our spirits invariably affected, by the calms and storms of nature?"

"I do not deny, that we are powerfully affected by outward circumstances. It is wise and lovely that we should be. But the mind must be capable of asserting its supremacy over mere matter, or it ceases to be mind. It must be, and it is able to support a particular mood, independent of external influence. Tell me, then, my fair friend, is it not as possible to possess that spirit, which enables us to smile amid the tempest, as one which would prompt us to look around on a scene like this, with a clouded brow, and a repining heart!"

A slight blush spread over the face of the lady, but the reproof was too gentle, it produced a feeling too like conviction, to excite displeasure; so the color faded from her cheek, and the arrested glance of offended pride, passed into an expression of hopeless sorrow, as she replied, in a low and touching voice, "That spirit; I have sought for it in vain!"

"And where have you sought?" was asked in a tone too kind, to be denied an answer.

"I was taught that it came only by powerful efforts, but once obtained, its influence would be eternal; and I struggled with my joyous and confiding nature, till I awoke its more passionate impulses. I frequented the most exciting scenes of public devotion, and believed the enthusiasm thus inspired, the 'joy unspeakable,' of the early Christian. But it would not last. A weary dulness succeeded—the calm of exhausted nature, or perhaps the torpor of alienated affections. Then, I sought in seclusion 'the peace which passeth all understanding,' but I only learned to endure the solitude I did not love, and went again into the world,

'To make idols, and to find them clay;
And to bewail that worship!'

"And did you," asked the minister, "follow the injunction of the gifted one you have quoted? Did you—therefore pray?"

"I have always asked for happiness. I mean, what you call the spirit which enables us to smile amid the tempest; with the addition that its influence should be perpetual—the blessing alike, of the sunny, and the darkened hour; for I have always thought such a spirit, the best evidence of faith."

"Of the true faith. You remember the inquiry of our Lord, 'Do men gather grapes of thorns?' There are thousands among the enlightened of our fellow-beings, with the highest capabilities for the highest enjoyments, whose pleasures resemble a tune that wants its governing note; the key that would blend its cords in harmony, and impart an enduring power to its numbers.—But, have you never," he inquired after a pause, "experienced the frame of mind you have described?"

"It was all illusion. The excitement of a particular period, passed off with the occasion which produced it. The reward of a well-spent day was lost on the morrow, by yielding to some stronger temptation. The happiness excited by some propitious event, was sunk in the next chilling disappointment. The passive obedience of a hope-wearied heart, was mistaken for soul-felt resignation. But most of all have I been deceived by the influence of nature. Many a time have 'rural sights and rural sounds' soothed me into a peace which I believed could triumph over care. Alas! the Heathen priestess in some consecrated grove of Arcadia, would have felt as much. It was only the homage of the senses, at the shrine of beauty and harmony!"

In the silence which succeeded, the lady perceived the deep attention that she had imposed upon her listeners, and began to feel that she had been led on by the impulse of feeling. She had not only spoken less reservedly than usual, but had made her communications in a more melancholy voice, than she had ever before allowed herself. Anxious to counteract its effect, she passed into the opposite extreme, and added, laughingly, "I am now doing as Mary has done this afternoon; I am walking carelessly on, without a wish for the future."

"Perhaps," said the clergyman, in a voice slightly tremulous, "you too may find the flower you most want, on your path."

Struck by his manner, she turned upon him an inquiring look; but the glance she met made no explanations, and with no motive, but to relieve the embarrassment of the moment, she asked him if he judged so, because she was indifferent.

"Your indifference," said he, "is neither despair nor obstinacy. It might be called the presentiment of that childish expectancy of spirit, which our great Teacher has told us, is the only fitting mood in which to receive those influences which correct the heart."

"I suppose, then, that finding me in a proper spirit, you are ready to instruct me in the particular doctrines of your sect; imagining that my acknowledgment of their truth, will be to me, 'the consummation so devoutly wished.' But—you will pardon me, Sir, if I say that I do not wish to talk with you. You call up in my feelings a mingled something, which I can not analyze. It is more like an unpleasant recollection, than anything to which I can compare it; yet wherefore it is so, I can not tell." And she turned away, and looked over the lake, as an intimation of her wish to have the conversation discontinued.

The circumstance afforded the clergyman an opportunity to subdue the emotion that was visible in his countenance, and in a moment, he addressed her in his usual calm voice and manner. "I do not ask you to talk with me," said he, "but I know some passages in the life of a certain individual, which will illustrate our subject. Will you listen, lady?"

She replied to him by a gratified look; for though it had become painful to her to support her share in the conversation, she was interested in it, and she leaned back in her seat in an attitude of attention. Her example was followed by the rest of the party. Mary laid her flowers carefully aside, and the oars dipped more lightly in the placid lake, as he commenced his story.

The Clergyman's Narrative.

A hundred miles from this beautiful lake, the traveller sees, as he looks off from the high road, an old-fashioned, but finely proportioned dwelling. There is an air of romance about the old edifice, which detains the eye, at first caught by its elevated situation; and well would the recital of many a scene, that has been acted within its halls, repay that momentary interest. Unlike most of the estates of our ever-changing population, it has remained for many years, a hereditary possession. Anecdotes of virtuous predecessors, and scenes of long ago, have been handed down, from parent to child, until the hearth, and the altar, are guarded by imaginings as beautiful as the Lares of the ancients. How brightly, in such a soil, and with such an atmosphere, spring up the blossoms of existence, linking the sacred past with the smiling future!

Fifteen years since, the inmates of that mansion were lavishing all that is tender in affection, upon a lovely girl, the youngest of the last family that had been reared within its walls. She was a being of the rainbow and the dew-drop, of the sunbeam and the opening flower; earth has not, among its loveliest things, aught more lovely than she, with her bright eye, her light step, and her glad laugh. What could there be in life, to depress a spirit as buoyant, or cloud a mind as promising as hers? There was wealth in her father's mansion; but it was not wasted in encouraging vain desires, and unnecessary appetites. It was expended in the charities of life; it filled the library, it expanded the mind, and if it augmented luxuries, they were those of taste and refinement. Nor did there want those trying scenes, which chasten the heart and correct the confidence of uninterrupted enjoyment. The young Amelia had witnessed the farewell of those who left the parental board, to preside at the table of another. And she had seen far sadder departures. One, and another, of the dear ones whose childish love had blessed her early life, had been borne in their last earthly habiliments, down the rose-bordered pathway to the bed of their last repose; and bitterly did our little heroine weep at these mournful bereavements. The great minstrel, in comparing the tear of childhood to the dew-drop on the rose, has sung,

"When next the Summer breeze comes by
And waves the bush, the rose is dry!"

And though it is, a brighter and a fresher hue has been imparted to the flower.

But we must leave the season of sunshine and showers, to watch the effect of the first blight that fell upon her spirit. She was made to believe, that God had condemned the whole race of human beings to an eternity of suffering, horrible in its nature, and unlimited in duration. But, that the Saviour, with an act of more than Godlike benevolence, and with infinite suffering, had obtained such a mitigation of the sentence, as would enable a part, with the blessing of Heaven upon their unceasing exertions, to escape the common doom.

The story has been often told, and as variously as often. It has been preached, and urged, and remarked upon, by all characters, and in a manner peculiar to each. It has been listened to in all circumstances, by all ages, and by every capacity of the human mind. But perhaps it has never a more striking or more fatal influence, than when it is first sounded in the unpractised ear of childhood. Take one, who, like Amelia, has no presentiment of such a creed; at that early period when earth is all beauty, and life one uninterrupted pleasure; when the mind is free in its inquiries, and the heart pure in its affections; when evidences of a divine Existence, who is worthy of all adoration, speak to the young spirit in its mysterious yearnings after the high and incomprehensible in knowledge, and in the flowing out of that love, which remains unexhausted by all its objects: come to it then with the story of a wrathful Divinity, and an eternity of sin and suffering; let its first ideas of apprehension, and doubt, and terror, and iniquity, and anguish, and despair, be blended with the religion which is to guide the onward steps of life, and cheer the passage to another, and you can make that spirit anything but a happy one.

A fragment of a letter was once shown to me, written by Amelia to one of her young friends, in the time of a religious excitement, which happened during the period of her early girlhood. It was traced at one reading, so ineffaceably upon my memory, that I can still repeat it.

"I have promised that I will try to get a new heart, but I know not how to begin, for I am told I must first feel that the one I have, is entirely sinful. Then they say I must hate this world and love God. When I told M—— I had always loved God, she said it was impossible.—What then could it have been that I felt? I knew that He made the sunshine and the flowers, the stars and the clear streams. I knew He made the birds, which sing so sweetly in the tops of the tall elms that grow in the door-yard; and a great many times when I have been running down the walk, I have stopped still, when I heard their song, and my heart would be so full—I know not what it could be, if it was not loving God; for I always felt happy to think I should grow older, and know how to praise him better.

"Do you remember, dear L., the last time we were reading together, I stopped you at a certain place to say, that I did not think we ought to fear the trials of life; for I had often been told, that we should always be happy if we were good; and I thought we had nothing to do in this world but to be good. I feel very differently now; for if what they tell me is true, it is not enough to be good, but we must do what appears to me to be very difficult, if not impossible."

Poor Amelia! a withering hand was laid, at the same time, upon her health and her happiness, but her physical constitution, and her heart, were alike too elastic to droop at once, beneath the blighting influence. But hers was not the mind that could lightly shake off an impression; and for a long year her life was almost one unceasing conflict. The only relaxation she enjoyed, was in her love of study. There were intervals, when her mind would disengage itself from things which she sought in vain to understand, and grow strong in appropriating to itself, those bright lessons of philosophy which ask attention, only, to secure belief.

Her parents, who had joined in the excitement, spared no pains to carry on the work which had been begun in their daughter. Her declining health, at length admonished them to desist. But neither a cessation from importunity, nor the tenderest care, could drive away the lassitude which weighed so heavily upon her spirits.

A journey was finally proposed, and it was soon settled that she should spend a few months with a relative, in a distant town. On the morning of her departure, her mother ventured to touch upon the forbidden topic. "You know," said she, "that in my care for your health, I have prohibited myself from speaking on the subject which has been so peculiarly afflicting to you. But as we are now about to part, and for so long a time, you will not think it unkind if I express a wish, that this subject should receive the attention it deserves. But do not allow it to affect you so, now. I would not have you think of it, until you are happier."

"When I am happier," said the weeping girl, "I shall be all that you would have me. Long ago, I determined never more to indulge in that light-hearted and joyous disposition, which I once thought happiness, but to place all my hopes upon the attainment of one great object. That object is, the salvation of my soul. You need not fear that a change of scene will divert me from my purpose, for if there be mercy in Heaven, you shall hear that your child is one of the redeemed."

Month after month passed by, and the mother almost despaired of the fulfilment of her hopes. But it came at length. A letter was received from her, written in all the warmth of enthusiasm, and all the wildness of passion, which informed them, that she was hopefully converted. An excitement had commenced in the church which she attended—she had joined the penitents—she had won the object of her unceasing exertions—she was happy.

A few days more, and she was again in the home of her childhood, treading lightly through its loved halls, and glancing like a fairy, among the young leaves and bursting blossoms of Spring. Never had fanaticism a lovelier victim. The now uncontrolled freedom of the long suppressed ebullitions of her heart's life, of love and joy, were sanctified by the spirituality of her new existence. There was a flush on her cheek, a brilliancy in her eye, an elasticity in her step; and then her voice had such a pathos, as she sang the praises of her Redeemer, or talked of heavenly things, that the leaders of her sect might well call her the personification of that good, which they exhorted others to obtain. And those, whose deeper-laid experience led them to consider it the hallucination of a misguided mind, felt how easy it is, for the spirit of error "to transform itself into an angel of light."

I do not intend to follow my heroine through all the events of her life. It was necessary to be particular about her early conversion, but I shall now give only a slight sketch, of a few of the incidents of her after years. Pass with me, then, over a few succeeding months. It was a balmy Summer evening. The golden robe of the West was deepening into purple; and the shadowy light of departing day, was fading from the earth. The evening insect began its song, in the same grove, where, a few moments before, was heard the many-voiced sound of social pleasure. But there were, still, footsteps upon the grass—light and careless footsteps, and a moment after a low-toned and musical voice broke the silence.

"Tell me," said our heroine, twining her arm within that of her former correspondent, and leading her away into the farther recesses of the garden—"tell me why you have looked so strangely upon me since my return?"

"Alas! Amelia," said the other, "it is in vain to ask me why. We can but poorly explain to another, what we can not define to ourselves."

"And will the mood never pass away? I would give much to-night, for one of those sunny smiles which blessed our earlier friendship."

"I love you far better, than I did then," replied the other, "but a smile may not come at bidding. But," she continued, as she felt herself pressed closer by the arm of her friend, "I know that I should not refuse to explain, as far as I am able, this strange state of feeling. When your mind was first awakened to a contemplation of religious subjects, you remember that I, too, was considered a subject of the excitement. It was mostly the result of my affection for you. So much did I pity you, that I condemned a system of religion, which could change a life of such innocent happiness, into one of misery. I have since learned to condemn it rationally. Understand me," said she, feeling a slight start on the part of her friend, "I do not condemn religion. Like yourself, I respect its requirements, and love its influences; but we think very differently on its most important particulars. I have not sought to express my opinion, for I do not feel as confident as I could wish.—Your apparent happiness has bewildered me. I know that one or the other of us must be wrong. I can not believe it is I; yet, so far from wishing to convince you of your error, I almost respect the illusion which makes you happy."

The remark which rose to the lips of Amelia, was arrested by the consciousness, that some one approached them. She turned, and saw a young gentleman, the brother of her friend. "I am unwilling to intrude," said he, "but there is a lady at the house, waiting to speak with my sister."

"Adieu, then, my dear friend," said Amelia, as she took the arm of the brother, "I must home now, but we will meet again."

"Edward," said she, as they gained the walk, "your sister has told me something, of which I never dreamed before. She says that there is a great difference in our religious opinions."

"Ah," said he, "has the secret escaped her own lips? She will then no longer impose silence upon me."

"What would you do?" she inquired, stopping short. "You can make no one believe as you do."

"God forbid, that you say the truth now," he replied, and they walked on in silence, until they reached her father's gate. As he was about to close it between them, she said, with something like spiritual pride in her manner, "I am no believer in insurmountable difficulties, and, as I said to your sister, we will meet again."

Amelia was at no loss to conjecture what must be the sentiments of her friends. A determination to save them, was instantly formed, but when she referred to her own conversion, to find some means by which to effect it, she could not conceal from herself, that she had first been frightened. That would never succeed with her friends. Such minds required evidence, and what evidence could she give them? There was the mysterious change which had been wrought in her own feelings, but they knew that. She must be pardoned, if a thought of gentler influence crossed her mind. It was checked in a moment by the question—"Is, then, the eternal truth of Heaven so poor as to require such aid?" Alas for the structure which had required such time to be reared in the mind of Amelia! It had well nigh become, by a single investigation, but "the baseless fabric of a vision."

She met her friends, but they waited in vain, to see her act upon that determination to reclaim them, which had been implied in her expression—"we will meet again." Perhaps she might have been made the subject of a counter attempt, had not a very afflicting event changed the current of their thoughts. Their only surviving parent was taken suddenly ill, and was soon numbered with the departed. During the progress of the fatal disease, Amelia was almost daily with her friends. All differences were forgotten, and nothing of a religious nature was called into exercise, except the soul-mingling influence of its consolations. Amelia was frequently accompanied on her visits, by her brother who had just returned home, a graduate at a distant college, and who renewed with pleasure his acquaintance with the orphans.

But short was the term allotted to the interchange of soul. It was soon known, that the estate of the deceased was much embarrassed—that this embarrassment placed it in the power of Amelia's father to dispose of the parental property—and that he was resolved to do it. In vain did the children plead—the father was inexorable. He concealed not from them his motives. The orphans were heretics, and he felt that their society was dangerous to his children, and he justified his conduct by so many plausible arguments, that his daughter half admitted the necessity of the act. Yet bitter was the parting; and painful was it to see strangers in the abode of her heart's early loved ones. The death of her mother, which happened about this time, long engrossed her thoughts; but they at length returned to her friends, and settled into a regret that she had not attempted to save them, while she had the opportunity.

Passing over a few months of melancholy seclusion, we find her active spirit again roused. Her brother irritated by the conduct of his father, and unable, like his sister, to admit that it originated in affection for them, commenced a course of dissipation, which ended in that fatal habit, which numbers more victims than "famine, pestilence and the sword." When the appalling truth first demonstrated itself to Amelia, all the energy of a sister's love was called into action, and she solemnly resolved, to win him back to virtue, or wear out her life in the endeavor. We will pass over another period of her existence—months of pain and anxiety, pausing but a moment, to see her watching the slow recovery of her brother, from an almost fatal illness, and behold him at length, as he walked out with her, one sunny morning, "the disenthralled." Light was the heart of our heroine. "Oh! my brother," said she, "how blessed is this hour. Never have I been so happy, since the first moment in which I believed myself ransomed from endless suffering. Will you not bless, with me, the good Being who has saved us both?" She looked up, and beheld a frown on the face she loved. "Amelia—my dear sister"—and he paused a moment, ere he added,—"yes, it shall be said. Speak no more to me in this manner. I have no respect for the religion you profess. I know that my past excesses were degrading to my manhood. A native sense of dignity, and your fond care have saved me. My gratitude goes no higher. I will never forget that I owe a life of thanks to you, but talk not to me of homage to a being, of whose existence I have no proof." An hour after, Amelia was weeping bitterly in her room. "And is it thus," thought she, "that I have been rewarded? Have I watched and prayed, for long weeks, to rescue from the vortex of dissipation, an avowed infidel? What could she do? It was impossible to untwine the ties that bound her to her brother. She had so long devoted to him her whole life, that she could not live elsewhere, and she clung to him still.

Society again called him to its most exclusive circles, and he won all hearts by his superior mind and his polished manners. Every where, his sister was his companion. His life seemed a study to amuse and interest her. They visited other places, and abroad, as at home, they were the idols of society. But was Amelia happy? If she was not, her unhappiness was unexpressed; but it was apparent, that she sometimes struggled against the stream that was hurrying her along. As an evidence of this, she once formed a plan to unite her brother to a young lady, who had made herself notorious by her religious zeal. But before her plan was well matured, he had won the love, and undermined the faith, of a most lovely girl, and led her to the hymenial altar as much a skeptic as himself. It was a cruel blow to the hopes of Amelia, but she sighed in secret. Her brother was dear to her still, and lovely and gentle was the sister he had given her.

It was in the early part of a clear autumnal evening, that our heroine approached the house of her father and brother, accompanied by a female friend. A gleam of light streamed through the avenue of trees, upon the gate before them. Grasping the arm of her friend, Amelia gazed a moment at the rich glow in the parlor window, and then said in a subdued tone, "I must leave my beautiful home."

"Leave it! Why!"

"Because I am not happy here. I have never been happy," said she in a musing manner, "since I first believed myself an object of divine favor, and sometimes I even doubt"—she stopped, and leaned in silence upon the railing.

"But why leave your home? Is it not as easy to be happy here, as elsewhere?"

"No!—no! There is an influence in the love which is lavished upon me, by my brother and his beautiful bride, which I fear. Already have dark shadows crossed my mind—but it can not be," she said, looking up to the starry world above her, "there is surely a God whom we ought to know, and fear, and love.—I have not proposed to inflict upon myself, perpetual banishment. I seek a temporary relief, and perhaps, when I am far away from every exciting association, I may find that peace which is denied to me here."

Her resolution was carried into effect, notwithstanding the efforts made to detain her. By an ingenious arrangement, she deprived them of all knowledge of her retreat, and sought in another home, the happiness she could not find in her own.

"And will you not tell us what became of her?" said Mary, after a pause on the part of the clergyman.

"Is it not necessary," said he, "but if you please, I will be indulged, in my professional habit, of making a few closing remarks."

"Health is no more the natural state of the physical constitution, than happiness is of the mental. As on the one, sickness will sometimes lay its paralyzing hand, so will care and affliction often interrupt the course of the other. But if the vital principle of health remain in the system, what if the cheek sometimes lose its hue, and the eye be dimmed! the Hygean bloom will again return. So, if the torch of happiness has been lighted at the right flame, though it wane, at times, it will burn again, bright and pure as ever. Nor is happiness less essential than health to the proper conduct of life. We do not expect that the body can act much, or act effectually, when its strength has been wasted by disease, nor ought we to expect that the heart can possess active and efficient goodness, when it is either torn by anguish, irritated by discontent, or sunk in melancholy. It appears to me, that the old proverb 'To be good is to be happy,' might with much propriety be reversed.

"The remark, that a correct religious belief, is the only perfect source of human happiness, will meet with no opposition from my hearers. In the story just related, we see one, who, with all natural capabilities for happiness, was yet doomed to years of inquietude for imbibing one erroneous idea. She was taught that her eternal happiness or misery, depended upon her own exertions; and so strongly has the Deity implanted the desire of felicity in the human breast, that the poor child struggled to win, even from the great Being who ordered nature, and who regulates the countless worlds that fill immensity, the boon which, she imagined, he would have denied. The presumption of such an idea is fatal to confidence, and without confidence, how can the heart find peace? The weakness of human nature asks the protection and providence of a parent. It asks what the truth has given it; the assurance that all things are wisely and benevolently ordered—that we have only to trust the power which we can not oppose; and, as our little friend has done this afternoon, to pluck with gratitude, the flowers that grow on our paths."

The boat touched the strand, and the interest which the story had excited, gave place to newer sensations as the party stepped on the land, and ascended the hill to the pastoral abode. Mary had wreathed her flowers in the hair of the fair girl who ran to meet her—the hospitable dwelling had received them—refreshments had been partaken, and the party passing again into the bland air and mild sunlight of Autumn, were amusing themselves in viewing the horticultural and other grounds; when the minister disengaging himself from his guests, returned to the little parlor, where the stranger was sitting alone, and lost in thought. With a joyful look and manner she rose to meet him. "You have been relating," said she "the incidents of my life; but I want no explanations, for I have recognized in you, the brother of my early friend. Where is she now?"

"She is residing at —. I wrote to her a few days since, requesting an immediate visit. I believe she would not now hesitate to destroy the illusion of your early life."

"Her presence is little necessary on that account. I have not much respect for the system in which I was educated; but I have been so long accustomed to it, that I can not release myself from its influence."

"Go back, in imagination," said he, "to the home of your childhood. Fancy yourself once more beneath the tall trees which shade your paternal dwelling. Let it be at the moment, when your light foot has been arrested, and your young heart has swelled with untaught devotion. Join, now, to the Deity of your early imaginings, the conviction of the present moment, that he is a God of goodness—not that abstract and incomprehensible goodness, which you have heretofore ascribed to him, but a goodness which can be seen, and felt, and understood."

The lady leaned her cheek on her hand, and her tears fell upon the table before her. The association had touched the finer feelings of her heart, and she remained motionless under its influence. Her companion at length broke the silence, by informing her that a correspondent, who had given him intelligence, from time to time, respecting her family, had lately written him, that no change had occurred there since she left.

"I shall return immediately," said she, in a voice and manner that told the energy of her character. "I have something to do there.—Something which I feel that I can do. But your sister" said she hesitating. "Shall follow you if you wish it. 'What thou doest do quickly.'"

The party was again at the lake. The sun was sinking towards the horizon, and a gentle wind ruffled the water, and stirred the leaves. There was a gladness in nature that was irresistible, and it completed conviction in the mind of the stranger.

"You have taught me," said she, as she said her farewell "that the spirit I have so long and so vainly sought, is that just appreciation of the Divine character, which allows us to trust him, without a fear."

"And the fruit of the spirit," said the minister impressively, "is 'love, joy, and peace.'"

A GRAND-FATHER'S LETTERS TO HIS GRAND-CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

LETTER FOURTH.

MY DEAR CHILDREN—My last letter to you was occupied in detailing a few exercises and employments upon the subjects of your reading and study, by the use of which, I think you may improve your mental powers, and add to your store of well-digested knowledge. In these directions I had reference, chiefly, to your reading of the Scriptures, and biblical studies. I mean to devote this sheet to giving you a few hints as to your reading and studies, in general, such as I have found beneficial in my own experience, or such as seem plausible and are recommended by competent authorities.

I was led to continue my thoughts upon the methods of improving by reasoning and study, and to form the determination to collect for you whatever hints my memory and reading might furnish, which promise to be useful to you in your studies, by meeting with a very good piece of advice in a newspaper a day or two after my last. The advice was this:—Never write upon any subject until you have read yourself full upon it; and never read upon any subject until you have previously thought yourself hungry upon it. I thought a few such hints would be useful, and I now proceed to mention such as have occurred to me.

There is one very common error and mal-practice which I would caution you against. It consists in the covetousness of reading much—in the devouring of print—in glutonizing upon books. I am abundantly borne out in affirming that as a man may be eating all day, and for want of digestion receive no nourishment; so these endless readers may cram themselves with intellectual food, and yet derive from it no addition to their stock of useful and applicable knowledge, nor any improvement of their minds, just for the want of digesting it by reflection. Many read a great deal who seem to derive very little benefit or profit from what they do read. They, perhaps, make an injudicious choice of books; perhaps they read without method and without object; and very likely without attention and reflection. At all events, they seem to read without profit. Instead then, of being covetous of reading much, I would rather have you willing and wishful to make the effort which is requisite to reading well. One good book, read, digested, and reflected upon until its doctrines and arguments are well weighed and received for what they are worth, and their bearings, consequences, and applications considered—one good book so read, is worth a whole library read in any other way. Read, therefore, not hurriedly and voraciously, but with reflection and thoughtfulness. I have found it to be a very useful practice, in the perusal of any book, to inspect the preface or introduction, the table of contents, and general outline so as to ascertain the main object of the author. Having obtained a general view of the object of the work, I reflect and recall to memory what I know of the subject, so as to be more distinctly sensible of what I may gain by the perusal,—so as to digest what I do know, and, in the phraseology of the newspaper paragraph above quoted, thus think myself hungry upon the subject. Sometimes, also, I have sketched an outline of the method in which I should proceed to write upon the subject; and if you would do so frequently or habitually, I doubt not but the practice would greatly contribute to give you both the ability and confidence necessary for original, independent thinking, as well as to conduce to your reading the volume or the work with increased attention, interest, and profit. In the course of perusal, you will find it profitable to peruse frequently and recall the outline of what you have read, take note of what additions you have made to your stock of knowledge, and reflect upon the reasons of your assent to or dissent from the propositions of your author. It is useful also, exceedingly so, to endeavor to express the thoughts of the author in language of your own. By so doing, and afterwards comparing your exercise with the original author, you may discover that you have not completely understood or remembered the thoughts of your author; and at all events, you will acquire a facility of expressing yourselves in writing, and may learn to correct and amend many failures and imperfections in your mode of expression and composition. You will think, I presume, that reading in this way would be a slow and laborious work. True; but let not such a consideration dissuade you from the trial. Among my notes I find the following appropriate quotation, from I know not whom, now. "To read in this manner is indeed laborious; and he who pursues it will be able to read but few volumes, in comparison with him who skims over every book that is thrown in his way. But the amount of knowledge, and vigor of mind acquired in this way, are an abundant compensation for any deficiency in the number of authors read. One book read thoroughly, and with useful reflection, will do more to improve the mind, and enrich the understanding, than skimming over the surface of a whole library. Indeed the more one reads in this hasty superficial manner, the worse. It is like loading the stomach with a great quantity of food which lies there undigested. It enfeebles the intellect, and sheds darkness and confusion over all the operations of the mind." The Rev. Robert Robinson of Cambridge, England, used to say, "A little thought of your own upon any subject, is of more worth to you than all the thoughts of other men, sounding in your ears, or clattering through your lips." He said he had no doubt but the memory of any man might enable him even to repeat what might have been taught him, but after all his teaching, and his students' repetition of what he taught them, he thought they would just know about as much of the subject as a musical instrument does of the tune which is played upon it. Above all things, he urged his students to think for themselves, even if they should think ever so little. This I consider excellent advice, and fain would I have you always to remember it.

There is another mistake which is often committed by readers, which I would have you avoid. Many seem to read only for the purpose of remembering and repeating the opinions and sentiments of the author. But I would have you read, not so much for the purpose of knowing the opinions of others, as that of aiding you to determine what opinions are right and what are erroneous, and to arrive at truth upon the subject. Yield your assent only to evidence, and just ratiocination. There are too many, we fear and lament, who yield their understanding to the dictation of others, and neither think nor act for themselves. Add ye not to the number of such. For all your opinions and all your conduct, have well-considered and stable reasons, and be bold enough to maintain them. One hour spent in the thorough investigation and search after truth, will do more to give you a stock of useful and applicable knowledge, and to invigorate and improve your minds, than numberless hours employed in sailing along the current of other men's thoughts. "Call no man Master." Ye are men as well as the author.—Whatever observations occur to you while reading any work, I would have you make some note or memorandum of them. When you again peruse the work, it will be both interesting and instructive to recur to your notes or comments. You may, for example, in some way mark or remark upon a passage because it contains some information which you wish more deeply impressed upon your memory; or, because it contains erroneous or limited views of a subject, and you may be able to point yourself or a friend to some other author who takes a more correct and enlarged view; or, because you think the thought forcible, or the mode of expression superior or faulty; or, because you have attempted to put the same thoughts into more perspicuous, elegant, or suitable expressions. These and several other considerations will serve as occasions for remarks. Record all such as occur, and on a second perusal refer, also, to your remarks. This method will likewise seem laborious and fatiguingly slow. If so at first, I know it becomes less so by practice. And the satisfaction of mind arising from, this mode of exercising your powers, will be an ample compensation for all the little difficulty and unpleasantness of submitting to the labor.

I will conclude this letter by mentioning one other mode which will contribute to make your reading interesting, useful, and readily remembered, as well as more easily applied. This method consists in uniting with one or more of your companions for the purpose of reading the same books or upon the same subjects, and of interchanging your thoughts with each other respecting the authors or the subjects studied. As iron sharpeneth iron, so doth the conversation of a man his friend. Intelligent and diligent students will find such a course highly conducive to their mutual improvement. Soirees for conversation and discussion are upon the same principle, and are become amongst the literati of English and American cities, quite favorite and fashionable, as well as interesting and useful meetings. The effect of such conversations is to interest and excite attention to the subject or the author to be discussed or commented on; to impress more deeply upon the mind the instruction derived from books and conversation; to give clearness and precision to your thoughts; to improve the valuable talent of conversation, and render easy the communication of your ideas to others. Let the younger among you associate with those about the same age and who are interested in the same studies, and have your soirees as well as your elders. And would I could be present with you to animate your exertions, and be gratified with your progress!

THE ADVANTAGES OF READING THE BIBLE.

BY REV. J. BRITTON.

"Search the Scriptures." Jesus Christ.

When we consider the influence which our religious opinions have upon the happiness of our lives, the importance of frequently perusing the Bible is apparent. The Old and New Testaments, usually denominated the Holy Bible, are the source from which is derived true religious knowledge.

Many reasons may be assigned for becoming acquainted with the language of the Bible. And in the first place, those who neglect reading the Scriptures, are extremely liable to be destitute of any fixed religious principles, or to adopt erroneous and unscriptural views. Both these situations should be avoided. Ignorance, in general, and particularly on the subject of religion, is to be deplored. The ignorant, of course, can not fully appreciate the value of knowledge nor be sensible of the happiness of which they are deprived. Still the deprivation is real. The person born blind is not sensible of the pleasure he would experience in beholding the beauties of nature and art, were he capable of seeing. Knowledge improves and elevates the mind.

But the person who is comparatively ignorant of religious truth, is less to be pitied than the votary of error. I refer here to what may be termed fundamental error. It is not to be expected that any will be free from every erroneous idea.—Errors are not all equally hurtful. There are what may be called essential principles, errors in regard to these, are like poisons; fatal to the peace of those who entertain them.

Now as the Scriptures are the repository of revealed truth, a careful and frequent perusal of them is calculated in ordinary cases, to save the individual from ignorance and error in relation to the most important of all subjects. And this is done by the acquirement of truth. The mere reading of the Scriptures is of no consequence, unless we understand what we read. To do this, it is necessary to proceed as we would with other books; that is, endeavor to ascertain what was originally conveyed by the language, to those to whom it was addressed.

The Bible being an ancient book, study and research are necessary; we should compare its several parts with each other, and also avail ourselves of such aid as we can command in ascertaining the meaning of words and phrases, and in acquiring a knowledge of ancient manners and customs.

Most of the persons who read this article are probably accustomed to hear discourses on religious subjects. Without some knowledge obtained by reading the Scriptures, it is impossible for you to be much benefited in hearing. If what you hear advanced is erroneous and unscriptural, you are in danger of receiving it as truth. And if your preacher advances truth, it is also necessary that you have some previous knowledge of the subject, that you may be interested and edified by what you hear.

The Bible should be read for the knowledge it furnishes, for the excellency of its moral precepts, and for the glorious hopes of a future and immortal life which it unfolds. Then let it be read attentively—let parents gather around them their children and the members of their households, and read aloud its instructive lessons—and let children and youth acquaint themselves with the contents of its pages, and store their minds with the truth it imparts.

And may all receive with joy, the sublime doctrine of the Bible, and regulate their lives by its heavenly precepts, that the effect may be "quietness and assurance forever."

NIGHT.

BY MRS. BROUGHTON.

How beautiful is the gorgeous canopy of night! How sweet to commune with the heart, in the silence of her holy temple! The silver moon in lonely majesty, sails proudly along the seas of ether. Bright constellations of diamond stars, like glittering gems in dazzling azure set, shine sweetly on the pensive brow of night. The glory of her presence can not be expressed. The busy tones of day are hushed, but the voice of the mighty river is sounding on its ceaseless anthem; and its wild roarings, swelling clearly on the chill night-air, wake up the music of devotion in the heart which has been drowned in the hum of care.—The whispering breeze sings softly through the branches, and the sorrowing soul is soothed by its plaintive melody. Man may be an infidel in the glare and tumult of the day; but can he stand beneath the starry banner of night, and view the unnumbered spheres that roll through boundless space—and still say, "There is no self-existent Principle to rule these countless worlds, and guide them in their spacious rounds"? Can he endure the dis-empowering thought, that he is but a mere speck of matter warmed into existence by the uncertain breath of chance—the sport of changeable gales through life's ephemeral day, until this chance deity shall quench the feeble taper in oblivion's rayless night?

Cold must be the heart and cheerless the prospects of that being who looks upon death as the end of man's spiritual existence. He hears no music in the rushing breeze. The grand array of evening's golden lamps, can not awake in his heart the rich song of devotion; for his soul is shrouded in rayless, voiceless gloom.

THE MOON.

(Translated from the German of Richter.)

In the East the moon arose, and floated gracefully along in the redness of the setting sun. The children pointed her out to their father. "How beautiful and glorious she appears," said Allwin; "but she looks not always so." "She is in her adolescence," answered the father. "Every day will add to her growth, and her light will continue to increase, until she shines forth in the fulness of perfection. Clouds may, perhaps, oft-times hide her from us, and her face be obscured by their darkness. Again she will decrease and grow smaller and smaller each succeeding day, and thus become a perfect type of human existence." "Thy meaning I do not understand," said Theodore. "O yes," rejoined Allwin; "I know what thou wouldst mean to say! Man also increases and diminishes—sports for a while on this stage of being, then he disappears and is hidden in the grave!" "And the clouds which sometimes cover the moon," said the father. "I know not how to explain this." "They are the trials and misfortunes which are scattered over the pathway of man," continued the father; "no one has ever been continually blessed with cloudless skies, and untroubled tranquillity, in his earthly pilgrimage. But the clouds pass over the truly great and good man, and the quiet of his soul remains undisturbed. And, finally, when he is taken from our midst, he is not blotted from existence, but lives undying in the Paradise of God!"

A DREAM.

"No change after death." Partialism v: 4.

A few nights since, after having some conversation with a friend on the above subject, I retired. My cogitations were various. What kind of a place eternity would be, if the above doctrine was correct! What would be the difference between the worst person in heaven and the best one in hell? These are questions that required an organ of comparison, more refined than the one I possessed, to answer them correctly.

Sleep soon made a different person of me; and, ere I awoke, afforded me a view of Elysium and Tartarus on the above plan.

I dreamed that I was transported to the region which tries men's souls (patience I should have said) and was asked if I believed in "endless misery," and on my answering in the negative, I was ordered to take my station on the "left hand." I obeyed; and on arriving there, recognized many old friends. Some were preaching the immortal felicity of all mankind, as they had done while on earth! Some were offering up their gratitude for the paternal care and faithfulness which had been manifested in their behalf—some singing, "rejoice" etc. Well—well—thought I, it must be that the "left hand" is on the wrong side this time! I lifted up my eyes, (not in torment though,) and saw the "impassable gulf"—but nothing of "Abraham and Lazarus." I thought the gulf consisted of bigotry, superstition and wilful ignorance. The field beyond was of gradual ascent, which gave me an extensive prospect. Protracted meetings were in successful operation—camp meetings were very numerous—priests labored "day and night" for the conversion of sinners—some preached, saying, "repent, for the kingdom of hell is at hand"—others, saying, "behold I bring you sad tidings of great lamentation"—just as they had preached in this life! A man at my elbow said,

"See how he clears the points of faith,
With rattling and with thumping!
Now meekly calm, now wild in wrath,
He's stamping and he's jumping!
His lengthened chin, his turn'd up snout,
His eldritch squeal and gestures,
Oh, how he fires the heart devout,
Like cantharidian plasters!"

Well, quoth I "there is more truth than poetry" about that, and it's not bad poetry. I viewed the scene a short time longer—some were praying "if we had our just deserts, we should long ago have been rolling on the surges of hell's molten sea." Some were "agonizing," some telling how much the Christians had to "suffer"—and—here I awoke, well convinced there is "no change after death"—that man has a different will from God's, and will succeed in frustrating his designs—that in order for a man to believe these things, he must first become fully convinced of them when he is asleep, and then he must sleep all the time afterwards!

QUESTIONS.

1. Do the Scriptures teach that all "the nations, families and kindreds of the earth," shall be blessed in Christ?
2. Will the final doom of those who hear the Gospel, and are endlessly lost, be more aggravated than that of those who live and die ignorant of it?
3. In what sense are those blessed in Christ, who are finally lost?
4. Is salvation possible for all? If so,
5. Does God know all things? And if so,
6. How is it possible for those to be saved, who God knows will be lost?

Answers are respectfully solicited, by

UTICA, FRIDAY, MAY 5, 1837.

FOURTH LETTER FROM BR. SKINNER.

Richmond, Va., April 24th, 1837.

Brs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON—You see I am still in Richmond. I had designed leaving here this morning for Norfolk; but to my disappointment, I find there is no boat down the river till the day after to-morrow. A steamboat plies regularly, three times a week, each way, between this city and Norfolk. But what is somewhat singular, it lies still on Monday, (at Norfolk,) comes up to this place on Tuesday, and then down and up alternately all other days of the week including Sunday. Now our northern people would be very likely, in accomplishing six trips per week, to make them on the last six days of the week and lie still on Sunday. But the Virginians have a different taste in these things.

Since my last letter, I have made two or three short excursions into the country, one of about eight miles to the North, to the seat of a wealthy planter, another of about fifteen miles to the South, (down the river.) During the latter excursion I visited a rich planter, who owns an extensive plantation of several thousands of acres, about ten miles below this, and keeps in all nearly an hundred slaves. He accompanied me across the river into Chesterfield county, to the place and neighborhood of his nativity, where he remarked he had not been for a considerable length of time. We passed a number of plantations and the former seats of wealthy gentlemen, which are now almost entirely deserted, the buildings either burned or torn down, or rapidly going to decay from desertion and neglect; fences gone, lands lying fallow and grown over with thorns and shrubs—here and there a comparatively poor but almost solitary planter, struggling hard to keep his head above water in the midst of surrounding desolation, and strongly reminding one of Goldsmith's

"Towns unmann'd and lords without a slave."

My friend, as he passed these seats near the place of his birth, heaved many a heavy sigh, and remarked that it made him heart-sick and truly hypochondriac, to witness the sad falling off in the prosperity of the place, and the growing desolation of the country around. He, however, remarked that this particular neighborhood was doubtless the most desolate and unthriving part of the State, and that many parts of the country exhibited a comparatively prosperous condition. Indeed, his own plantation presented a great contrast to the barren and desolate condition of the neighborhood we were then in. But even that, with all the labor and culture he bestowed on it, was very far from producing what our northern farmers would consider a fair remuneration for the mere labor of cultivating, saying nothing about the cost or value of the lands.

The products of the farms hereabouts, are generally wheat, corn and oats. Their wheat seldom or never produces more than seven or eight bushels to the acre—last year the average is said to have been less than two, and that of an inferior quality. Perhaps six bushels might be considered a full average amount from year to year—corn about twenty and oats about fifteen bushels. Of course, the cultivation of these grains must be regarded as a poor and profitless business. Of cotton there is none raised here, and very little, if any now, in the State. Tobacco was formerly very extensively cultivated, and is yet in a measure though to a less extent relied on for a livelihood and for the accumulation of wealth. But that begins to fail in many places. It very much weakens and reduces the land, and requires a stronger soil and more manure for its production than can readily be obtained.

I have visited two or three fine vineyards just beyond the suburbs of the city, and find that the grape flourishes and produces abundantly, even without any manuring of the soil. I saw a great variety of species of the grape, and tasted of some excellent wine, unadulterated with alcoholic or other poisonous substances. It brings a high price in market—$3 per gallon is considered low for it. After viewing the vineyards, and seeing the growth of a few specimens of the mulberry tree, (Chinese multa caulis), which also flourishes well in this region and soil, I remarked to several of the planters with whom I have become acquainted, that I was surprised they did not go extensively into the wine and silk growing business; their climate and soil both being well adapted to it. For I had not the least doubt that thereby instead of growing poorer, or having to struggle hard to keep their estates and property from deterioration, they might be constantly and even rapidly growing rich. An additional reason, I remarked, in favor of the silk growing business, was found in the fact that now their negro children, who are not permitted to go to school, and who now spend their time either in total idleness or something worse, might better, by far, while slavery still endures, be employed in feeding silk worms, and could do a great part of that business as well as adults. "O," said the planters, "we Virginians are strongly attached to the old and long established customs of our fathers. We are not fond of change and innovation. We shall plod along in the tracks of our ancestors, till our lands will support us no longer, and then we shall be obliged to give them up for almost nothing, as worn out and useless. Then some of the sharp-sighted speculating yankees from the North, will come and buy them up for a song, and grow immensely rich by the culture of the mulberry and the vine." Ah! truly said, thought I, and such will inevitably be the case, unless you awake from your lethargy, and open your eyes to see the resources you have in your own hands. Lands are low in this region—more wishing to sell than to buy, and I am confident our northern speculators might make good investments and a profitable business in this way.

Since my last, I have observed and reflected more on the condition and advantages of the city, present and prospective, than I had before done. There is at this place, and extending for a number of miles above, a very considerable fall in the James river; and thereby an immense and inexhaustible water power is afforded. The citizens here are apparently just beginning to find out the advantages which that power is calculated to give them. A number of mechanics and manufacturers have lately come on from the North—several cotton factories have gone into operation—an extensive iron manufactory is now rapidly progressing to completion; and I should not be surprised if the whole bank of the river for six miles above this, should in a few years, be completely lined with similar establishments. To add to the advantages of this inexhaustible water power, there is now a canal constructed along the river by the falls, and is to be extended on to the West, till it reaches the mountains; thence a rail road is to cross the mountains and connect it with the great western world and the waters of the Ohio; so that merchandize and produce can be readily conveyed and exchanged between this city and the various parts of Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, etc. Thus this city, both as a manufacturing and a mercantile and commercial city, is destined, I think, to a much greater eminence than its former, and most of its present inhabitants have dreamed of.

As with the commercial and temporal condition and privileges of the place, so with the moral and religious; they have never been duly appreciated and properly improved, in both the people have been quite contented to remain stationary in the very shoes and tracks of their fathers. And I think there will be an improvement in the latter full as great, if not greater, than in the former.

I have now preached here four Sundays, to congregations constantly increasing, with the exception of yesterday, which was a very rainy day, whereby many were prevented from attending; still the congregation was very respectable. I am satisfied that with a preacher of talents, zeal and fidelity, our cause, of late so languishing here, might be revived to vigor and prosperity. May the Lord of the harvest soon send them a pastor after his own heart, to feed them with knowledge and understanding.

I am to give one lecture more, here, to-morrow evening, and the next morning start for Norfolk, where I shall probably remain till the beginning of next week, and then take a packet for New-York. I am in hopes of reaching home by the last of the week, but cannot promise it with certainty. You will not probably hear from me again (extraordinaries excepted) till I see you face to face. Till which time may peace be with you, and a kind Providence protect us all.

Yours in faithfulness.

MEETING-HOUSE AT ELLICOTTVILLE.

The following extract of a letter from Br. L. Vinton will show that our brethren in Ellicottville, Cattaraugus county, are about to rebuild their burnt down meeting-house. They will need aid.

A. B. G.

"Br. GOSH—I saw a few lines in your paper respecting the loss of our house which was burnt down, in this place, last Fall. It is true that although our loss was but a small sum, yet it had to be borne by but a few individuals, whose means are but limited. But meeting with some encouragement to rebuild, and hoping to receive a little assistance from more wealthy brethren in distant societies, we have made some arrangements, and got a part of the materials together on the spot. We have also contracted for the erection of the building, which will be begun as soon as the ground is settled.—If any brethren feel in their hearts to aid us in our means, as you proposed in your paper, we will be very thankful for their assistance. We have succeeded in getting enough subscribed to pay probably enough to erect the frame, and get it enclosed, and possibly to get a part of the inside work completed. Yours with respect,
"Ellicottville, March 26, 1837. L. VINTON."

BOOKS.

Persons sending for books, are notified that we have but a few works which we can send out on commission—they will therefore please designate which works they want on purchase, and which only on commission. We will accommodate known responsible persons in this vicinity, as far as in our power, on such designation; but those works ordered on commission which we can not supply except on actual purchase, we must, in all such cases, decline sending—as by so doing we lose the season for selling them ourselves, and are liable to have them returned to us unsold, when we can no longer find a market for them here. In this case we lose considerable, without any prospect of gain over what we have by keeping them on hand for actual purchasers. We trust those reasons will be satisfactory to all concerned. We shall send no books except to persons we know to be responsible, or to cash purchasers—for the plain reason, that we can not afford any risk in our present circumstances.

A. B. G.

AGENTS, IN ADDITION TO FORMER LISTS PUBLISHED.—John Martin, Hamilton, in place of Marcus Clark, who will hereafter act as agent at Cassville, W. T.—T. L. Allen, Harmony—George Walton, Philadelphia, N. Y.—J. G. Comstock, Hollidaysburg, Pa.—E. H. Webster, Hamblinton, Pa.—F. W. Goodenow, Highland, Mich.

We, through mistake, omitted to publish the name of Br. W. Bullard, Cortland, among our list of agents, and lest others may have been left out whom we intended to publish, we will repeat, what we have before stated, that all ministering brethren in good standing are authorized to act as our agents.

Samuel G. Anable, Onondaga, is requested to act as agent.

PRIZE ESSAYS.—We beg our readers and the candidates to remain patient, and extend their indulgence to us a while longer. At this season it is difficult to procure a committee; and the gentlemen at last procured, have not yet found time to make the requisite examination and report. Very probably it will be furnished in time for our next—at furthest in two weeks—and will be immediately made known.

G. and H.

THE PRIZE TALE.—We give to-day the prize tale which obtained the premium of twenty dollars. It will well pay for the time spent in perusing and re-perusing it.

NEW-YORK CONVENTION.

It adjourned to meet on "the last Wednesday and Thursday in May"—this is always understood to mean the last Wednesday in May, and following Thursday. Example. The Central Association adjourned to meet on "the first Wednesday and Thursday in June"—it so happens that the first Thursday precedes the first Wednesday nearly a week. Of course it means not "the first Wednesday and the first Thursday," but the first Wednesday and following Thursday—and so all such notices have always been understood, with but one solitary exception, so far as my knowledge extends. The first named day is the day of meeting, the second named day is the day following that day of meeting. Hence, with due deference to Br. Price's judgment, the letter and the spirit of the minutes requires our Convention to meet on "the last Wednesday in May," (and not on the fourth Wednesday, as he supposes,) and continue in session the following Thursday. And as this is also the very letter of the Constitution as now amended, the expression "last Wednesday," in the minutes of 1836, was not "an oversight," but a purposely made declaration. Had it been known that the last Wednesday was also the last day in May, a different expression might have been given to designate the second day of the meeting. I could give other reasons, but presume the words of the Constitution will be sufficient proof.

It was the duty of the Standing Clerk (Br. D. Skinner) to give the notice. His absence must be his excuse. I acted in his stead (without authority however) in giving the brief notice last week, and the more extended one this week. Had I dreamed that Brs. Sanderson and Price would have construed the minutes as they do, I would have noticed it earlier. I regret their mistake, but hope this and their correction of it will prevent any ill consequences. The Convention meets in Albany on the last Wednesday (31st) of the present month, and will continue in session two days.

A. B. G.

GENOA NOT GENEVA.

Will our friends in the vicinity of these two places please notice the alteration from our last, in Br. S. R. Smith's appointments? In our last, his appointment for the second Sunday, was erroneously printed "Geneva" instead of "Genoa." It was marked for correction in the proof sheet, but overlooked by the journeyman whose work it was to correct it. This apology is due to all parties concerned.

CLINTON LIBERAL INSTITUTE.

The Summer Term of the Clinton Liberal Institute (both departments) will commence on Wednesday, 24th May next.

THE LADIES REPOSITORY, published by Br. Tompkins, of Boston, and edited by Br. H. Bacon, begins a new volume in June. I would like to send it some new subscribers.

A. B. G.

Br. Whitney, of this place, is about to remove with his family to Ohio City, O., to which place he wishes all papers designed for him directed after this date.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching next Sunday (first in May) by Br. BIDDLECOM in Rome—Br. Sias near Br. McWain's.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday in May by Br. W. MARTIN in East Martinsburg—Br. Guild in Harkersfield at 11 A. M.—Br. DINSMORE in Elbridge—Br. BRITTON in Carthage at 10 A. M., at Great Bend at 3 P. M., and at Lockport in the evening—Br. J. FRENCH in Burrville, and at Champion at 5 P. M.—Br. Sias at Perch river, and at Jenks' school house at 5 P. M.—Br. BIDDLECOM in Cold Brook, Russia, at 10 A. M., and in Grave's Hollow at 2 P. M.—Br. WAGGONER at Trenton Falls.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday in May by Br. E. E. GUILD at East Davenport at 11 A. M., and at Davenport Centre at 3 P. M.—Br. BRITTON at Depauville at 10 A. M., at Stone Mills at 3 P. M.—Br. Sias at the Case school house, Sandy creek, and near Br. Wright's at 5 P. M.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. BRITTON in Brownville—Br. J. FRENCH at Field Settlement, and at Talcott's schoolhouse at 5 P. M.—Br. WAGGONER at Newport, instead of Middleville.

Br. S. R. SMITH (by the arrangement of Br. G. W. Montgomery), will preach in Genoa on the second Sunday (14th), and at Scipio on the third Sunday (21st), in May next.

As Agent for the Liberal Institute, he will also give the friends of that institution in Cayuga and Onondaga counties, an opportunity of contributing to its funds, during his visit in that section.

Agents and subscribers to the Institute, are requested to forward their collections and subscriptions, as soon as practicable, to the Treasurer, Joseph Stebbins, Esq., Clinton, Oneida county, N. Y.

Br. Sias will preach on the 8th inst., at Warren Settlement, evening—9th, at Br. Holloway may appoint—10th, at Fox Settlement, 4 P. M.—11th, at Cape Vincent—15th, near Br. Zullar's in Pamela, evening—16th, Theresa, evening—17th, as Br. Cornwall may appoint.

The Quarterly Conference of the Chautauque Association will be held in Chautauque, Chautauque county, near Br. L. Herrington's, on the last Saturday and Sunday inst. Ministering brethren, etc., are invited to attend.

The following Associations meet in the month of June, on the days and at the places named.

The Central Association (of N. Y.) in Bridgewater, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday.

The Central Association (of Mich.) in Ann Arbor, same days.

The Niagara Association at Clarendon, same days.

The Mohawk Association, in Newport, on the second Wednesday and Thursday.

The Black River Association, in Champion, on the third Wednesday and Thursday.

The Otsego Association, at Burlington Flats, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday.

The St. Lawrence Association, in Canton, same days.

The Allegany Association, when and where? for we learn that either time or place is to be changed.

NEW-YORK CONVENTION.

The Universalist Convention of the State of New-York, will meet in the city of Albany on the last Wednesday in May—31st—and continue in session the following Thursday—June 1st. The following is the list of lay and clerical delegates appointed by the several Associations.

Br. Skinner, the Standing Clerk, being absent, I have arranged the above from the published Minutes. If there are any errors, let them be speedily corrected. If there are any vacancies, they should be filled in due time.—* Dead. † Substitutes.

A. B. G.

P. S. Br. Sanderson, in the Herald of Truth of April 21st, has erred in fixing the meeting of the Convention on "the fourth Wednesday" of May. It adjourned to meet on "the last Wednesday"—the Constitution, as amended, says it shall meet on "the last Wednesday in May, annually," and "may adjourn from day to day until its business is completed." Of course, the above notice is correct—May 31st is the appointed and constitutional day.

POETRY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

PITY.

How lovely in the arch of heaven,
Appears yon sinking orb of light,
As darting through the clouds at even,
It gilds the rising shades of night;
Yet brighter, fairer shines the tear,
That trickles o'er misfortune's bier.

How sweet the murmur of the gale,
That whispers through the summer grove;
How soft the tone of friendship's tale,
And softer still the voice of love!
Yet softer, far, the tears that flow,
To mourn—to soothe another's woe.

More rich than costliest diadem,
That glitters on the monarch's brow—
More bright than ocean's purest gem,
Or all that wealth or art can show,
The drops that swell in pity's eye—
The pearl of sensibility!

Is there a spark in earthly mould,
Fraught with one ray of heavenly fire;
Does man one trait of virtue hold,
That even angels most admire?
That spark is pity's radiant glow,
That trait, the tear for other's woe.

Let false philosophy decry,
The noblest feelings of the mind;
Let wretched sophists madly try
To prove a pleasure more refined;
They only strive, in vain, to steel
The tenderness they can not feel.

To sink in nature's last decay,
Without a friend to mourn the fall;
To mark its embers die away,
Deplored by none, unwept by all;
This is sorrow's deadliest curse,
Nor hate, nor hell, can form a worse.

Take wealth! I know its paltry worth:
Take honor! It will pass away:
Take power! I scorn the bounded earth:
Take pomp! its trappings soon decay:
But spare me, grant me pity's tear,
To soothe my woe, and deck my bier.

Hamilton, April, 1837.

THEORY AND PRACTICE.

Extracted from the Star in the West.

Universalists believe that "God is good unto all, and his tender mercies are over all his works";—that "though he cause grief yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies";—that "He causeth the sun to shine upon the evil and the good, and sendeth rain upon the just and the unjust";—that "He is kind to the evil and the unthankful";—that "neither life nor death, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord";—finally, that "He will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth."

Partialists believe, that God loves those only who love him;—that he hates his enemies, and that he will finally torture them in a quenchless fire forever. Now, dear reader, which God do you conscientiously believe it the safest to imitate, to resemble, to be assimilated to—the one whose attributes are all goodness, mercy, and universal love, or that in which the Partialist believes? We will now suppose a case in point, to illustrate the advantage that Universalism has over Partialism, as far as relates to its moral influence upon mankind.

Two clergymen, one a Universalist, the other a Partialist, appeared at the same time among the Winnebago Indians. Each delivered a discourse on the evidences of Christianity; by means of which a number of the Indians were converted to the Christian religion. As they were satisfied that their new religion would impose new duties, they requested the two ministers, each to deliver a discourse on the duties connected with Christianity.—Their request was immediately complied with. Each, in closing his discourse, exhorted his red brethren to become godlike—to imitate—to resemble God; to be assimilated to him. At the conclusion of the services, one of the Indians addressed himself to the ministers as follows: "You have been endeavoring to instruct us in the duties of religion; but we do not understand you: you say we must be godlike. We are not acquainted with the Christian's God;—we do not know what his character is. Please to instruct us on this subject, that we may know whether it will be safe for us to follow his example—to imitate his conduct." To this the Partialist replied, "God is that almighty Being whose presence pervades the whole universe: he holds the destiny of all things in his hands;—he is the Maker of all men;—he loves his friends and hates his enemies;—he will make his friends eternally happy beyond the skies;—his enemies he will burn forever in a hell of fire and brimstone;—he has devils to pitch them about in the roaring quenchless billows of eternal fire." The Indian—with the strongest expression of indignation in his countenance—responded:—"Sir, if we find the Christian's God bears the character you have ascribed to him, we will renounce this new religion we have espoused. White men have always blamed us for cruelty to our enemies; but we only burn them for a few hours; your God will burn his to all eternity. To be godlike we must be infinitely more cruel than we are now: if he punishes his enemies forever, we must burn ours as long as we can;—if he damns and curses his enemies, we must damn and curse ours. Indians never knew how to use profane language;—they never knew how to curse and damn their brethren, until the black coats taught them. I will inquire of the other white man about the Christian's God." The Universalist then observed: "According to my views, God is good—he loves his friends and his enemies—he loves all men—he punishes only to reform us; and he will make all Indians and white men, happy in heaven."—"Then," said the Indian, "we will worship your God; he is good—he is love. If we imitate—if we resemble, and be like this Being, we shall be good: we shall love our friends—we shall love our enemies—we shall love all mankind, and make all as happy as we can. We will bury the tomahawk and the scarping knife forever."

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

LONDON, February, 1837.

I have just returned from a visit to Greenwich Hospital, three miles down the Thames—(by the new railway, which is such a wonder here.) A splendid and truly English institution it certainly is, and accommodated with a structure worthy also of England and of itself. This consists of five large piles of Portland and other stone,—of great extent,—on a terrace extending nearly nine hundred feet along the river-side—commanding of course a beautiful and appropriate view;—and the two northern buildings separated by a grand square about three hundred feet wide, in the midst of which is Rysbach's great statue of George II, made out of an eleven-ton block of marble, captured from the French. This Hospital was founded by William and Mary, in 1694.—The building which bears his name contains a fine hall, vestibule and dome of Sir Christopher Wren's. Charles II resided for a time in another, which bears his, and which was built after a plan of Inigo Jones, as were some of the other works. The colonnades adjoining some of these buildings are the finest I know of; pilasters of stone, twenty feet high, and an extent of three hundred and fifty feet, with a return pavilion at the end, of some seventy feet more. Except as a monument of national taste, indeed, and an encouragement to the arts, one might well ask, "Why all this waste of magnificence, and much more,—this great Hall of Naval Pictures included, or the ceiling of which alone are more than fifty-three thousand square feet of Thornhill's allegorical paintings, for which he was allowed some £40 the yard. He earned it, to be sure, for he was sixteen years here, working on his back. In the chapel is a monument of Chantry's too, to one of the Governors, which cost its thousands of course, for Chantry can have what he pleases. And here is West's great picture of Paul's Preservation at Melita—twenty-five feet by fourteen—in a superb frame which itself would almost found a decent Hospital—after the American fashion. This was painted doubtless for the Institution. It is apparently indeed, a pet with the government. A large number of the pieces in this fine Naval Gallery, were presents of George IV, from Hampton and Windsor—including more than a dozen portraits of Sir Peter Lely alone. The present King has also given them several, and I understand he is often here, and a great favorite with the old sailors, as might be expected. Of these there are about two thousand seven hundred here, additional to which is an establishment for some eight hundred boys and two hundred girls, who come under the same head. The men are of various ages—disabled seamen;—but mostly above 30, and generally much older, as you would infer from the fact that the mortality among them is rated on an average at one a day the year round. Several are nearly 100. There are one hundred and twenty men here who sailed with Nelson, it is said; and over one hundred of Howe's men. I noticed a portrait of an Irish veteran, recently deceased at the age of 110—a hero of twenty-two battles, who had the honor of supporting poor Wolfe in his arms, when he fell on the heights of Abraham, to rise no more. Others are here who fought against us—peace to their old age, nevertheless, and much good may it do them! Speaking of Nelson, here is the coat he wore at the Battle of the Nile; given by the King. The best picture, too, in all this constellation of Lely's, Kneller's, Copley's, Lawrence's, and Reynolds',—at least the most moving to my mind,—is that of the Hero dying in the cockpit of the Victory; with the Captain of the V. weeping over him, and the physician feeling his pulse; both of whom, it is most remarkable, Sir Thomas Hardy and Mr. Beattie, are now in this Institution—the former its Governor, and the other a physician. I met at Bath the other day, by the way, a waiter at an inn, who was body servant to Nelson in the wars.

I walked through the kitchens, dining-rooms, and wards of this immense establishment, and was struck with the ample provision made for the comfort of these old fellows. Whether indeed it is not too ample, is a question in my mind; whether it does not operate almost as a temptation for a certain class of men to be too little careful of themselves, in the confidence they have that Government will be careful of them, and the relief they can not but feel for quarters so capital as these certainly are. And yet I must say they look like decent people; many of them venerable old fellows, of course. What a treat it would be to hear their stories of the wars. But I could not stop for a parley.

Of the Observatory at this place you will not require a description. The Park also is very fine, but not to my present purpose. It would be idle to mention any thing of that sort to an American.

MARRIAGES.

In Nelson, April 12th, by Rev. A. Kinney, Mr. DARIUS SAMPSON to Miss CYNTHIA RICHARDSON.

In Whitesborough, on the 1st inst., by Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mr. GEORGE FOLTS, late of Frankfort, N. Y., now of Washington city, D. C., to Miss ELIZA MURRAY, daughter of the late John Murray, Esq., of the former place.

DEATHS.

At Groton, March 15th, suddenly, Mrs. PHEBE TRENT, aged 91 years.

Remarkably regular and industrious in her habits, she ever enjoyed almost uninterrupted health. She had been successively united to two husbands, and has left children by both that are now far advanced in years. Having survived her last partner for 30 years, she went down to the grave in peace. Funeral sermon by Br. Bullard, on the following Sunday, in the meeting-house in McLean.

In Cortlandville, March 17th, of consumption, LESTER CHAPIN, aged 27 years. Sermon by the writer.

Oh, consumption, thou sparest not!

The young, the gay share thy fell lot;

The fairest portions of our land,

Are crushed beneath thy blighting hand.

"Lord, evermore give us this bread."—John vi: 34.

Bread, literally speaking, has ever been considered "the staff of life." The expression is used, however, particularly in the Scriptures, as comprehending the several aliments which are required for the sustenance of physical nature. And so long as the health and vigor of the corporeal system, are dependent on these aliments, bread may be considered an indispensable blessing. And the objects for which it was designed in the Divine economy, will always be promoted or retarded, in exact proportion as the bread is wholesome or deleterious to the physical constitution. Hence, it is a matter of no ordinary importance to the temporal enjoyment of mankind, to see that the bread that they make use of is composed of the proper materials, and in such a manner as to be rendered both palatable and nutritious to the recipient.

Every body is aware, however, that literal bread presents a variety of qualities—sometimes it is excellent—sometimes it is barely eatable, and sometimes it is not only unpalatable, but extremely injurious in its effects upon the human system. But the worst bread in the world, is frequently that which is the most costly and the most fashionable. And the reason why it is the worst, is because it is productive of the most deleterious consequences to the constitutions of those who use it. And the reason why it produces such painful effects, is because the makers and venders of it, to gratify the vanity of popular pride, introduce into its compound such a heterogeneous mixture of alkalies, acids, sugars and spices, that all the original properties of simple and healthy bread are neutralized—destroyed. And the natural consequences are, the more you eat of it, the more sickly, debilitated and languid you will become.

What I have said is manifestly true; and all who are acquainted with the chemical properties of such bread, and also with the digestive functions of the human system, will readily agree with me in the opinion that a more simple and natural preparation, would be vastly cheaper, and much more healthy, even if it savored a little more of poverty, and was not quite as fashionable and agreeable to the long-cherished habits and customs of the wealthy, the affluent and the proud.

Let those, then, who are aware of the pernicious effects of satiating the appetite with such slow poison, in the form, and under the perverted name of bread, forthwith unite and exert their influence in effecting and promoting a reformation in this matter. And let physicians, particularly, who are competent judges in the case, no longer encourage by their precepts and examples, an evil nearly equal to that of drunkenness; but let them raise their voices against it—portray its impropriety, and honestly inform the people, that "there is death" in the unnatural composition. Let a reformation of this kind be set on foot—let mankind begin to use plain, coarse, unfashionable bread, and we should soon feel our physical strength renewing—our dyspeptic symptoms passing off—our nervous gloom and despondency dissipating. Our children would soon begin to wear in their countenances the pleasing glow of ruddy health, and in a short time, the advantages of such diet, would be seen, and felt, and acknowledged by all. Then should we hear thousands in every direction crying "evermore give us this" plain, homely, healthy "bread."

But there is still another kind of bread spoken of in the Scriptures, which may be denominated spiritual bread. And this is evidently the "bread" mentioned in our text. A few remarks will explain the necessity of this kind of bread.

Man is composed of body and mind; or in other words, of a physical and moral nature. These two properties, notwithstanding they are both embraced in the constitution of man, are, nevertheless, in a certain sense, distinct qualities. Both, however, require appropriate nourishment, though of very different kinds. I have spoken of the food which the body requires; and I would now remark, that the God of heaven has furnished us as amply with materials of which to form that spiritual bread which the mind requires, as he has with materials of which to form the literal bread which the body subsists upon. But unhappily for the world of mankind, those who have been in the habit of preparing and vending this spiritual bread, have generally, like those mentioned in the foregoing case, to gratify and please the moral vanity of perverted minds, introduced into that compound which they denominate "spiritual bread," such a motley collection of contending and poisonous ingredients, that the whole moral world have nearly died from its direful effects.

But what are the materials which Heaven has furnished for the formation of that spiritual bread which sustains, and invigorates, and happiness the mind? The answer may be seen in John vi: 33; "For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world." And again, verse 63, "It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit, and they are life." From these citations we learn three important facts: 1. That Christ is the bread that came down from heaven; not his body and blood, as some would have us believe, for in his explanation of his own language, to his disciples, he says, "the flesh profiteth nothing; it is the spirit that quickeneth." 2. That the precepts of Jesus Christ, or the doctrines of the Gospel, were the materials of which alone, spiritual bread should be composed: "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." It will here be seen, that the materials designed for spiritual bread, are not a mixture of life and death. Hence, the bread composed of them can not be death to the man before he eats it, and life to him afterwards. And 3. That this "bread of God" was designed to "give life to the world"—not eternal death to the great majority of human beings. And that the design of God will be fully accomplished, is too clear to be denied.

Here then, are the principal materials of which the food for the human mind should be composed, and nothing should be mingled with them, to render the composition more fashionable and popular. These principles are perfectly adapted to the functions of the soul, and are not only pleasing to the taste, but every way calculated to strengthen, invigorate and improve the mental faculties.

But the religious world are not contented with such plain, simple and congenial, moral diet. It is not costly and extravagant enough to gratify their ambitious vanity—it is obtainable by all classes, casts and conditions of mankind—and therefore, supposed to be unworthy of use—detestable—insipid. Hence, a preparation must be used, the expense of which places it infinitely beyond the reach of the "herd" of mankind—the "vulgar." In this composition, foreign mineral ingredients, of a sulphureous quality, are mingled, which infallibly tend to debilitate the moral system, and derange the senses of those who feast upon it; and premature death is frequently the result of its use among mankind.

But there is one thing worthy of special notice. Those who praise this kind of spiritual bread the most loudly—present it before their neighbors the most frequently, and speak of its nutritious qualities in the most exalted strains; are seldom known to eat it themselves. One would certainly suppose, by the extravagant manner in which they recommend it to those around them, that they would eat nothing else, and would die eternally if they did. But this is a great mistake. It is not designed for their own use, but for the use of others; and if you will pay a little attention to this matter, you will soon be compelled to acknowledge the truth of the above remarks. The probability is, that each of them has been induced, in the outset of their spiritual career, to swallow a little of it. And notwithstanding its popularity, and the high estimation in which it was apparently held, it produced an effect upon them, which fully satisfied them that they could not safely eat any more of it. And, hence, a uniform abstinence in relation to its use, is carefully observed among the religionists of the day. But they seem determined to make up in praises what it lacks in good qualities.

Reader, what would be your conclusion, if by my pressing invitation, you should be seated at my table, and I should place before you a very costly compound which I denominate bread—expatiate largely upon its alimentary qualities, and conclude by telling you that it was the only diet that could preserve health and promote corporeal strength and vigor, and press you to be the first to taste it; but on your returning the usual compliment, and wishing me to taste it first, I should refuse; and on being interrogated, should confess that I was not willing to eat it myself? Would you not readily conclude that there was something hypocritical, clandestine and knavish in my conduct, and that it would be unsafe to comply with my pressing entreaties? Most assuredly you would, if you was a man of common penetration. And your conclusion would be fully warranted by the circumstances of the case, and none can rationally deny it.

The fact is, the spiritual bread that is most fashionable now, embraces a liberal quantity of the most deadly poisons, such as the wrath of God, vicarious atonement, total depravity, infinite sin and endless woe; it may therefore, be justly denominated the "bread of death." And although many are compelled by the force of popular opinion, tradition and prejudice, to keep a supply of it in their houses—to carry it about in their pockets, and occasionally give it away to their neighbors; they are very careful to eat but little, if any of it, themselves. When we can be assured that they themselves make a plentiful and constant use of it, and that they are benefited by it, we shall certainly be more inclined to favor its use among our fellow-beings. But until this is the case, we must be indulged in letting it alone ourselves, and in warning others to beware of it.

The bread which we offer to our neighbors, we delight in eating ourselves. It is "the bread of God;" and it is composed of grace—eternal life, and impartial salvation. There are no spices of death, nor leaven of sulphur in it. We know it to be good, palatable and wholesome, from personal experience and close observation. It satisfies the craving of the mind, invigorates the moral system, and fills the soul with fulness and peace. We would therefore cheerfully and feelingly recommend it to all who have never tasted it.

I know that it is a cheap material—it is obtained "without money, and without price." I know too, that it is very unfashionable, except among the "poor" and "broken-hearted." But all this does not lessen its real value. It has been tried in many cases, where the more popular bread has been used till the recipient was on the brink of the grave, with incomparable success; restoring him to health, peace and exalted enjoyment. And this is not all; even its opposers themselves, admit that it is "good to live by"—that it is well calculated to quiet the mind, soothe the disturbed heart, and fill the soul with peace and tranquillity. I have often heard them say, that they "would give all the world" for the privilege of feasting upon it, if they could do so without incurring the wrath of God and their church. They have often told me that it was the best bread in the world, and that they really hoped it was the true bread. Yet they dared not eat of it because it was so good.—"Why," say they frequently, "it is too good to be the true bread." This is virtually acknowledging that it is much better than that which they are extolling and recommending. And yet they tell us, good as they admit it is, that it is made by the DEVIL. O how they would feast upon the devil's bread, if they only dared! Their own bread, which they say is made by the Almighty, they virtually acknowledge now, to be rather unpalatable and loathsome, but it is "good bread to die by!" and they hope by starving to death here, rather than eat it, they shall have something better hereafter. O, the miseries of ignorance, superstition and folly! When will the world learn to be consistent and rational?

But again; if all that is affirmed by the opposers of this bread, which we eat and recommend, is true—if the devil is the maker of such good, life-sustaining, and desirable bread, and God, the maker of bread that is so loathsome, unpalatable and sickening, that those to whom it is given, dare not eat it, but only keep it to give away to their poor starving neighbors, and in fact just sustain their own existence by a little of the devil's bread, which they steal now and then unnoticed—I say, if all this be true, who would not choose the devil for a BAKER?

But to conclude, permit to say, that the spiritual bread which we have recommended, and shall continue to recommend, is composed of those precepts of our Saviour which are "spirit and life," and it is peculiarly adapted to the moral constitution of man. No class or condition of human beings can wander out of the reach of mercy, nor use means to evade the demands of justice. Hear the description which Moses gives of our Maker: "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth; keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty." The justice of God requires that the wicked shall be punished; for, every man shall be rewarded according to his deeds, whether those deeds be good or evil; and justice will have its demand. But the justice of God can not neutralize his mercy, for "his mercy is everlasting," and "his tender mercies are over all his works." So says the Psalmist. An apostle hath said, that God "will have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth," and also, that God "worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." Put these two independent declarations together, and what is the conclusion? Answer.—"As in Adam all die, even so, in Christ shall all be made alive." "God is love," says an apostle; and the same apostle also says "we love him, because he first loved us." Our Saviour says, "all things are given me of my Father." Again, "all that the Father giveth me shall come to me, and him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out; for I came down from Heaven, not to do mine own will but the will of him that sent me." We have seen what that will is, and the Scripture informs us, that Christ "shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied"—that this mortal shall put on immortality—this weakness, power—this dishonor, glory—and this corruptible, incorruption—that death shall lose its sting, the grave its victory, sin its existence, and God be all in all. No wonder that Jesus said "the bread of God is he that cometh down from Heaven, and giveth LIFE TO THE WORLD!" No wonder that he also said, "the words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are LIFE!"

O that the truth of God might run and be glorified among the benighted children of men!—that all might feast upon that bread of life which nourished and satisfied the primitive disciples of our Lord, and which induced them to exclaim, in the language of our text, "Lord, evermore give us this bread." Then would the dark, and gloomy, and inconsistent, and cruel systems of aspiring, hypocritical and unmerciful men, sink into the shades of their own insignificance, and leave their dupes to the embrace and enjoyment of that Divine truth which came by Jesus Christ, and fills the human mind with joy unspeakable, and transcendently glorious! Thank God, such a time is fast approaching—light is springing up amidst surrounding darkness; and notwithstanding the hue and cry against the cheering, consoling, and life-giving truth of impartial and universal grace and salvation, there are thousands yearly coming to the knowledge of the truth, and uniting with the primitive disciples in crying—"Lord evermore give us this bread."—Amen.

SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

Some pretend to found an argument in favor of endless misery, upon the Divine Sovereignty. The writer has thought proper, therefore, to offer some brief remarks on this view of the Divine character. It must be admitted, at the very commencement, that there are certain things which God can not do, though we say he can do what he pleases; yet it must be remembered that there are things which he can not please to do, because they are contrary to his own nature, or his own laws. God can not make darkness light, nor light darkness; truth, error, nor error, truth. He can not lie, nor deny himself. He can not make a being equal with himself; a God can not make a God. If he makes beings at all, they must necessarily, of course, have a beginning, which he has not, and must be inferior to Him in their powers and capacities. We proceed one step farther, and take a position which militates directly against the popular notion of endless misery. It is, that the Deity can not make a being for ever wretched! Here, it may be necessary to the argument to remark that, there are two kinds of power in the universe, moral and physical. True, God has power enough, physically speaking, to make every moral being for ever miserable; but then he can not do this, morally speaking, because his goodness equals his omnipotence.

To illustrate; a father sits at his peaceful fireside with his smiling babe in his arms. He has sufficient strength to throw his child into the flames, but it is entirely beyond his power, because his care is so great that it prompts him to adopt every measure calculated to promote the happiness of his offspring. Here, the opposer will say, perhaps, that endless misery is designed for a good end; that on the whole, it promotes the happiness of the universe; that it is a grand display of Divine Justice. But, for one, the writer confesses that he could never imagine how justice could be seen where it did not exist. A recurrence here to inspiration may be profitable in our investigation. Jehovah, declaring his self-existence, his attributes, and his intention, says, "There is no God besides me; a just God and a Saviour; * * * I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness and shall not return, that unto me every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear, surely shall say, In the Lord have I righteousness and strength." We have one question more to ask the opposer. How can every one confess this, if millions are to remain in hell for ever, in a state of rebellion? Surely, they can not say, in the Lord have we righteousness and strength, when they are entirely destitute of both. Here, it will be said, that God will force all to come, but then all hearts may not be so perfectly reconciled. So then, the ever-living God will be engaged, during the wasteless ages of eternity, in promoting hypocrisy; yes, and in punishing the same beings for having been guilty of the same vice while on earth! Oh, of all the absurd and miserable systems that ever prevailed in our world, that of endless misery caps the climax.

In bringing my subject to a close, I am desirous of presenting a distinct definition of Divine Sovereignty. "Power is an energy capable of producing certain effects; and the power of an intelligent being, is the ability of operating some designed effect." The truth is, the Sovereignty of God affords a strong and irresistible argument in favor of the ultimate unity and happiness of our race.—The will of Deity is, to have "all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." "He doeth his will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth, and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" "My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." There is no superior power to control the will of Jehovah. Here, then, we rest as on a rock. There is an all-wise and perfect Being at the head of the affairs of the universe. He wills the final prevalence of purity and enjoyment. His sovereignty will enable him to carry that will into execution. "Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

HOLY FAIRS.

BY ABGARUS R. HORTON.

I have much faith in dreams. My attention was engaged by one recorded in the Magazine and Advocate, by Apollos. It set my whole mind in a ferment. I send you the result of my ideas, after they had worked themselves clear.

These religious or holy fairs are increasing in number, and extending their operations. In some places they have driven the poor manufacturers of fancy articles, out of the market. Rag dolls, baby caps, needle books and pincushions are a mere drug, except at a holy fair. Those who earned a scanty living by making them, can live by them no longer; but must try some other labor, or starve, beg or steal. It is useless to stem the fashion; but can it not be directed to some useful purpose?

Let the holy fair misses and madams purchase the goods ready made from the poor. Or let some enterprising young candidate for the ministry, or venerable deacon, or saintly spinster, open a holy fair warehouse, employ these poor persons to fill it with the necessary articles, and furnish fairs with goods, saleswomen, gipseys and waltzers at so much per centum of the proceeds. This would give employment to those now robbed of it, a lucrative office to some faithful servant of the church, and allow our wealthy dames and lasses to spend their time less injuriously to community.

Other benefits might be effected in this way. We have too many moles, mice, rats, cats, dogs, snakes, snails, frogs, toads, and lizards. The ears, eyes, claws, tails and hides of these pests might be made a necessary part of the holy fair manufactures. Employment would be given to idle boys and girls, in ridding us of the superabundance of them. In this employment, also, our young folks would be inured to the arts and devices of a hunter's life, and prepared to sustain the honors of hardy back-woodsmen in the far west, when old enough to emigrate thither. Care must be taken, however, lest this desire of mingling natural and artificial together, does not revive the ancient punishments of shaving and cropping the human head and ears!

But a still greater good can be effected by a right management of these religious fairs. By a long series of legislative enactments in the different States of our Union, lotteries, gambling and vagrancy have fallen into partial disrepute among many pious and sober minded people. The effects have been lamentable. The unfortunate class of people engaged in these things have become outcasts from society, and are generally despised and condemned. It is in the power of holy fairs to raise up these bowed down, and again render them respectable in society. Now they drudge in the service of satan. But they can be employed in the labor of the Lord; and that without any change of their vocations. Let the lottery men be hired to attend holy fairs to sell tickets in religious lotteries, of which the highest prizes shall be "everlasting life" "life" and "year" memberships in the various religious associations of the day, and the lower prizes may be Bibles, Testaments, tracts and verse-a-day crockery. The gamblers may be furnished with holy stocked cards, loaded dice, sweat-cloths, roulette tables, dominoes, etc., etc., and be employed in winning stakes for the Lord's Treasury. And let the vagrants be made drunk with nitrous oxide gas (I would not allow them wine or ardent spirits on any account!) and opium, to beg, box, dance and caper for the diversion of the company. All these might be allowed from 50 to 75 per cent. of their winnings and gleanings, as compensation for their services, and the best mode of rewarding the most skilful, and sharpening the talents of the rest. The percentage may seem too high to those unacquainted with the allowances of General Agents and collectors for other benevolent and religious operations; but I am informed that these last sometimes receive even more than the above rates—sometimes all they collect—for their services.

In this manner I would elevate this degraded and despised class of community—make their now abused employments a source of revenue to the church—relieve our delicate fair ones from the drudgeries they now must submit to, and reform the foolish notions of community in regard to the immorality, and vulgarity of blacklegging, fortune-telling, boxing, hurdy-gurdying, and beggary!

I might add other details, but as the foregoing may be sufficient to remove the absurd and licentious prejudices of Universalists against holy fairs, and lead others to think of their still further extension and improvement, I close for the present.

PULPIT ELOQUENCE.

BY BETA.

A retrospect of Antiquity will display the influence and power of eloquence, when directed towards the feelings and passions of man. It would be unnecessary to enumerate particularly the circumstances that attended the orators of Greece and Rome; when like the bolt of heaven, they pierced, or, like the sunshine of morning, they soothed, softened, or exhilarated the mind, any farther than to observe, that their audiences were deeply impressed with the importance and dignity of their subjects, so that they needed only direction and impulse to send them along. When we admire, then, the efficacy of eloquence, in exciting and ruling the mind, we naturally inquire into the qualities which those orators so successfully applied. Shall we mention that Demosthenes was unencumbered with the learning of Greece?—that, though Socrates was the depository of all that learning, yet he was a mere holiday declaimer, compared to Demosthenes? Let us only consult our own feelings; and we shall discover that learning is lifeless, unless animated and inspired by the fervors of the soul.

The answer of the Grecian orator, that action was the great qualification of the orator, is only putting the effect for the cause; attributing to action, which is the expression of passion and feeling, what depends entirely upon passion and feeling. With this explanation, his reply was the response of an oracle; worthy his practice and wisdom.

These remarks apply seriously, and forcibly to the ministers of the Gospel. They are delegated by the Almighty, to enforce his doctrines, and expand the reign of peace; to plant in the minds of mankind, that love, charity, faith and righteousness, so gloriously taught and enforced by the Redeemer's precepts and example; and to arouse to benevolence, and prompt to action, those who are regardless of their own present happiness, and of the welfare of those around them. To be sure, they must address the understanding; but it must be through the heart; a cold assent of reason, is as "filthy rags." How important, then, that he who pleads with mankind; that he who strives to wrest from the Partialist the fiery sceptre with which he embroils the world, and lights up in the hearts of men the fires of hell; who would lead the wanderer to the waters of life, and divest him of prejudice; and who, finally, points out and displays the majesty of the Father, and the exceeding brightness of his glory—how important that he should have power to reach the recesses of the heart; to drag forth the wrong that lurks there, and purify and cleanse it from all false impressions in regard to the future destiny of the soul.

Ye ministers, reflect and look around: consider the importance of your charge; and if benevolence dwell in your hearts, the cause of Truth will never fall.

A BRIEF "EXPERIENCE."

That man is naturally a religious being, I think is fully manifest from the facility and ease with which moral and religious impressions are made upon the mind of youth. We know that the youthful intellect is capable, at a very early period, of receiving impressions, which are not unfrequently as lasting as life; and that religious truth, if presented in its primitive purity, is not one of the least attractive objects, or one that makes the least impression on the mind. On the contrary, these impressions are generally the most durable of all, and no change of external condition, or even of religious opinions, can entirely erase them. With these remarks, my own experience will fully accord.

Perhaps my mind was not exercised in matters of religion at as early a period as that of many others; owing, probably, to my parents not being professors. Yet as early as six or seven years of age, my mind was distinctly impressed with various ideas of a heaven and a hell; the latter of which, I verily believed to be a deep pit somewhere, (I know not where,) literally burning with fire and brimstone, hotter than a furnace seven times heated, in which a large proportion of mankind would welter in undying agony, throughout the ceaseless ages of eternity. And so strong was the impression, that my midnight slumbers have been disturbed by fearful forebodings of this fabled pit of woe, to that degree, that I imagined the monarch of the infernal regions had come, in person, to drag me down to his direful abode of misery. But after sometime these impressions wore off, so as not to have much influence upon my life and actions. From this time, nothing of importance occurred, till, by sickness and the ravages of death, I was deprived of that earthly comfort, a mother, and forced to take up my abode with strangers.

I was now nine years of age. My new guardians were Congregationalists—rigid adherents to Calvinism in its original state, and with all its native deformity. Of course, I must be trained up "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." Consequently, (in addition to the regular services of the sanctuary,) I was instructed in the Catechism at least once a week. I can not now particularly describe the effect which these lessons had upon my mind. They served, in a great degree, to create in me a spirit of negligence and carelessness, if not of disgust and contempt to every thing like religious instruction. I contracted habits of profanity, Sabbath-breaking, deceit, disobedience, and many other vices, from the recollection of which, my heart even now recoils with horror. Oh, how blighting, how chilling and withering to all the finer sensibilities of the heart, are the galling manacles of error, when fastened by bigotry and superstition. But this was not all. I read in the Catechism, "that God did, from all eternity, elect some to everlasting life, and pass by and foreordain others to all the miseries of this life, to death itself, and the pains of hell forever." This led me to the following conclusion: if I am elected an heir of glory and immortal felicity, all is well, I am safe, and nothing can endanger my hope of eternal life. On the other hand, if I was "a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction," I felt that preaching, however earnest—no religious instruction, however good the intentions of those who gave it, could possibly avert the awful doom. Hence at the age of fifteen, when the mind just begins to expand, and would, if properly guided, "look through nature up to nature's God," I settled down into a state of cold indifference bordering on skepticism. I remained in this deplorable condition something more than one year. About this time, the Methodists began to hold meetings in the neighborhood where I resided. They, like all other new sects when they, for the first time, commenced preaching in any place, were denounced as heretics, and unworthy the confidence of all good men. The Congregationalists, therefore, refused to unite with them in their public services, or social meetings, and one good deacon went so far as to say he could not bid them "God speed." In this state of affairs, my curiosity was considerably excited, and I desired to hear the new preacher. It was sometime, however, before I obtained permission; but prejudice was at last, forced to yield to the voice of reason, and I was suffered to hear him. The preaching, singing, and all the devotional exercises were so different from any thing I had ever heard before, that I was soon prepossessed in their favor. I continued to attend their meetings, and the more I attended, the more interested I became. In short I soon became a seeker of what I then thought was religion. In this state of mind I continued for nearly two years, using every possible means to obtain that great and mysterious change, which I then believed constituted the essence of religion, and to be essentially necessary to my eternal felicity. But God, who is rich in mercy, had better things in store for me. He had determined that when I became a convert, it should be to the truth, and that "the truth should make me free indeed."

At this time I hardly knew that there was such a being in the universe, as a Universalist. I had, to be sure, heard the name, but it was associated with all that was disgusting and horrible, and I was taught to believe the doctrine a device of the devil, and that its advocates were his emissaries.

Such were my views and feelings, when a change in external circumstances brought me into a neighborhood of "that sect which is every where spoken against," and I was persuaded to attend one of their meetings. I did not, of course, expect to hear any thing like candor, reason, or common sense in the preaching, but I was greatly, yes, happily disappointed. The deep and fervent aspirations of the heart as the speaker addressed the throne of grace, and the humble acknowledgment of reliance on the wisdom and goodness of our Father in heaven, completely disarmed me of all my prejudices, and I stood forth, unshackled by bigotry and superstition, a sincere inquirer after truth. The remaining services of the day served but to increase my conviction, that I was not yet acquainted with the truth of the Gospel. And I left church that day with the full determination to examine the subject for myself, and, if possible, come to a knowledge of the truth. I commenced reading the Bible in order "to prove all things," being willing to "hold fast that which is good;" but it seemed like a new book to me. When I read in St. Paul's first letter to Timothy, that "God our Saviour will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth," it was new language to me, although I could recollect of reading the whole epistle several times. I continued to search for the truth till, to the joy and satisfaction of my soul, I found "the pearl of great price." "And having obtained help from God, I continued" firm and unwavering in the faith of a world's salvation "unto this day;" and I am determined "as I have received Christ Jesus the Lord, so to walk in him."

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER X.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

RELIGIOUS OPINIONS. (CONCLUDED.)

In forming your religious opinions, I can not too strongly urge upon your attention the importance of faithfully perusing the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. The volume of inspiration should be your constant companion. You should be perfectly familiar with its contents—with all its prominent precepts and doctrines.

In perusing the Scriptures, let plain, common sense be your guide in regard to their teachings. From the languages in which the Bible was originally written—from its frequent allusions to manners and customs, to sayings and maxims, to forms of government and the condition of nations, as all these existed at the different and distant times when its several portions were penned—it is to be expected that allusions will occasionally be made in that book, which we can not now fully understand—and an understanding of which would, indeed, be of little avail. It should, therefore, be your object in perusing the word of God, to obtain a clear view of the leading doctrines, the great, general principles, which it inculcates. A little candid attention will satisfy you, that a perfect harmony exists throughout its pages—that there are certain important doctrines characterized by truth, wisdom and the purest benevolence, every where proclaimed in that blessed volume. And a comparison between the teachings of Nature and the prominent declarations of the Scriptures, will convince every enlightened mind that there is a perfect harmony between them, and that both have proceeded from the same source.

If you observe a passage of Scripture which, at first sight, would seem to contradict the leading principles proclaimed in the Scriptures, it should receive your earnest attention and a critical examination. You should be slow to admit to your own mind, that it is contradictory. Observe the connexion in which it is found—ascertain who was its author, and to whom it was written, and what were the circumstances of both parties—and learn the nature and bearing of the subject that is treated upon. If it contains words of varying or of a disputed meaning, criticise those words; ascertain their origin, the manner in which they are used, and the meaning they are made to convey in other portions of the inspired writings. Consult the opinions of writers of different sects, in regard to its signification—and, in fine, let no measures within your power, be lacking, that will throw light upon the subject. If you faithfully pursue this course, with your minds open to conviction, you can become perfectly satisfied in regard to the teachings of every such passage—and you will also become perfectly assured that the sentiments of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, are characterized wholly by the purest philanthropy, and the most impartial love and kindness.

Frequent meditation upon the character of God, as revealed in the Scriptures and in the works of nature, is another valuable means of obtaining correct views of religion. The Bible declares that Jehovah possesses infinite wisdom, omnipotent power, and boundless and impartial goodness.—And nature in every part, in every operation, proclaims that its Author possesses the same characteristics. Christians of every sect unite in ascribing these attributes to Deity. Here, then, are settled, undisputed premises, from which you can proceed with satisfactory certainty, to draw conclusions respecting the purposes and dealings of God, in regard to man. To attribute any work or design to the Maker, which would contradict the existence or perfect influence of either of these attributes, would evidently be erroneous. No conclusion can be more certain than this.

Let these tests be applied to the design of Jehovah in creating man—evidently the most important subject that can engross the attention of human beings. To say that the Maker has formed an intelligent and sensitive being, with a determination or foreknowledge, that his existence should result in ceaseless wretchedness, would evidently be very erroneous; because it plainly impeaches the perfection of one of the most prominent attributes of God, viz. his goodness. Either, Deity is not impartially good, or he never formed man for this destiny, or with a knowledge of its arrival. One of these sentiments must, therefore, be rejected by every consistent mind. You must either deny God's goodness, or deny that he formed his creatures, determining or knowing that ceaseless evil would be their fate. The two propositions can not exist together. Goodness would rather have influenced Jehovah not to create the being at all, if this terrific end could not be avoided. To declare that the Creator formed man for a good purpose, but that some unforeseen accident, some unanticipated contingency transpired, contrary to the expectation and will of God, which plunges the creature into interminable woe, would plainly overthrow the wisdom, the foreknowledge and omnipotence of Deity; and must, therefore, be erroneous. And to insist that Jehovah has not power to prevent his creatures from experiencing this horrid doom, or has not power to carry into full and perfect execution all his plans for the benefit of man, is equally opposed to his omnipotence, and must be equally untrue. This is a legitimate course of reasoning, and you can properly and safely pursue it. The premises are universally acknowledged to be correct—the logic is plain and unimpeachable—and the conclusions as unavoidable and certain, as they are cheering to the kind and benevolent heart. Believe no sentiment,—however popular, or however strongly enforced by threats, or denunciations, or appeals to your fears,—that violates the legitimate influence of the wisdom, power, or goodness of God. Try every sentiment you may hear proclaimed, by these tests of the Creator's attributes. Whatever coincides with them, believe—whatever contradicts, reject, as clearly erroneous.

Remember there is an infinite difference between allowing mankind to suffer the assaults of sin and evil, for a season, to terminate in their amendment, purity and happiness; and in permitting these foes to torment them endlessly! The former—illustrated in the case of Joseph and his brethren—is perfectly consistent with the purest benevolence and love, and would be approbated by angelic hosts and beatified spirits. But the latter is directly and forever opposed to every impulse of goodness, holiness and mercy; and were it true, would enshroud heaven with everlasting mourning, and fill its celestial courts with weeping and lamentation. For, surely, nothing could more deeply afflict the pure and spotless denizens of a higher world, than an assurance that sin and wretchedness were to be forever perpetuated, and allowed to prey upon beings capable, under proper influences and proper instruction, of equalling the angels, in holiness and love!

In measuring the benefits which men can expect to receive from God, especially in another life, let not the standard be man's worthiness—for that, alas! at best, can truly demand but little—but let the gifts of the Creator be measured by the desire and capability of the infinite Donor! He who has but little, can give but little to objects of charity; but he who has much—who has an infinity of resources at command—can rationally be expected to give in accordance to his boundless means.

There are two extremes relating to religion, into which you should sedulously avoid running, viz. infidelity and fanaticism. The one rejects the most reasonable propositions—the other believes the most unreasonable, when enforced by fear.—They form the extreme outposts of incredulity and credulity. Both indicate the weakness in which the human mind is sometimes permitted to exist, and both are unworthy rational beings.—Minds of such character, approximate to each other much nearer than is generally supposed. Take off the restraint of fear from the fanatic, without enlightening the mind, and at one leap, he goes into infidelity. Bring the powerful impulse of fear to bear upon the skeptic, and he becomes the raging and illiberal fanatic! The sound, well-balanced mind, occupies the medium ground between these extremes. While it adopts all that is reasonable on every subject, it rejects every thing unreasonable, without permitting fear to influence its conclusions in the least. That medium ground, which is based upon the Gospel of Jesus Christ, every youth who would be saved from errors, degrading and distressing, should be cautious to occupy.

Has your mind become entangled in the dark, mystic web of the skeptic?—has your belief in the existence of a supreme, intelligent Creator, been for a moment shaken? Go out at evening, and gaze upon the bright stars of heaven. What beauty—what order—what harmony! All speeding with inconceivable velocity, in their vast circles, yet with no interference—no confusion. Reflect calmly on that Power—

“———whose finger set aright

This exquisite machine, with all its wheels,

Though interwolved, exact.———”

Could chance, or the operation of unintelligent laws, call into being all those mighty orbs, and clothe them with beauty, and arrange them in order? Could chance trace out their vast orbits, give them an impetus which no power less than omnipotence can arrest, and originate those laws by which all their movements are guided and controlled? In your candid moments, when reason has the uncontrolled ascendancy, you can not bring your mind to this puerile conclusion. Examine critically, and understandingly, the argument which the poet draws from the starry heavens—

“———Much design

Is seen in all their motions, all their makes:

Design implies intelligence, and art:

That can't be from ourselves—or man; that art

Man scarce can comprehend, could man bestow?

Who, motion, foreign to the smallest grain,

Shot through masses of enormous weight?

Who bid brute matter's restive lump assume

Such various forms, and gave it wings to fly?

Has matter innate motion? Then each atom

Asserting its indisputable right

To dance, would form a universe of dust.

Has matter none? Then whence these glorious forms

And boundless flights, from shapeless, and reposed?

Has matter more than motion? Has it thought,

Judgment and genius? Is it deeply learned

In mathematics? Has it framed such laws,

Which, but to guess, a Newton made immortal?

If so, how each sage atom laughs at me,

Who think a clod inferior to a man!

If art to form, and counsel to conduct—

And that with greater, far, than human skill!—

Resides not in each block—a Godhead reigns!

Grant then, invisible, eternal Mind;

That granted, all is solved.———”

When attempts are made to unsettle your confidence in the Gospel of Jesus Christ, see that you are not led astray by cavilling and sophistry, on points of no importance. The skeptic himself, can but acknowledge the great value of the moral precepts of the Gospel. He must admit, that to cause harmony, brotherly kindness and peace, to prevail throughout the habitations of man—to allow the human race to enjoy all the happiness of which they are capable in this world—all that is requisite, is the universal diffusion and the universal practice of the rules of moral conduct enjoined by the Saviour. Why, then, should they oppose the spread of a religion possessing these benign characteristics? Will it have a tendency to cause men to live in that virtuous and peaceful manner, so requisite to public welfare, by taking from them that volume that only can lead them into such a course of life? Call upon the skeptic for a system of religion or morals, that has more valuable properties—that will have a greater tendency to make men virtuous, peaceful and happy—that will infuse brighter prospects or sweeter hopes into the mind, than that contained in the New Testament. And never forsake your adherence to the Gospel of the Redeemer, until that better system is put into your possession.*

In regard to the authenticity of the New Testament, there is a short method of reasoning, that should have a satisfying influence upon your minds. That book could not have been written by wicked and deceitful men. It is impossible to conceive any rational motive that could influence such men to forge a volume, which, in every line, deeply condemns their own conduct, and holds them up to the reprehension of their fellow-beings. What could induce bad, corrupt men, to compose a book containing the most perfect code of morals of which the human mind can conceive? Could such men have written such a volume? No. The New Testament must have been written, then, by men of virtue and integrity—men who felt the value of its instructions. And certainly men of this character would not deliberately pen what they knew to be false! Thus the very existence of the New Testament among us, is one of the most convincing proofs of its truth.†

* Females can not be too much on their guard against the assaults of skepticism. Nothing appears more unnatural and abhorrent, than a female skeptic. It seems impossible that any woman can become so, who is aware of the actual influences of Christianity, and of the immense benefit it has conferred upon her sex. Is it inquired, what has Christianity done especially for woman? I answer—it found her sex degraded and debased—the slave of man—viewed as only fitted to abide his bidding and subserve his pleasures. From this low estate, Christianity has raised woman up to an equality with the other sex, in a moral and mental point of view—it has made her the companion of man, instead of his slave—and enabled her to become the sharer of his joys, his triumphs, and his acquirements. All the moral and intellectual advantages that females enjoy in Christian lands, above the members of the same sex in savage and ignorant nations, has been procured solely through the ameliorating and heavenly influences of the Gospel of Jesus Christ! Look abroad over the earth. Wherever Christianity sheds its benign light, females are elevated, improved, respected and honored—wherever Christianity is not known, there they continue the degraded, wretched servants of man! Surely, then, females who are swayed by the principles of propriety and self-respect—who desire their sex to maintain the elevated station they now occupy—who would have their rights, their virtues respected, and their mental and moral capabilities appreciated and improved—will not assist in destroying that beautiful system of Christianity, which has given them this elevation, and which alone supports it. Neither will they give their assistance or countenance to those who are engaged in this blind and mad work of destruction. At least, no female will pursue this suicidal policy, but she who prefers abasement, slavery and infamy, to virtue, dignity and an honorable equality with man—but she who chooses the darkness, ignorance, and the licentiousness of barbarism, to the light, elevation and modesty of civilization.

† There are two works lately published upon the evidences of Christianity, which I would especially recommend to youth, as of immense value, viz.—“An Argument for Christianity,” by I. D. Williamson, and “Christianity against Infidelity,” by T. B. Thayer.

REPLY TO MINOR.

Justice to myself requires some remarks on your late article, addressed to the readers of this paper, on “occasional preaching,” in which you have imputed to me a character I am unwilling to bear. Whatever may be your opinion, “with respect to theological seminaries, ministerial qualifications, tests of fellowship,” is a matter that does not particularly belong to me to discuss with you, as I am not informed what kind of “management” you would have. Consequently, I shall devote my attention to such portions of your article, as allude to me personally.

In your second paragraph, you say, “I ventured to transmit to Br. Grosh some of my thoughts upon the subject,” (occasional preaching), “requesting him, if he thought proper, to notice the scrap,” etc. Now, Sir, did you pen this sentence to inform the reader, that I had intruded? that you did not call on me also to answer your article? Rest assured, Sir, that I never should have noticed your “scrap,” had you not called upon me to do it. Again you say, “by reference to the Minutes of the Niagara Association it will be seen that Br. Hammond (together with the members of the Council) brought matters to his liking. The resolution was adopted.” Strange that I cannot see it. I find nothing in the Minutes, that describes what I like, or what I dislike. But suppose I had brought matters to my liking, would you have done less, if you could? The resolution. What resolution? One that declares how much, or how little a preacher must preach to maintain his standing and fellowship? If this be your meaning, I would respectfully inform you, that I have never voted for any such resolution, nor do I believe I shall, very soon. True, the Genesee Association requires that a person shall preach half of the time, and if you can find any one personally responsible for this act, I have no doubt he would be pleased with all the information you possess.

In your third paragraph, you say, “he seems to make light of anonymous writings. Methinks I can state facts,” etc. What evidence have you that I make light of such writings? None, at all, Sir, unless it be with the story of your former letter. And, Sir, when you will make it appear that I am under any obligation to believe that story, upon the evidence you have presented of its truth, I stand ready to show, that you are under as great an obligation to believe the reported renunciations of Universalists on their death-beds, that through the Partialist journals, and which do not give the name, residence, or time of the person's death. Now, in your story, you do not tell us the name of the preacher, the society, or place where he lived, nor even your own. If you really would reproach me, because I cannot receive such accounts as evidence, then let it come. Nevertheless, your story may be true; and if so, I have before told you, that I would never “advocate any resolution that would dis-fellowship” him. What more do you want?

I agree with your two next paragraphs, and thank you for the correction you have made. I misunderstood you.

In your next, you ask me where I got this “eight or ten.” I answer that I took it from your article. Your language is, “he preaches stately in his own society, of which he can not collect more than eight or ten at a time, and about the same number generally, (sometimes more) at others” (not “of,” as you have it in the second edition.) From this who would suppose that your congregation numbered from twenty to fifty? If, Sir, as you seem to say, “you wondered what would come next so destitute of truth:” if “Br. Hammond lacks sympathy;” if he has wounded “the feelings of a friend with an unsparing hand:” and if his “charity for the feelings of a society, is rather scanty here,” you can easily find the origin of my remarks in your first version of the story. Had you been as industrious to correct your own language, as to make me appear to a disadvantage, you would have had no occasion to accuse me of writing that which is “entirely destitute of truth.”

You deny that you advised amendments to our constitution. You say, “I think, gentlemen, that circumstances will alter cases. Of course you see the necessity of an amendment,” etc. How could you suppose that Br. Grosh and myself could see such necessity, when you did not see it? I understood you to mean that the subject was so self-evident, that we must see the necessity of amendment before any resolution could be passed by the Association. But I am glad to learn that I have some one to see for me, and hope he will always see right; especially if I have become so blind as to need such agency. However, at present, I choose to state for myself what I see, without your interference. Minor thinks that if I should visit this society, it is ten to one, if I should not have repentance preached to me. Now, Sir, if you will be so kind as to inform me wherein I need it, and can assure me of any benefit, I will cheer-accept of the service, and abundantly reward the laborer. And further, if it is not convenient for me to visit this unknown society, I promise to accept the services of such an one as you may feel disposed to send to my relief.

Again you say, “if our preachers are all like Br. Hammond we should be left alone without a shepherd.” How do you know this? Have I ever told you that I would not preach to such a society? You know I have not. Why, then, do you tell twenty thousand readers, that I would not preach to a society, because they are too poor to reward me. During seven years which I have preached, I have travelled many thousand miles to preach to the rich and the poor, without receiving a farthing, or even asking it. And now, Sir, you tell the public, in pretty clear terms, I think, that I preach only for money; that I would not preach to the poor, because they could not pay me without distress. If this be your “law of brotherly kindness and Christian charity,” I hope never to approach it.

One word more, you have my name without cost, I can have yours by paying for it. Now, Sir, it is not so much your name I want as it is some evidence to support your story. Though your name might satisfy me, it could not the public unless they knew it. My reason for preferring a real to a fictitious signature, is to shield others from my own responsibility. Different opinions on different subjects exist among us. Hence, when discussing this difference, it is but just every author should father his own production. I do not like to be suspected of writing sentiments I do not believe, nor do I wish to shoulder on others sentiments that are peculiar to myself. The manner in which I have noticed your article is brief and plain. As you are unknown to me, you can not think me personally severe. I have deemed it necessary to vindicate my own reputation, because I considered it wantonly assailed. This circumstance leads me to conclude that you are a stranger to me. However good may have been your motives, the effect of your article upon the reader is injurious to me. I intend, as far as possible, to avoid all personal disputes, and have only to regret that you did not see fit to notice my errors, without indulging in insinuations affecting my public “capacity.” But I thank God I feel no enmity or malice towards any one, and I do most devoutly pray, that I may ever be kept in this spirit. Therefore, I subscribe myself, with all suitable respect, yours,

C. HAMMOND.

UTICA, FRIDAY, MAY 12, 1837.

2 PETER III: 5-14.

“For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water: whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished: but the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.—The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness; but is long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up. Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat? Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless.”

In reply to several requests for an explanation of this passage, I refer our correspondents to an able sermon by Br. Bullard, published in this paper, volume 2, No. 15,—p. 113. But as many of our present readers may not be able to refer to that volume, the following brief explanation may not be wholly useless in directing their minds to a thorough examination of the subject for themselves.

It appears from the chapter in which this passage is found, that the early Christians were to be assailed, as Universalists now are, by "scoffers," who would argue from the delayed fulfilment of God's promises, their total forfeiture or abandonment. Also, that probably some of the early disciples of our Lord would so far heed these "scoffers" as to need the admonition contained in this Epistle. Hence the second chapter of this Epistle, written to stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance—to remind them of the words spoken by the holy prophets, and the commandments of the apostles, respecting the very event scoffed at—viz: the coming of the Lord Jesus in that generation—the removal of the Jewish world or dispensation, that the Christian dispensation might be established—and the scattering of the power of the Jews—the shortening of those days of unexampled tribulations, wars, famines, earthquakes and pestilences, that some flesh might be saved—that the Christians might be preserved from destruction, delivered from the persecuting Jews, and be founded securely as a chosen church in the earth. See Matt. 24th and 25th chapters.

To show them the possibility of such an event, he refers them to what even these scoffers might have known, but were wilfully ignorant of—viz:—the destruction of the ante-diluvian world of people—the prostration of all its powers of false religion and of oppressive government, and the establishment of a new order upon the earth they had occupied. And, most probably further to confirm their minds in the belief, that such an entire change of religion and government—such a destruction of ecclesiastical and civil power—such a prostration of some and building up of other nations, was very possible with God—Peter clothes the announcement of the coming change in the very language in which the Hebrew prophets and bards had spoken of similar great revolutions already past, in order that the minds of these early Christians might be strengthened on the principles of a double association of ideas. Hence we find phraseology, such as "the heavens passing away with a great noise—being on fire and dissolving"—"the elements melting with fervent heat"—and "the earth, with all its works, shall be burnt up"—all of them figures in common use by the prophets, to denote the destruction of ecclesiastical hierarchies—the dissolution of religious rites and ceremonies, and the abolition of earthly governments and nations.—He also speaks of a new heavens (or religious dispensation) and a new earth (or civil polity) which shall be conducted on principles of righteousness—after the old ones have been melted, dissolved or burnt up with fire, or fervent heat—phrases used to signify severe temporal trials, judgments or punishments.

As proofs that such language was common with the Hebrews in speaking of ecclesiastical and civil revolutions, and destruction of governments and nations, I would refer those who doubt, to every passage in the prophets referring to such events; or to any learned commentator who has written upon this subject, be he Jew or Christian, Partialist or Universalist. I have room to quote but two passages and one commentator—see Isa. 34th and 35th chapters, where the prophet, in one distinct prophecy, declared the destruction to come upon Edom and Bosra, and the glory of the church that is to follow. In 4th. v. he says that "all the hosts of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth down from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree.—For my sword shall be bathed in heaven; behold it shall come down upon Idumea, and upon the people of my curse, to judgment."

Bishop Lowth, in commenting on this passage, refers for explanation, to Sir Isaac Newton's observations on the Prophecies, part I, ch. ii. Here they are. "The figurative language of the prophets is taken from the analogy between the world natural, and an empire or kingdom considered as a world politic. Accordingly the whole world natural, consisting of heaven and earth, signifies the whole world politic, or so much of it as is considered in prophecy; and the things in that world signify the analogous things in this. For the heavens and the things therein, signify thrones and dignities, and those who enjoy them; and the earth with the things thereon, the inferior people; and the lowest parts of the earth, called Hades or Hell, the lowest or most miserable part of them.—Great earthquakes, and the shaking of heaven and earth, are put for the shaking of kingdoms so as to distract and overthrow them; the creating a new heaven and new earth, and the passing away of an old one—or the beginning and end of a world—for the rise and ruin of a body politic signified thereby.—The sun [is put] for the whole species and race of kings, in the kingdom of the world politic; the moon, for the body of the common people, considered as the king's wife; the stars, for subordinate princes and great men, or for bishops and rulers of the people of God, when Christ is the sun:—setting of the sun, moon and stars; darkening the sun, turning the moon into blood, and falling of the stars, [is put for] the ceasing of a kingdom."

The same prophet from whom we have already quoted language so much stronger than that contained in the text, 65th and 66th chs., speaks of the establishment of the Christian dispensation under the figure of creating "a new heaven and a new earth."

Of the application of these strong figurative expressions to merely temporal events, no doubt can be—no doubt is entertained by any respectable commentators of any denomination. But even if there were—or if the opinions of eminent critics are not sufficient to settle the question—the context of the passages themselves prove this application correct. Nor is this all.

The apostle Peter, on the day of Pentecost, applies similar language in the prophecy of Joel to the outpouring of the divine spirit, and the prospective establishment of Christianity. See Acts 26th chapter. We feel then not only authorized, but compelled by the voice and usages of Holy Writ itself, to apply this similar, and no less forcible language of Peter, in our text, to the then coming dissolution of the Jewish polity and dispensation, and the consequent establishment of Christianity, and deliverance of its professors from Jewish persecution.

MOSAIC RITES AND OBSERVANCES.

The sanction which God gave to the character of Moses, by selecting him for the important office he filled—the ability with which he generally discharged the duties of that office, and the superior wisdom he displayed in many of his laws and measures, would forbid us to suppose him light or trifling—yet there are unbelievers in his mission who have thus charged him—and there are many Christians who are unable to reconcile some of his injunctions and prohibitions with the dictates of good sense and dignity. And though at this great distance from the age in which Moses lived—remote from the countries in which he travelled and resided, and far removed from the people among whom he ruled and by whom he was surrounded, we can not discover reasons for many of his actions; yet what we can unfold, may serve to show us that the rest might be explained and justified, were we but more conversant with the manners, customs, religion and laws of that remote period of the world.

There was, undoubtedly, at the first, a reason or motive for every thing commanded or forbidden among men—whether wise or foolish, good or evil—but the lapse of ages, or the intervening darkness of intellect between the present and the past, has swallowed it up in oblivion from our understandings. Who, for instance, shall give us the reasons for using colored eggs at Easter?—a practice of very general custom in Europe, Asia and America—but of such great antiquity, that the practice, without the reason, is all we know.

Nor is this a solitary case—the sports of May-day—the customs of Valentine's eve—the venerable All-fools-day of April—the futurity revealings of Hallowe'en—the mysteries of bride-cake passed through the wedding-ring—the wedding ring itself, worn on the third finger so scrupulously—the superstitious observances of times and seasons—the omens of good or ill luck—and the hundred other signs and tokens existing among us, and feared and dreaded by the superstitious of our own and other lands, in despite of reason and revelation combined, whence came they—how did they originate—why are they now observed and practised? Who can answer? I mention these things, not that I approve of the silly superstition that now keeps them alive among us, and causes them to be the dread and hope—the joy and terror of grown children; but to show how difficult it is to account for the origin of even those customs which have come down to our own day—much more, to account for those that have ceased to exist. If I succeed, then, in accounting clearly for some of the practices enjoined or forbidden by Moses—and showing that however foolish his care may appear to us, there was wisdom in his reasons for it—I hope I may call on your charity to suppose that even those I can not explain, may have been devised and established for similar good and wise reasons.

In Numbers xix, the water of purification is enjoined to be made of the ashes of a red heifer—and directions are given at length for its use in cleansing from impurity or uncleanness. It will be found in this, as in many other apparently trifling things, that the great lawgiver had in view a particular and important object in these trifling details. It is to be presumed that during their residence for nearly 400 years in Egypt, and during their commerce with that country afterwards, the Jews would acquire many of their prejudices, and might thus be gradually seduced into idolatry. Among the prejudices is one connected with the case before us. The Egyptians held in peculiar abhorrence, animals that had red hair—which they supposed to be the color of Typhon, their embodiment of evil. It is generally supposed that it was to counteract this prejudice, or rather superstition, that Moses used a heifer perfectly red, without spot or blemish, for the sanctifying purpose named. And, to prevent a prejudice or superstitious regard to the animal—viz. a heifer—which was held in peculiar veneration by ancient idolators—he also enjoined that the same animal should be slain in the place of an undiscovered murderer. It was not to be sacrificed, for that might tend to render the animal sacred in their sight—but it was to be slain—to have its head stricken off. See Deut. xxi: 15.

Deut. xvi: 21.—"Thou shalt not plant thee a grove of any trees near unto the altar of the Lord thy God, which thou shalt make thee." A singular prohibition, and one, we would suppose, subjecting them to considerable inconvenience in a country where the heat is considerable during eight months of the year. Yet every careful reader of the Bible must have observed that there is no unnecessary penance or mortification enjoined upon the Jews. They are expressly forbidden to cut their flesh in their mournings for the dead, as was universally practised by the Heathen nations around them. Tears, and wailing, and every demonstration of sorrow and grief were forbidden in their acts of public worship—they had but one fast of a single day in a whole year—and in every thing relating to religion, joy and gladness were the principal requirements, next to devotion and righteousness. This was contrary to the practices of the Heathen in every respect—who always commenced their public worship with mutilations of the body, groaning, howling, and every sign of grief, and ended them with wild clamor, riot and brutal obscenity.

But though Moses so carefully guarded against cruel austerity on the one hand, he also guarded with equal or greater care against the other Heathen extreme of licentious mirth and sensuality, on the other. And the injunction not to plant groves around their places of worship, had reference to this latter extreme. Every thing that could inflame the human passions, was a part of Heathen worship—and murder, human and infant sacrifices, and more beastly indulgences formed a part of that worship. Hence their temples were erected on the tops of mountains and in deep groves, as affording impunity and occasion for the practice of every abomination. The profits arising from these practices supported the temple and the priesthood, who were thereby led the more zealously to encourage them by precept and example. Consequently, as I before said, the prohibition of Moses is a wise and judicious one—calculated to prevent vice and immorality, where so many examples tended to encourage it.

Of a similar nature, and founded on the same wise and virtuous reasons, is his prohibition of any exchange of costume by the sexes—Deut. ii: 5. In this he was not actuated merely by the common reasons of propriety, which render the injunction necessary even now—nor yet by those prudential considerations, which render it useful—but also by the fact, that the practice was a Heathen religious ceremony, and connected with licentious practices. It was common in the worship of Venus, and prevailed among the Syrians, Africans, Phenicians, and extended into Europe—in all which nations it led to monstrous abuses.

In the sacrifices, also, we find the same contrariety of practice in the Jews to the nations around them. All the sacred birds and animals of the Heathen, are excluded from the Jewish ritual—many of them pronounced unclean, and only the most excellent and valuable were permitted to be offered as a sacrifice. They were not allowed to retain any part of the sacrifices till the next day—because it was an ancient idolatrous custom of the Heathen, to retain part of their sacrifices for superstitious uses. The Christians, who copied many corruptions in practice from the Heathen, fell into the error of keeping a portion of the bread used in the eucharist, as a cure for diseases, to expel vermin, etc., by following this same error which Moses so carefully avoided.

The Jews were also strictly forbidden to eat any part of the sacrifices raw. The reason was similar. It was to prevent them from falling into a superstitious and indecent custom of the Egyptians, who practiced what Moses thus urgently forbade.

Thus we perceive wise reasons for these practices—practices for which, at first sight, no important reasons can easily be imagined. Why, then, may we not suppose that other things enjoined by Moses, the reasons for which are unknown to us, may have been enjoined for equally prudent and wise reasons? A. B. G.

REMITTANCES.

As these are our whole and sole dependence, we beg leave to state that they have not amounted to near as much as they did last year—whereas, with what is outstanding on the last volume, they should have exceeded last year's. This places us in a painful position—an uneasy one, certainly—for we calculated, and reasonably too, on at least an equal income to that of the former year to meet increased expenses and a heavier payment of the purchase money. And without at least an equal amount received within the year, we shall be—how badly off we can not say.

What is the cause of this hanging back? Have subscribers been less prompt than usual to pay us the little pittance of our dollar and fifty cents each—or have some agents delayed remitting to us the money received for us? Or, (Hope whispers it) have our subscribers generally resolved that our paper is really worth two dollars and fifty cents per annum, and have therefore resolved to wait till the end of the year that they may have an excuse for thus giving us the enhanced price? If the first question is to be answered in the affirmative, may we beg every delaying subscriber to hasten to us the two dollars due on this volume, as early as possible, for we need it. If the second question is the cause, we would solicit agents to remit as soon as they can do so safely, by private conveyance, or by check, or in notes by mail, if the sum can be sent in good paper. ☞ Don't send specie by mail.

But if it is the latter reason, as hope and pride bids us believe, we would respectfully inform some of the generous patrons that two dollars now, are worth more to us in the regular course of our business, than the prospect of two dollars and fifty cents at the close of the year. They may rely upon this as the sober truth—a waking reality.

But if this call will not suffice, and they are determined to be so generous as to pay us two dollars and a half, let them do it now, when it is most needed, and we will place the odd fifty cents to their credit for a future day!

But seriously, we need money now, and "a friend in need is a friend indeed," says the old proverb. Our expenses have been too heavy to allow us to make any deduction for payment at this late day—but we beg every subscriber who has not yet paid for the present volume, to earn the premium of our gratitude, and a good name on our books, by sending us at least some of the NEEDFUL. G. and H.

A NEW HYMN BOOK.

We learn by the Trumpet that B. B. Mussey, of Boston, has just published "A collection of Psalms and Hymns for the use of Universalist societies and families. By Hosea Ballou, 2d." It contains 540 duodecimo pages—636 hymns, besides doxologies, handsomely arranged. Br. Ballou's well known talents lead us to expect an excellent work, and we probably shall not be disappointed. At all events we would like to see a few in this market. A. B. G.

By the Union before the last, we learn with much pleasure that Br. A. C. Thomas will attend our State Convention at Albany on the last day of this month; and by private letter that he will visit this city, and remain here a few days on his journey to the West. Possibly—and if we can prevail on him to do so, certainly—he may be prevailed on to attend the Central Association at Bridgewater, on the first Wednesday in June. A. B. G.

With much pleasure we announce to our readers the return of Br. Skinner, in improved health. He arrived last Sunday evening, and will probably soon make himself heard again through our columns. It may be proper to remark that he received no copy of Mr. Campbell's last letter until his arrival in New-York, last Friday evening. The probable why and wherefore, he will make known himself; we only notice it to account for the delay of his answer thereto. A. B. G.

BOOKS AND STATIONERY.

We are receiving and opening for sale, a small but general assortment of Stationery, School, Scientific, Theological and Miscellaneous Books—including the best collection of works on Phrenology, Education and Universalism heretofore offered in this market—the greater proportion of which we will be able to sell by the dozen, for cash, at the publishers' prices.

As soon as our assortment is filled out, we will publish in an Extra, a list for the information of our agents and ministering brethren. Till then, our friends generally are invited to call and examine for themselves.

Combe on the Constitution of Man, so frequently inquired for lately, can now be had in various bindings, by the dozen, or single. GROSH and HUTCHINSON.

MONEY FOR BOOKS.

Disagreeable as it is, I am obliged to request all indebted to me for books, to assist me by paying for the same at their earliest convenience. Having merged my stock into that of the firm, it is necessary, also, that my individual accounts with both booksellers and purchasers be settled up as soon as possible. More reasons might be given. A. B. GROSH.

RELIGIOUS NOTICES.

There will be preaching on the second Sunday inst., by Br. L. P. LANDERS in German, and at Honesdale at 5 P. M.—Br. FRENCH at Burrville, and at South Champlain at 5 P. M.

There will be preaching on the third Sunday inst., by Br. E. E. GUILD at East Davenport at 11 A. M., and at Davenport Centre at 3 P. M.—Br. BRITTON at Depauville at 10 A. M., at Stone Mills at 3 P. M.—Br. SIAS at the Case school house, Sandy creek, and near Br. Wright's at 5 P. M.—Br. LANDERS in Great Brook Meeting-house, South New Berlin, and near Br. Burlingham's at 5 P. M.—Br. MESSINGER at Canaan, A. M., Prompton, P. M., and at Honesdale at 5 P. M.

There will be preaching on the fourth Sunday inst., by Br. BRITTON in Brownville—Br. J. FRENCH at Field Settlement, and at Talcott's schoolhouse at 5, P. M.—Br. WAGGONER at Newport, instead of Middleville.—Br. W. MARTIN at South Onondaga.

B. W. MARTIN will preach near Br. Foster's, in Cicero, on the evening of the 26th inst.

The Quarterly Conference of the Chautauque Association will be held in Chautauque, Chautauque county, near Br. L. Herrington's, on the last Saturday and Sunday inst. Ministering brethren, etc., are invited to attend.

The following Associations meet in the month of June, on the days and at the places named.

The Central Association (of N. Y.) in Bridgewater, on the first Wednesday and following Thursday.

The Central Association (of Mich.) in Ann Arbor, same days.

The Mohawk Association, in Newport, on the second Wednesday and Thursday.

The Black River Association, in Champion, on the third Wednesday and Thursday.

The Otsego Association, at Burlington Flats, on the fourth Wednesday and Thursday.

The St. Lawrence Association, in Canton, same days.

The Allegany Association, when and where? for we learn that either time or place is to be changed.

The Niagara Association will hold its annual session in the Universalist meeting-house in Clarendon, on Wednesday and Thursday the 7th and 8th of June, next.—The Council will meet in the vestry room of the meeting-house, at 9 o'clock, A. M. Each society within the Association is requested to send two delegates, and the delegates chosen are requested to be punctual in their attendance. Ministering brethren, without partiality, are invited to meet with us, and those especially, who are suspicious of priestcraft or ecclesiastical domination among us. C. HAMMOND, Standing Clerk.

LINES,

Suggested by the anticipated removal of the remains of a distinguished Father,* to the Cemetery of Mount Auburn.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

Ay, build his tomb in twilight shades,
Or where the morning sunlight plays,
And thro' the leaves of green arcades,
Steal in the evening's silver rays—
They'll fall upon the dewy flowers,
And kindle there a vestal light,
To hold the watch of midnight hours,
And keep his grave forever bright.

Ay, build his tomb on sacred dust,
That never feels a reckless tread;
Where genius guards her valued trust—
The great, the good, the gifted dead!
There build the lonely pilgrim's bower—
And let a holy incense rise,
From fragrant leaf and beauteous flower,
To meet his spirit in the skies!

No pomp nor pageantry for him!
No storic monument of woe—
No willow sad, and dark, and dim,
May o'er the great one's ashes grow;
But symbols of unshadowed love
Should rise in beauty from his grave,
And light and peace rest soft above
The last of one who came to save.

REMINISCENCE.

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

How oft my sadd'ning thoughts revert
To joys in distance fading—
My youthful scenes are still my heart
And mem'ry's powers pervading.

O, hallowed days of childhood's bliss!
Can I forget thee? never!
Maternal love—the fond embrace,
With me shall live forever.

Fraternal friendship, truth and joy,
Where pleasures undivided
Gave zest to time, without alloy,
And all, in each confided.

Ah! do I dream, or do I hear
Your voices in the breeze?
Soft, gentle sounds, come ye to cheer
A spirit ill at ease?

Alas! 'tis fancy's wild control,
A vision of the mind,
That back my spirit's thoughts would roll
To years left far behind—

To hearts once warm, now cold and dead;
Their place no more is found—
O'er them, oblivion's pall is spread,
And drawn, her curtains round.

Henderson, March, 1837.

THE TIME TO DIE.

There is a time of sweet repose—
A time to yield our breath
To God, and gently close
Our eyes in silent death.

The time to die—O, happy thought!
Why should we dread the word?
A Saviour on the cross has bought
Our ransom with his blood.

The time to die—why should we fear?
Tis like the shades of even,
A brighter world will be our sphere,
The glorious orb of heaven.

The time to die—O, heed it not,
'Tis God who bids us come,
We're travellers on this dreary spot,
Pilgrims far from home.

NATURAL BRIDGE, VA.

Every body in this vicinity will tell you that the distance from Lexington to the Natural Bridge is twelve miles; but the shortest route is fourteen miles, six of which being supposed to be impassable, in consequence of the superabundance of rain, the driver of my hack, by name Oliver, (a melanchrope of great skill in his art), pursued a route three miles longer. Not being aware of the inconceivable badness of the road, and being naturally averse to early rising, I did not leave Lexington until nine o'clock. Oliver soon horrified me by turning into the road we travelled last evening, and informing me we must pursue it for six miles, and then take a cross road for three miles to get into the direct route. This was bad news, for in a region of bad roads, the cross roads are the worst, and are as bad as the cross women. And indeed, until within two miles of the bridge, the road is so pre-eminently abominable, that it has won to itself the title of purgatory, and like that uncomfortable place, when once in, it requires much whipping to get you out.

Notwithstanding the difficulties of mud and mire, rut and rock, hill and hollow, the skilful Oliver lauded me safe at the house near the bridge, at two, P. M.—A melanthropic guide conducted me immediately down a winding rocky path to the bottom of the deep chasm, in which flows the little stream called Cedar creek, and across the top of which from brink to brink, there still extends an enormous rocky stratum, that time and gravity have moulded into a graceful arch. The bed of Cedar creek is more than two hundred feet below the surface of the plain, and the sides of the enormous chasm, at the bottom of which the water flows, are composed of solid rock, maintaining a position almost perpendicular. These adamantine walls did not seem to me to be waterworn, but suggested the idea of an enormous cavern, that in remote ages may have been covered for miles by the continuation of that stratum of which all that now remains, is the arch of the Natural Bridge. I do verily believe that this stupendous object is the ruin of a cave, one of those antres vast, in which our limestone regions abound, and which perhaps existed previous to the upheaving of our continent, and was tenanted by Naiads, Tritons, and other worthies of the deep.

The first sensation of the beholder is one of double astonishment; first at the absolute sublimity of the scene; next, at the total inadequacy of the description he has read, and the pictures he has seen, to produce in his mind the faintest idea of the reality. The great height gives the arch an air of grace and lightness that must be seen to be felt, and the power of speech is for a moment lost in contemplating the immense dimensions of the surrounding objects. The middle of the arch is forty-five feet in perpendicular thickness, which increases to sixty at its junctions with the vast abutments. Its top, which is covered with soil supporting shrubs of various sizes, is two hundred and ten feet high. It is sixty feet wide, and its span is almost ninety feet. Across the top passes a public road, and being in the same plain with the neighboring country, you may cross it in a coach without being aware of the interesting pass. There are several forest trees of large dimensions growing near the edge of the creek directly under the arch, which do not nearly reach its lowest part.

The most imposing view is from about sixty yards below the bridge, close to the edge of the creek; from that position the arch appears thinner, lighter and loftier. From the edge of the creek at some distance above the bridge, you look at the thicker side of the arch, which from this point of view approaches somewhat to the gothic. A little above the bridge, on the western side of the creek, the wall of rock is broken into buttress-like masses, which rise almost perpendicularly to a height of nearly two hundred and fifty feet, terminating in separate pinnacles which overlook the bridge. It requires a strong head, (perchance a thick skull) to stand on one of these narrow eminences and look into the yawning gulf below.

When you are exactly under the arch, and cast your glances upwards, the space appears immense; and the symmetry of the ellipsoidal concave formed by the arch and the gigantic walls from which it springs, is wonderfully pleasing. From this position the views in both directions are sublime and striking, from the immense height of the rocky walls stretching away in various curves, covered in some places by the drapery of the forest, green and graceful, and in others without a bramble or a bush, bare and blue.

I gazed upon this wondrous scene for an hour and a quarter, a period ten times too short to realize its grandeur; but having before my eyes, (my mind's eyes, Horatio), the fear of a bad road and a moonless night, I forced my reluctant footsteps up the hill, swallowed my mush and milk too hot, with haste, and at half past three began my toilsome travel back to Lexington.

We met some heavy waggons before we arrived at the place to turn off, and Oliver ascertaining that they came by the shortest road, inferred that he could safely return by the same; and by dint of tacking and veering like a ship with a head wind, without moon or lamp, he landed me safe at the Jefferson hotel at nine P. M.

Reader, do not allow the coolness of the neighbors, or the heat of the weather, or the badness of the roads, or the goodness of your equipage, or the inertia of your disposition, or the gravity of your baggage, or the levity of your purse, or the notion of your womankind, or any other creature of any other kind to prevent you from going to see the Natural Bridge; you never saw its like before, and never will you look upon its like again.

MARRIAGES.

At Manchester, April 20th, by Rev. S. R. Smith, Mr. SETH B. MERRICK, to Miss LUCINDA J. CARPENTER.

In Clinton, by the same, April 23d, Mr. JOSEPH S. LANE, to Miss SARAH J. KNAPP.

In Fairfield, May 3d, by the Rev. W. H. Waggoner, GEORGE R. PERKINS, Professor of Mathematics in the Clinton Liberal Institute, to Miss AMY J. ARNOLD, daughter Mr. Thomas Arnold, of the former place.

On the 3d inst., by Asa Vickery, Esq. Mr. GARARDUS HICKS, of Russia, to Miss DORCAS VENTON, of Ohio, Herkimer county.

DEATHS.

In Holley, April 3d, Mr. ASAHEL WELLS, in the 64th year of his age. He possessed his reason to the last, and expressed his willingness to live, or to die. He was a good man, benevolent and kind, and has left a companion and five children, with many friends and relatives to mourn his departure. May they be comforted with the bright hopes of the Gospel. The funeral was attended by a very respectable congregation, who assembled in the Baptist church, on the 5th ult, to whom the writer delivered "the words of truth and soberness." For this and other instances of noble generosity, the Baptists in Holley will receive the gratitude and thanks of the Universalist community. C. H.

In Marshall, April 26th, Mrs. HARRIET HART, aged 41 years. Mrs. H. was the mother of fourteen children, who, by her death, have sustained an irreparable loss. She was an estimable woman—lived in peace and charity with the world, was an exemplary believer in universal salvation, and died in hope of a happy immortality. Com.

In the town of Spafford, Onondaga county, of consumption, on the 19th of March last, Miss ELIZINA E. DAY, aged 19 years and 3 months. Miss Day was a young lady of accomplished manners, an intelligent mind, and a spotless character. For about three years previous to her death, she had been a firm and consistent believer in the cheering faith of the final "restitution of all things," and when brought upon her death-bed, and surrounded by those who wished to shake her confidence in the unlimited grace of her heavenly Father, she remained steadfast and immovable, assuring them that her faith was truly good and consoling in the hour of dissolution, and exhorting her weeping mother to mourn not for her, for she was going where "sorrow and sighing shall be no more known forever."

Her spirit, now, has gone from earth,
To dwell with God, who gave it birth;
To sing, in courts of bliss, above,
"Redeeming grace, and dying love."

H. BOUGHTON,

In Kirkland, April 3d, of scarlet fever, CHARLES MILLS, son of Andrew (Jr) and Marilla Mills, and grandson of Elisha and Cynthia Wetmore, aged 7 years 2 months and 16 days.

At Hartford, Conn., suddenly, on the 19th ult., SARAH, wife of Mr. Haynes Lord, of New-York, and daughter of the late David Porter, Esq., aged 34 years.

THE CAUSES OF INFIDELITY REMOVED.....NO. IV.

BY S. R. SMITH.

OF ATONEMENT.

Next to the doctrine of the trinity in importance, is that of atonement. The one being, in fact, indispensable to the other, according to prevailing opinion. For if it were necessary that such an atonement should be made, as is commonly supposed, it is certain that nothing less than a Deity could accomplish the work, or make the sacrifice. And yet such sacrifice, could it have been requisite to vindicate the Divine justice and secure the everlasting salvation of the human race, would furnish one important reason why some persons must reject it, and thereby fail of ever receiving its benefits. For unless some more consistent view of the divine economy should win them to the faith of the Gospel, they must fall into irreclaimable infidelity.

In view of these consequences, we venture to urge the claims of the doctrine of universal salvation in reference to this subject, upon the attention of unbelievers, as well as upon that of believers in the common doctrine of atonement. It appears to the writer, that Universalism comes in between the prevailing infidelity and the popular plan of atonement, as a reconciling spirit—making peace where perpetual discord reigned, by winning one party to consistency and the other to the obedience of faith. For while it ascribes to Jesus the office of mediator, it supposes that the Deity sent him—not to avert the wrath, but to commend the love of God to man—not to endure punishment in our stead, but to impart to us the true knowledge of God, and lead us to the practice of virtue, that we might no longer deserve chastisement. Universalism does not interpose the Son of God between the divine justice and our final destiny; but makes him the distinguished instrument of teaching us how to comply with the requisitions of eternal equity, and thereby enabling us to enter upon a present salvation by ceasing to sin, and to enjoy a present heaven in the hope of a glorious immortality. In one word—it maintains that atonement consists, not in reconciling God to man, but man to God.

The common doctrine of atonement is simply this—man by transgression had incurred a debt of infinite and endless suffering, to divine justice. This debt it was impossible for him to pay—this suffering he could not endure, and yet be saved. Jesus Christ, therefore, being equal with the Father in wisdom, power and eternity, interposed, took upon him our natures, suffered the penalty of our sins, satisfied the demands of offended and violated justice in our stead; and now claims for his own, all those whom God gave him in the covenant of redemption. Hence by this system, those who are the subjects of atonement and consequently of salvation, are exempted from the just punishment of their sins.

This doctrine is liable to very serious charges for its palpable tendency, as well as to insurmountable objections on account of its inconsistency. And it has probably exerted its full share of influence, in driving men into skepticism or open infidelity. And this, not because it is more absurd than the doctrine of the trinity, or than some others which will be hereafter considered—nor yet because it has less foundation in the Scriptures; but because it is so often dwelt upon, and thrust forward as the all of grace, and the only substantial basis of Christian hope. From the perpetual and great stress laid upon it, one might imagine that it was a paramount object to render the subject so familiar to every mind, that its cruelty and absurdity should be overlooked. Just as intimate acquaintances become insensible to each other's defects, or imperfections.

There are several considerations growing out of this doctrine, which must strike the mind of every reflecting person, as especially incompatible with the character of God, and inconsistent with the plan of his moral government.

1. It supposes that the actual sufferings for sin—infinite sufferings too—are not endured by the guilty who deserved them, but by the supremely innocent Son of God. This is a sad reflection upon the character of the Deity, because it implies that it is a matter of perfect indifference to him, and to the moral attributes of his nature, and to the principles of his administration, who suffers, so long as the whole amount of punishment is endured. It would seem impossible that any man could be serious in thus traducing the divine character, if we had not abundant evidence to the contrary, every where around us, and before our eyes. But how men can permit themselves to ascribe to their heavenly Father, a degree of cruelty which they would never once think of ascribing to man, bad as he is, it is not easy to determine. And should any man endeavor to carry out this doctrine in the government of his family, and punish an innocent and unoffending child instead of the disobedient, the most tenacious believers in its truth would, no doubt, be among the first to exclaim against its absurdity and cruelty.

As the Father of mankind, we can not suppose the Deity indifferent to the influence of his moral government over them. Hence, also, it can not be inferred with any show of propriety, that when punishments must be inflicted, he is indifferent on whom they fall. For as the administrator of eternal equity, he must have motives for the infliction of chastisements which, it may be presumed, might render it inconsistent to punish one in place of another, and especially, one for all. But if there were no obstacles in the way of consistency and propriety, on the supposition that punishment is inflicted on the innocent instead of the guilty and deserving, so far as the Deity, himself, is concerned; still there is at least some difficulty, in reconciling such a course of discipline, with our notions of strict and impartial justice. The nature and principles of justice are eternal and immutable. And they are the same in character, however they may differ in degree, both in God and man. If, then, strict justice in all reason demands the punishment of the guilty—and none but the guilty—on what principle of equity can the innocent be punished, and the guilty spared? Certainly in the eye of reason, this is even more cruel and unjustifiable than those petty inflictions of capricious tyranny, which involve the innocent and the guilty in the same condemnation.

Now, the unbeliever considers it a matter of perfect indifference, as far as equity or consistency is concerned, whether this plan of punishing the innocent for the guilty, be pursued by God or man. And he does, and will regard it in the same light, when falling on the head of Jesus according to the popular doctrine of atonement, as every man would view it when inflicted on an innocent child by a mistaken parent. And however we may regret that such views drive him into the regions of infidelity, it can never be matter of surprise, that his judgment and feelings revolt at the representation which they give of the character of God and the nature of his justice. And he has been led to identify the doctrine of atonement with the truth of divine revelation, by the common consent of the Christian world, which maintained that it was a part, and a very important part of the plan of the Gospel. He therefore rejects the whole, as a barbarous delusion. Such is the conclusion which many have drawn respecting the subject—and such it will continue to be in too many instances, while the common doctrine of atonement is maintained.

2. But this is not all—the belief that the wicked, who are the subjects of atonement, are not, and never will be punished adequately for their sins, has plainly an immoral tendency. Far be it from us to contend, that the believer of this doctrine is necessarily a bad man. We know many of its advocates, whose morality would do honor to a much more consistent theory. But there are those whose natural dispositions are less favorable to virtue, and who will avail themselves of the license furnished by this doctrine, to outrage morality under the expectation of impunity.

It has been already intimated, that among the obvious reasons why Christian morality is so defective, may be reckoned the influence of the doctrines believed. This one of atonement, seems especially calculated to yield that kind of moral liberty, under which hypocrites may perpetrate iniquity without fear of retribution. For however severe they may suppose the punishment of unbelievers, they still maintain that the sins and the merited chastisements of believers are remitted—being imputed to Jesus, who suffered for them on Calvary. They also maintain, that however deeply the believer may involve himself in sins, or however frequent may be his indulgence in them, he is still considered righteous on account of his faith. If this is not offering high inducements to sin, we know of no consideration which could tempt men to transgression. And could Adam in paradise, have understood and believed the modern system of atonement, he would scarcely have needed the aid of the serpent to secure his fall.

Besides, unlike every doctrine and precept of the Gospel of truth, the more firmly this doctrine is believed, the more vitiating and corrupting will obviously be its influence. And as many have believed, and still do believe it, with the full conviction that to do otherwise were to peril the soul, there can be no doubt, that it has appeased the anguish of many a guilty conscience, by the assurance, that the Son of God absolves them from all punishment, by the substitution of his own sufferings. But men of warm temperaments and strong passions, should not be too severely tried with allurements to sin; and we can not but hope that the advocates of the common doctrine of atonement, will reconsider their system, and without sinking into infidelity, find more purifying principles in the Scripture doctrine on that important subject.

That the common doctrine of atonement, is not taught in the Bible, will appear from the following considerations.

1. At the time when the death of Christ first began to be considered as a proper sacrifice—that is, as a substitute for the punishment of fallen men—the advocates of that theory were greatly perplexed to determine to whom the atonement was made. It certainly did not enter into their minds, that the justice of God required—that the Deity could receive the sufferings of Jesus as a proper substitute for those of guilty man. The most distinguished fathers of the church, concluded, therefore, that the sacrifice was made to the devil—the great adversary of the human race. And they argued thus—if mankind, by transgression, had sold themselves to the enemy, the price of their redemption should, of right, be paid to him by whom they were held in bondage. Ridiculous as this opinion is, it possesses one feature far less offensive than the common view of atonement—it ascribes the demand for a vicarious sacrifice, to a being whose character will not suffer in consequence.

Now, if the Scriptures had authorized the common view of atonement, those early Christian fathers could not have entertained the opinion, that the sacrifice and sufferings of Christ, were made to any other than the Deity. All the present elements of the popular doctrine on this subject, were then laid. Christ was supposed to step in between the claim for punishment, and the victim on whom it was to fall—and to endure the sufferings which human nature could not, and yet be saved. Hence, the only important difference between the theory above given, and the prevailing doctrine of atonement, consists in the supposition that the sacrifice was made to a very different being. And it must be evident, that if the Bible had stated any thing definitely respecting a vicarious atonement, so important a part as that which related to the recipient of the sacrifice, would not probably have been omitted. This consideration should induce its present advocates to reconsider the subject, with great attention.

2. Another reason for believing that the Scriptures do not teach the common doctrine of atonement, is contained in the fact, that they do teach what is absolutely incompatible with that theory. Thus, instead of so much as insinuating that Christ came to appease his Father's wrath, they expressly assert that he was sent because God loved the world. Neither is it a Scripture doctrine, that divine justice required a kind or degree of punishment of man, which was in any sense inconsistent with his salvation; or that the death and sufferings of Christ were necessary, in order to make it just for God to save sinners. On the contrary, they are wholly silent on that subject. The Bible is also entirely silent respecting saving us from punishment; but it represents Christ as bearing away our sins, as a physician does our diseases—not by assuming, but by curing or removing them. Finally, instead of teaching that mankind are exempted from punishment because Christ suffered, the Bible asserts in a great variety of intelligible forms, which neither admit of misapprehension nor evasion, that every man shall suffer for his own sins, and according to, or in proportion to their demerit.

In view of the foregoing objections to the common doctrine of atonement, and the certainty that the Scriptures teach a very different system respecting the mission, labors and sufferings of Christ; the Universalist, while he has no faith or confidence in the popular theory, devoutly believes the Bible to be the record of the revelation from God to man. And we are very confident, that his views of this subject must be adopted, before Christians will, as far as the atonement is concerned, be able to defend their opinions against the assaults of skeptics and unbelievers. Indeed, while the latter identify this item of the popular creed, with the doctrines and truths of the Bible, there is every reason to believe that their infidelity will become more and more inveterate and incurable.

If we are correct, and it is believed that enough has been said in the brief view here taken of the subject, to show that we are—then the advocates of the prevailing doctrine of atonement, are to some extent responsible for the infidelity of which they complain. And it is very certain, that a vast majority of modern unbelievers were once, directly or indirectly, connected with the sects which profess that doctrine. This fact, if no other consideration can be adduced with those who maintain a vicarious atonement, should induce them to reflect on this further truth—that it is their own creed, and not the arguments of unbelievers, which has led so many into stark infidelity. We have no pleasure in this remark—it were very desirable that all Christians should maintain no doctrines or opinions, but such as are reasonable, scriptural, and consequently defensible.

In the mean time, we think it must be tolerably plain to the unbeliever, that his objections to the truth of the Bible on the score of the common doctrine of atonement, are unfounded. And if so, then it must be equally clear even to him, that one of his arguments against a divine revelation, proves to be no argument at all—and consequently, that the various inconsistencies, contradictions and abominations with which he is pleased to think the doctrine of atonement overwhelms the Bible, has no relation to that divine book. He may amuse himself with the absurdities of a popular article of certain creeds, but he must recollect that it has nothing to do with the Scriptures of truth. They never required nor authorized the modern system of atonement—nor are they directly or remotely answerable for the mistakes into which Christians may have fallen, respecting that, or any other subject. A duty hence devolves upon the unbeliever—to examine the Bible, as well as the creeds of Christians. And when he is as well informed respecting the doctrines of the Scriptures, as he probably is concerning those of some Christian sects, he will doubtless discover that he was mistaken in his views of the teachings and truth of the Bible.

PERSEVERANCE.

BY REV. J. CHASE.

Numerous and responsible are the moral duties which devolve upon the professed follower of the Son of God. We will only refer to a few of them, and then proceed to a few remarks, designed to inspire the reader with a spirit of manly perseverance in the faithful and prompt discharge of them. Every professed Christian is solemnly bound by the sacred nature of his profession, to be strictly honest in his intercourse and commerce with his fellow-beings. This will not be disputed; for the principle of moral honesty is universally approved and extolled in all the theories of Christendom; yet how prone we are to violate, pervert, and abuse it! All who declare their belief in the Gospel, are also firmly bound by the purity of their faith, to be prudent in every thing they engage in. This we have endeavored to show in a previous article. All who profess to love God, are likewise most sacredly obligated to exercise the spirit of universal charity; for without this Christian grace, every profession, and every exertion to promote and enjoy the blessings of Christianity, will amount to nothing more than an empty sound without substance. Watchfulness is another indispensable duty of Christ's professed friends; for without it, they are in constant danger of being led astray by a numerous host of internal and external foes to their steadiness and their peace.

The above are a few of those moral duties which revelation and reason imperiously require the followers of Christ faithfully to perform. But a spirit of unawed and unflinching perseverance in the discharge of these duties, is the only sure means of securing the blessings promised to obedience and faithfulness.

Without a steady and uniform perseverance, it can not be rationally expected that any important enterprise should be accomplished or crowned with any tolerable degree of success, particularly that valuable enterprise which virtue and truth have engaged in, against superstition, iniquity and falsehood. It has, however, generally been the misfortune of human nature, to run well for a season; but before any thing great, and glorious, and good, could be fully effected and secured, to sink back into apathy, inactivity and indifference, from its own mutability of purpose; or, to give up the contest in despair, and desert the field in the first hot engagement. However, there has ever existed such a thing in the world as steadfastness of character. And truly is it an estimable virtue, and one which seldom fails of securing general confidence, esteem and praise. It is manifestly true, that a manly and well directed spirit of perseverance, accompanied with fortitude and patience, is adequate to the accomplishment of almost any honorable enterprise, even the greatest seeming impossibilities.

As an illustration of the last remark, I would cite the history of the American Revolution. Contemplate for a moment, the veteran and well-disciplined forces of a powerful and popular kingdom, furnished with every necessary means—arms, implements and munitions of war—clothed with royal authority, and rendered invincible by the many splendid victories which had adorned the diadem of their nation's glory. Contemplate them, I say, opposed, out-generalled, overcome, conquered and disgraced in the eyes of the whole civilized world, by the little, untaught, unorganized, unprovided for, and half starved band of spirited patriots, who, without preparation, pecuniary resources, regular discipline or munitions, secured that national freedom and independence, both civil and religious, which we now so richly enjoy, and which the whole world admires. And what but steadfastness of character and undaunted perseverance of action could ever have wrought such a wonder—such a miracle!

From this historical reference it may be clearly seen, that a well-directed perseverance in the cause of liberty, truth and virtue, is absolutely indispensable to the assurance of permanent success. We might enlarge upon this important subject, but our limits forbid it. We would, therefore, only remark in conclusion, that if believers in the Abrahamic faith have any desire to maintain their ground, promote their cause, and extend its salutary influence, they should not forget the momentous importance of unwavering perseverance. They should "press forward toward the mark for the prize," and never be "weary in well-doing."—"No man, having put his hand to the plough and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of heaven." Though they "faint," like the faithful Gideon of old, in promoting the early conquests of Israel, they should still persevere, till their spiritual triumph is complete over false theories and all vicious practices. "Beloved, beware lest ye also, being led away with the errors of the wicked, fall from your steadfastness."

Br. GOSH—I noticed in a late number of the Magazine and Advocate, a request for "short articles" from your correspondents, accompanied with the very just remark, that long articles were much easier written than short ones. Being disposed, therefore, to claim the title of a "correspondent," though one of your poorest,* I have ventured to send you the foregoing, hoping that the hint it contains will prove of some service to my respected brethren in the faith of a world's salvation.

THE CONVERSION.

BY MRS. S. BROUGHTON.

Night reigned in sable gloom. The raven wing of darkness brooded on the waters—the winds were hushed in their quiet caves, and the whisperings of the foliage were stilled. A mother bent over the couch of her only son, watching with intense anxiety the fitful and unquiet slumber that, for a few moments, steeped his senses in forgetfulness; and the burning tears fell fast, as she saw how he was daily wasting away beneath the scorching band of disease. Day after day had she sat by his side, to bathe the burning brow, and soothe, with a mother's tenderness, the ravings of delirium. The watchful stars grew pale in the morning's splendor—but still she trimmed the flickering lamp;—the last glimmering beams of day had faded from the rosy West, and yet she was at her post, with unremitting vigilance, to hold the cordial to his parched lips; and the blest angel of hope, still cheered her with the assurance that he should yet arise from his bed of affliction, to be the stay of her declining years. Nor was her hope in vain.

Sorrow and agony for the loss of a beloved father had laid her child low, and sent the hot blood in eddying circles to his brain, and insanity—wild, fearful insanity followed. His father, too, had been insane; but his was the moody melancholy madness, that settles upon the spirit when the mind becomes convinced that mercy is forever past—that the God of love is a demon of vengeance; terrible for his power, and the hatred which he bears toward his frail earth-born children! And when the shades of night had curtailed half the world in gentle slumbers—while the meridian splendors of night's silver noon bathed in a flood of glory, the glittering spires, and waving woodlands; or played in fitful radiance on the glassy mirrors of the rippling streams—he had left his bed, and his quiet mansion, to calm his troubled soul beneath the starry canopy; or charm away the furies that were busy at his heart. In vain he essayed to lift his thoughts in prayer; the darkening frowns of vengeful justice were ever present to his bewildered imagination; and before the rosy dawn waved her blushing pinions in the East, he lay a clay-cold corpse not far from his own dwelling! He had forced the portals of death, and rushed uncalled, into that unknown country, where gloomy fancy builds her dismal hell, which, by wild fanatics is represented as replete with the untold horrors of undying wretchedness—the enduring agony of the helpless victims of unutterable woe, until the blood chills at the recital, and reason reels for a moment on her throne, and then flies forever!

As the mother watched beside her son, while the world was mantled in gloom, a voice seemed to whisper, "Is this the fruit of religion? Has the proclamation ceased to be, 'peace on earth, good will to men'? In the times of the holy record, religion brought 'peace and joy in the Holy Ghost;' now it scatters 'firebrands, arrows, and death.'"

Thus mused the sorrowing mother while the son sank into a sweet and quiet repose. Anxiously did she gaze upon his pallid brow; she knew the crisis in his disease had arrived, and she tried to school her heart into resignation, should it be her lot to yield him up to the fell destroyer. But oh, there was bitterness in the thought; for he had never manifested that miraculous change which she thought necessary for his eternal weal! Soon he awoke, and opened his languid eyes upon her, and her heart thrilled with joy as she saw the light of intelligence in their gaze. He pointed to the Bible—she opened and read to him from the sweet Psalmist of Israel. "Mother," he whispered, "does it say that 'the Lord is good unto all, and his tender mercies over all his works'?"

"Yes, my son."

"Then I shall have no more fears for my father," replied he; "for it says again, that his mercy and his lovingkindness endureth forever."

Reader, if perchance you are a Partialist mother, what would you do in a situation like this? Would you still the tremulous breathings of hope, that vibrated in healing tones upon his heart-strings? Would you shroud in terrific darkness the beamings of its silver star? She could not! Affection's holy strength prevailed; she still continued to read to him from the oracles of truth, and before he was recovered they both rejoiced, that their feet were set upon the Rock of Ages; and that they had learned a new song, even the song of redeeming love!

The young led the aged, and they went up to the temple of the Lord, singing praises to his name, that the light of his glory had illumined their path, while they sat in the valley and the shadow of death. The veil had been taken away, and they saw in the dim vista of the future, a glorious immortality beyond the dark regions of death.

INFINITY OF SIN.

The advocates of endless misery, adhere with a peculiar tenacity to the infinity of sin. And well they may; for otherwise, their whole fabric of endless wretchedness falls to the ground. Unless they can make it appear that transgression is infinite, it is folly to talk of endless punishment, as a penalty of sin.

It is said that the magnitude of sin depends on the being against whom we transgress. Hence, as we sin against God, or against the laws which he hath established for our observance, we are infinite sinners.

All sin is committed in opposition to the command of God; therefore, according to the foregoing reasoning, all sin is infinite; which destroys the possibility of degree in crime. He who burns your house is no deeper in guilt, than he who plucks an apple from your orchard; unless there be a greater than an infinite.

But it is contended that, because God is infinitely great and good, it is infinitely wicked to transgress against him. Then, because General Washington was a greater and better man than his servant, it would have been as much greater sin to steal his hat, than that of his servant, as he was the greater and better of the two.

Let us follow this mode of reasoning a little farther, and see where it will lead us. St. Paul was a very great and good man; therefore, it would have been a very great crime to have stolen his cloak, though he may have had fifty others. The poor lame beggar, who lay at the gate Beautiful of the temple, was remarkable neither for his greatness nor goodness; therefore it could hardly be called sin to have stolen the only coat the unfortunate man possessed. The traitor Judas, who betrayed his Master, was a servile, wicked man; therefore to have stolen a garment of his, would have been a virtue! What thinkest thou, reader?

GOD'S TRUE CHARACTER.

It has frequently been a matter of wonder to me, how people could be content with the views they entertain of the divine character. I now allude to those who believe the Deity will punish some of his children eternally. They can not call it a parental chastisement to those who are thus punished, because it is the opposite of every thing their own hearts concede to be parental. But notwithstanding this, they are zealous in attaching that character to God which will accord with such infinite inflictions. It can not be matter of deduction from their knowledge of what is fatherly, and in accordance with goodness and justice; neither is it true that they love the character they give to God. Still they persevere in affixing it upon him. Hence, it is a truth, that Partialism has no tendency to move the inquirer to search for loveliness, benevolence, and parental goodness. It denies those attributes upon which parental kindness and loveliness are based. It seeks not to robe the God of heaven in that which, and which only, can attract the heart of man and enlist his affections; but puts into his omnipotent hand a sword of wrath and eternal vengeance, and gives to him a spirit to wield it, repulsive to every feeling of the better part of the human heart.

And when these persons are reminded, by Universalists, of the cruel character they attach to God, they respond by saying—"Well, if your doctrine be true, it is just as well—beside we stand two chances in believing the doctrine of endless punishments."

They seem to view it as a matter of entire indifference what character they attach to him. Yet they teach, or ought to teach that such a course toward sinful fellow-men would be highly evil in morals. Is it a matter of no consequence what we think of a neighbor's character? Is it right to believe and teach, or report the character of a truly good man to be cruel, unjust, unmerciful and wicked? Is it right to say of a parent who loves all his children, and makes provision for all their wants, that he is a vindictive creature, and will burn up part of his children, or whip them to death?

Shall we think evil? Yet will not our thoughts be evil (erroneous) unless they are in accordance with truth?

Suppose a family of children, whose parent is absent from them, have various opinions of their father and introduce the subject of his character as matter of conversation. Some say, "we believe our father is full of wrath, and will make some of his children miserable on his return home, as long as they live, if he shall find they have disobeyed him." Others say, "No—no, he will not. He will provide for all the wants of his children, through their lives, although he will adequately punish his children for their disobedience—you attach a wrong and cruel character to our father, in supposing he can make his children miserable for life, when his kind and parental heart forbids it." "Well," reply the others, "if your belief is true, it will be just as well for us, and we can believe our father to be a monster as well as any wise, for we are sure of his blessings and protection."

So it is—Partialism arrests the mind in its researches for that which is parental, glorious and lovely; and lulls it into content in attaching to our Father in heaven, a character which is cruel, monstrous and vindictive. But how people can be content with such views, is to me a matter of wonder. I think the better opinion is always to be sought for and desired. VERITAS.

The following letter from this gentleman in reference to a statement noticed in it, we give to our readers at its writer's request.

EDITORS.

Skaneateles, May 9, 1837.

Messrs. EDITORS, GENTLEMEN—The announcement, made by the "Trustees of the First Universalist society of Hamilton and vicinity," respecting my "conduct and character," contained in your paper of the 21st ult., would have had an earlier notice than this, had I observed it sooner than I did. Lest mistaken conclusions might be formed, I have now merely to write—that I consider that article an untrue and unfair statement. In due time, before other judges—persons who may not be influenced by sectional feelings, from other data than an ex parte statement, and before another tribunal than public opinion, the said "trustees," etc., etc., may have occasion to substantiate or retract what they have published respecting me. Their announcement will be, no doubt, detrimental to me and my interests, at least for a time; but I yet hope, yea even believe, that, through the Divine mercy and goodness, I shall obtain a support for myself and family, notwithstanding the exertions of the above trustees, together with the efforts of their prompters and coadjutors.

ANOTHER LABORER.

Brs. GROSH and HUTCHINSON—I am happy to inform you and the numerous readers of your paper, that we were interested and delighted, last Sunday afternoon, at our place, by a discourse from Br. WILLIAM HULINGER, who has lately commenced preaching the faith which God preached to Abraham, and with whom I have been acquainted for a few months, and who has formerly been a physician, of respectable standing in his profession. He has wholly discontinued his medical practice, to devote himself entirely to the ministry. Br. H. is possessed of good mind, and promises well as one of the helps in Zion. His labors were well received, both here and in other places where he has labored, and his whole soul is in the work.—God grant him all needed aid in his high calling.

A GRAND-FATHER'S LETTERS TO HIS GRAND-CHILDREN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

LETTER FIFTH.

MY DEAR CHILDREN—I have received with much satisfaction your conjoint epistle. I approve very much of your proposed plans of study and improvement; both those which you propose to pursue in communion, and those which the eldest among you are to pursue by yourselves. To your request that I should accompany you in your studies, by furnishing you with such hints and illustrations as I was wont to address to you personally, I will cheerfully respond.

You inform me that you have determined to exercise your minds upon, at least, one verse or short paragraph of the New Testament, every day this year, and that you are to talk over, among yourselves, the daily subject every evening. You will, I doubt not, be often tempted to forget this daily task, but resist and overcome the first temptations that would withdraw you from your assigned tasks, and having thus acquired and strengthened the power to resist and overcome difficulties, and feeling the confidence and pride of successful combatants, you will find that former difficulties less seldom occur, and that temptations to swerve from the path of right and duty become more and more feeble in their assaults, and at last, flee before you.

I will endeavor to keep pace with you in your progress through the New Testament, and will forward to you a summary or outline of such remarks as I would address to you, in greater detail, were you here present with me. And, first, I will give you a few prefatory or preliminary remarks which tend to elucidate the whole Gospel or narrative by Matthew, before making any remarks upon particular passages of the history.

Let us attend, first, then, to what is known of the writer. In speaking of himself he calls himself Matthew (ix: 9); Mark calls him Levi, the son of Alphaeus (ii: 14); and Luke calls him Levi (v: 27). Probably the former was his common name before he joined the company of the disciples; the latter, afterwards. Though a Jew, he followed an occupation much detested and despised by the Jews—that of a collector of custom-house taxes. The reasons of this hatred and contempt, I may mention now as appropriately as at any other time. The knowledge of them will throw light upon many passages of the Evangelical (or, good-news-telling) historians, and especially on such as mention publicans and sinners together, and such as record the surprise of the Pharisees at Jesus, on account of his associating with these—the lowest classes among the Jews. Take your maps and observe the outlines of that part of Syria, in Turkey in Asia, which is called Palestine or the Holy Land. It is bounded, you will observe, by Phœnicia and Cœlo-Syria on the north; by Arabia Deserta on the east; by Arabia Petrea, on the south; and on the west by the Mediterranean, or as it is called in the Bible, the Great Sea. The country thus bounded comprises Judea, Samaria, Galilee, Iturea and Perea. All this country was conquered and taken possession of by the Romans in the time of Pompey, and at the time of the birth of Jesus, was a Roman province, with Herod as Governor. The country and people were therefore subject to the laws of the Romans, as were the United States subject to the laws of Great Britain previously to their emancipation from a colonial or provincial condition. Like all other countries in a similar condition, it was made to yield a tribute of its property and labor to the superior power which held it in a subjugated and colonial condition. All people, as well as those of Judea, and our own forefathers, dislike this parting with their property to a foreign potentate, and those persons who are employed in collecting the tribute or taxes share in this dislike, and become obnoxious to those who have to pay. Even the collectors of taxes for our own governments are not very acceptable or agreeable visitors; how much less so, those who are employed to exact exorbitantly and for the use of a government which tyrannises, or treats its people as mere slaves! Some of you, probably, may here be reminded of an illustration of this common state of feeling towards publicans or tax-gatherers, (as telonia ought to be rendered) which occurs in the Chronicles of the Canongate. Mrs. B. Baliol, had her loyalty insulted and her ire excited, by some persons suggesting to her to make some alteration in her habitation which would save her some seemingly supernumerary taxation. Indeed she was punctiliously loyal, even in that most staggering test of loyalty, the payment of imposts. She ordered her butler to offer to the person who collected her taxes, a glass of wine, and Sir Walter tells us that the poor man was so overcome by a reception so unwontedly generous, that he had well nigh fainted on the spot. From the subjugated and tributary state of the Jewish people, and from the general dislike to payment of taxes, you will understand, in part, the obnoxiousness of the Roman tax-collectors. To these causes may be added their not unfrequent yielding to the temptations of bribery and corruption—to aggrandize themselves at the expense of their employers. They were liable also to exceed in their demands, and to make the people pay more than the Roman government had imposed. There was a law enacted by the Roman government to prevent or punish this extortion and oppression of collectors, requiring that they should restore four-fold, upon conviction and judgment obtained. Such were the causes that contributed to the infamy and disgrace which attached to the characters of the collectors of Roman imposts from the Jewish people.

All that we know of Matthew, beside the fact of his being a Jew and a tax-gatherer under the Romans, is derived from what is narrated by himself and the other Evangelists in the parallel passages, and in the Acts of the apostles. It amounts to the following. While employed at the custom-house (telonium) in Capernaum, on the sea of Galilee, (see your maps) he was invited by Jesus to accompany him, that he might be a witness of his words and works. He obeyed this invitation, and became one of the twelve apostles. With the other apostles, we learn, he was at Jerusalem, after the ascension of Jesus, until the day of Pentecost. That he, a few years after this, wrote his memoir of the life of Jesus, concludes all we know about Matthew.

The time of writing this Gospel is generally believed to have been about A. D. 37 to 40 or 41. Some think it must have been as late as 68, but the circumstances of the persons written to, seem to correspond so well with the circumstances of the Jews about the former period, as to make the greater probability rest upon the side of those who have fixed upon the earlier date. Some of these circumstances will be detailed in my next or a succeeding communication.

About the language in which this Gospel was written, there has been some variety of opinion. Some think Matthew wrote it in Hebrew; some, in Greek; and some again think he wrote it in both, in Hebrew first, for the use of the Jews and Samaritans; and afterwards in Greek, for the use of those not acquainted with the Hebrew language. There is, I believe, at this day, very little doubt that this Gospel was originally composed in Hebrew. Whether the version into Greek was made by Matthew himself or by some other person, is not known. By those who incline to suppose Matthew the author of the Greek version, it is alleged that it was not uncommon for writers of that age to write in two different languages, and that Josephus, a contemporary of Matthew, wrote his history of the Jewish wars both in Hebrew and Greek. No copy of the Hebrew original has ever been discovered, and there is no improbability in the supposition that the translation into Greek was made by another hand.

These preliminary remarks will be resumed in my next or an early communication.

Your amiable and highly intelligent instructor, in former days, is deceased. I was present at his funeral to pay another tribute to the estimable and amiable qualities of head and heart which poor N— possessed. Some of you will recollect a maxim often in his mouth,—“De mortuis nil nisi bonum.” The clergyman who officiated, seemed uninfluenced by this maxim of a heathen, as well as by Christian charity which “thinketh no evil,” and made another exemplification of the saying,

“The evil that men do lives after them,
The good is oft interred with their bones.”

With the words, “It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God,” for a text or motto, he made such a discourse respecting the ever-during agonies of those who die impenitent, (i. e. without making an open profession of religion,) and such a personal application of his remarks to the highly respected deceased, as was truly revolting, harrowing, disgusting to the feelings of his acquaintances; how much more to his widow and relations! Good taste and the feelings of humanity outraged by a harsh and antiquated creed! Peace to his ashes! Adieu.

BENEFITS OF ADVERSITY.

BY REV. C. SPEAR.

“A smooth sea never made a skilful mariner; neither do uninterrupted prosperity and success, qualify for usefulness or happiness. The storms of adversity, like the storms of the ocean, arouse the faculties, excite the invention, prudence, skill and fortitude of the engager. The martyrs and confessors of ancient times, in bracing their minds to outward calamity, acquired a loftiness of purpose, a moral heroism that was worth a life of softness and security.”

In the present, imperfect scene, man could not bear uninterrupted prosperity. More persons are destroyed by luxury and idleness, than by starvation and toil: more by fashion and excess than from want of clothing. It is a mistake, that the poor and laboring classes suffer most. But the great object in view now is, to show that even the afflictions of life are designed by the great Author of our being, as blessings.

We know every thing by contrast. We should never enjoy the pure and lovely sunshine, were it not that it is sometimes concealed from us by clouds and darkness. So in human life. We must have the tempests and storms of affliction, in order duly to appreciate the blessings of Providence. Most men look at grief unassociated with its grand and beautiful results. All the afflictions of God are designed as means to further one great end; that end is the happiness of the whole moral and intellectual creation. Hear the apostle:—“Furthermore, we have had fathers of our flesh, which corrected us, and we gave them reverence; shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of spirits and live? For they, verily, for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure, but he for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness. Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby.” Here the apostle recognizes the great principle, which it is the design of this article to maintain. Those who have had the most correct views, have uniformly looked at the government of God in the same light. A charming writer, in allusion to a father on a bed of sickness, says, “* * * All that our mere eyes behold, then, is grief.—But do our hearts, when our eyes are thus occupied with an aspect of evil, see nothing more? Do they not look beyond the moment, and perceive virtue present as truly as sorrow, and diffusing her better influence, which is not to be lost, even when the grief has passed away? The little bosoms around that bed, have already acquired a benefit of which they are not conscious; and even when this hour is not present to them, the gentleness of this hour will still remain. There will be a quicker disposition to feel for others what they themselves have suffered,—a warmer love for those who have wept with them together; a patience, more ready to endure, from the remembrance of that venerable form, who, in resigning his spirit to God, resigned with meek submission to the same Almighty care the happiness of many, whose happiness, far dearer to him than his own, was the last object which earth presented to his thought.* This subject is full of beauty and variety, and, like other moral subjects has no limits, and therefore, we leave the reader to his own contemplations.

EXPERIMENTAL TRUTH.

BY BETA.

The die is cast—your damnation is sealed up;—never mind it!—be of good cheer—go away into everlasting burnings!!! Such is the taunting, triumphant language of the Partialist, in view of his own goodness, and of the certain destruction of those, who guided by truth, turn a deaf ear to his false pictures of God's designs, in damning the soul to all eternity; because, forsooth they differ from him, in the belief, that the most High is not the partial Saviour and the Redeemer merely of a few favored ones; but that benevolent Being, whose goodness is extended over all his works, and who, in the fulness of time, after having purified and purged mankind from the contaminating influences of sin, and the dross of earth, will bring them to the full enjoyment of himself in glory.

I never look back upon such sentiments and such feelings, as those cherished by Partialists, but with regret and pity. They were to me the worm-wood and gall of my youth. But they were ultimately the means of leading my mind into those views of divine truth, which have since appeared in my writings. They excited me to read, and think, and pray with more earnestness, than I should have done without them; and if I have judged or written to any advantage since, it was in consequence of what I then learned by bitter experience, and in the midst of many tears and temptations.

I am aware that truth convinces the understanding—motive affects the heart—and the spirit overcomes the will. The great cause, I believe, why truth has produced so little effect, is that its power has been greatly weakened by human devices. Through the influence of Partialism, truth has been eclipsed—conscience stupefied—and the heart allured by unscriptural motives. Truth and conscience are the two great ruling powers in the moral world. Hence the well-being of society requires, that they should be kept constantly in the clearest light. And that man who is the instrument, in giving these chief elements of power the freest action upon the human mind, renders the most important service to his fellow-men.

I consider mere success not full proof of the truth of any creed. The aim of a system, and the quality, rather than the quantity of its success, constitute the proof of its goodness. I premise then, that the design of Universalism—of evangelical truth, is to overturn the empire of sin in the human heart, and to build up in its place the kingdom of righteousness—to make the proud, humble—the sottish, active—the revengeful, meek—the selfish, generous—and the impious, devout; and that it is destined to survive the vicissitudes of opinion, and descend as a rich blessing to future generations.

BRIEF COMMENTS.

BY REV. T. J. TENNEY.

"Then said Jesus again unto them, I go my way, and ye shall seek me, and shall die in your sins: whither I go ye can not come."—John viii: 21.

He had said this before to the same class of people, (John vii: 33, 34;) and he afterwards repeated it to his own disciples, (John xiii: 33.)

The most important questions that occur to us are—1st, What is the meaning of the Saviour's declaration, "shall die in your sins"? and 2d, of the declaration, "Whither I go ye can not come"?

The death mentioned is generally supposed to be that of the body, which shall be attended with all the sins of life through the boundless ages of eternity; but with all deference to the talents of the learned theologian who may have come to this conclusion, we must say it corresponds not with our ideas, nor with the Scriptures of divine truth.

A careful reading of the contexts, with other portions of the word of God, will show the death to be spiritual—a death in sin—in unbelief.—This was the peculiar situation of the Jews to whom the declaration was particularly made: for they disbelieved in him who says, "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins."

But can this be said of the "little children" to whom Jesus addresses himself? Certainly not to the same extent, but if they comprehended fully the reign of the Saviour, why the fall of Judas! of Peter? why the unbelief of Thomas? Indisputably, for the want of a correct knowledge of the length and breadth of the spiritual kingdom of God.

"Whither I go ye can not come"—why? Because of unbelief, for if ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins," i. e. in darkness—in doubt. Your visions and hopes are of the earth—earthly. The Jews said, "Will he kill himself? because he saith, Whither I go ye can not come." But Jesus answered, "Ye are from beneath; I from above: ye are of this world; I am not of this world."

Peter said, "I will lay down my life for your sake." "Wilt thou?" saith the Saviour, "Verily, verily I say unto thee, the cock shall not crow till thou hast denied me thrice."

Poor human nature was too weak to reach the glorious truth, that, it was necessary for Jesus to go to the Father, that the kingdom might be made ready for the reception of the promised possession. And shall it even be so? No—no—for Jesus saith to Peter, "Thou shalt follow me afterwards"—Paul saith of the Jews, "All Israel shall be saved"—God says, "All shall know me from the least to the greatest"—and John saith, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." Ay, behold him, reader, and thou shalt live and be with him even now. Thy faith shall carry thee from earth and its vanities to the courts of heaven, when thou shalt already bask in the enlivening rays of divine love, and be "Filled with the fulness of God."

TO PHILIP.

DEAR BROTHER EVANGELIST—I perceive, by a late communication of thine, that thou hast taken exception to my "Dream," as if one was accountable for dreams. Thou shouldst have preferred thy complaint to Somnus or Morpheus. If "dreams were ne'er indicted treason," yet it seems they are liable to be indicted slander; and we poor dreamers must learn circumspection.

If thou wilt re-peruse my article, thou wilt find that I "was informed" in regard to the vocation of said equestrian. The title "Evangelist" was one his own friends had given him; and considering the etymology of the term, it was undoubtedly a great misnomer. With respect to his itinerancy, "I inquired his residence," and learned very naturally, in answer, that he was itinerant.

I am much at a loss to discover how the mere mention of one's vocation, by way of description, can be rationally construed as "holding up to ridicule" all who follow said vocation. Another of "the personages described" in my article, was "a silk merchant." Now if every body was as captious as thou seemest, brother, Br. Grosh, might be flooded with a ream of communications from Pearl-street, calling on me to explain myself in "holding up to ridicule" all who vend the fabric so dear to all the ladies. "I have never learned that silk merchants are any more generally unworthy men than the venders of woolen or cotton commodities," one would say; "why then hold even the name up to derision?"

Paul once said that a certain coppersmith had done him much evil, and gave out some unfavorable insinuations concerning him. Suppose all the coppersmiths in Asia Minor had taken offence, and called on Paul for an explanation, for "holding up to derision" all their craft. Would it not have been laughable?

One word more. I am represented in thy communication, as having mounted said "itinerant evangelist" on a steed "shod with steel shoes, corked with gun-flints." The word corked being italicised, in thy article, some readers would get the impression that thou hadst thought me guilty of a solecism. In the first place, the word corked did not occur in my article; and in the second place, if it had occurred, it would have been no solecism, but in accordance with general usage and the authority of Webster. "But, perhaps, there is some error of the press here."

In conclusion, I will inform thee, Br. Philip, that instead of wishing to "hold up to derision" either the office or name of an evangelist, I have great veneration for both. I have been, myself, ordained an evangelist. We have one beloved brother most tenacious of the name "Evangelist," whose praise is in all the churches, and who has slain the Goliath of Marion. If this be thy vocation, mayst thou go on itinerating and evangelizing; and mayst thou be as successful in every tour, as when thou journeyedst from Jerusalem towards Gaza. To speed thee in this work, thou shalt ever have the prayers of thy brother,

APOLLOS.

P. S. When I make another random shot, in my sleep, at the opposers of truth, do not consider thyself aimed at, unless thou findest inscribed upon one of the arrows, "To Philip's right eye."

UTICA, FRIDAY, MAY 19, 1837.

RETURN FROM THE SOUTH.

Our readers have seen, by our last week's paper, my journal at the South, up to about the time I left Richmond, Va. Since then nothing very remarkable, or worthy of particular notice has occurred with me, and I shall therefore not detain the reader with a long story about nothing.

I left Richmond on the day proposed—Wednesday, 27th ult.—and proceeded by steam boat to Norfolk where I arrived at 4 o'clock, P. M., same day—crossed over the Elizabeth river to Portsmouth, lying on the opposite side, and stopped with our venerable friend, Col. D. Watts, to whom I had a letter of introduction. With him and his kind family I spent most of the time till Sunday.

Portsmouth, lying on the west side of the river, has a population of about five or six thousand, and is on the whole a very pleasant borough. Here are one of the best Navy yards, and one of the most splendid dry-docks in the United States, with a number of large vessels building and repairing—many hands being necessarily employed in these indispensable national services.—Here too, is a very splendid and commodious marine hospital under excellent regulations, calculated to accommodate many hundreds of sick seamen whenever necessity requires. At present, there are about sixty invalids in it. This place must ever be of great importance to the American navy, as it is connected with one of the best and safest harbors on the continent.

Norfolk, situated on the eastern side of the river, is a city of some ten or twelve thousand inhabitants, and is a place of considerable commercial importance, being the principal seaport town in the old Dominion. It lays low and flat, is rather irregularly laid out, but being mostly surrounded with salt water, is generally considered healthy, and is chosen as the residence of many wealthy individuals who have retired from business and public life, especially sea captains and naval officers.

I preached at Norfolk on Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, and at Portsmouth on Friday evening and Sunday morning, in the court-houses of the respective places. The congregations were respectable for numbers, at each of the services: but what to me at least, seemed quite remarkable, there were few or no ladies present—none at Norfolk, and at Portsmouth only two the first service, and they so frightened at being found alone, that they fled soon after the commencement of the service. At the second meeting there were three, who, to their great credit, had nerve sufficient to remain to the close of the meeting. I would fain have informed the ladies, could I have got them together so as to have had a hearing, that it was not unfashionable at the North, for even the ladies to be found on the side of benevolence and liberality. The circumstance, however, of the ladies not attending our meetings at Norfolk and Portsmouth was a full confirmation of the fact, which I learned on inquiry, that there has never been any regular or stated preaching of our doctrine, for any length of time, in those places. For wherever these privileges have been enjoyed, we have not failed of having a fair proportion of our congregations composed of females. There have only been a few of our preachers through these places, who, as they transiently passed, at different times, gave from one to half a dozen lectures and then were gone, so that the people hear no more of the doctrine for years. But I have no doubt that a competent preacher located here, would soon gather one of the largest congregations in the place, and be amply sustained in his constant devotion to the preaching of the word.

I had intended leaving Norfolk on Monday by packet, direct for New-York. But I find there is very little reliance to be placed in the advertisements of these coasting packets as to the time of starting. For instead of sailing on Monday, we did not get started till about noon on Wednesday, May 3. The captain (Bedell) of the packet schooner "Kempton," in which I sailed, having waited two days for the purpose of increasing his number of passengers, by taking in about fifteen sailors just discharged from the U. S. brig Brandywine. This circumstance added not a little to the vexation of myself and the five or six other passengers, previously engaged. For we were thus not only delayed two and a half days in our passage, but annoyed by the merry-making and noise of the sailors on the way. However, we had no remedy, and submitted quietly to our lot. We had, after, getting under way, a tolerably quick and pleasant passage, and reached New-York on Friday night about sunset, without any remarkable occurrence upon the ocean. As was to have been expected, I was a little sea-sick on the way; but that was I apprehend, no detriment to my health.

I left New-York on Saturday evening at five o'clock, by the steamboat "Rochester," thinking to reach home on Sunday in season to attend meeting in the afternoon; but by some unaccountable delay in the rail road cars between Albany and this city, we did not arrive till between three and four o'clock; of course, not in season for divine service. I was, however, very glad to find my desk supplied by Br. Grosh. I had the happiness of finding my family and friends generally, in comfortable health on my return. As to my own health, it was much improved in general while at the South, and I was coming home much elated with the same: but unfortunately for me, by the sudden change on Saturday evening, from extreme heat to extreme cold, (and perhaps some carelessness on my part,) I took a new and severe cold, which has given me great hoarseness, considerable soreness of the throat, and nearly laid me up for several days. However, whether I shall be obliged to go to the South again for my health, before the return of the genial season of Summer to this cold and chilling region, I know not.

As hope is the balm of life, I indulge the pleasing expectation of being soon in the enjoyment of good health again, and able to attend to the duties of my station. And for all past and present blessings which a kind Providence has showered upon me, I return to Heaven unfeigned gratitude and praise. D. SKINNER.

P. S. The foregoing was intended for our last number, but was crowded out.

BIBLE SOCIETY.

Whether any other than our own misnamed American Bible Society makes great professions of liberality, unsectarianism, etc., merely to break them, we know not—but certainly the Bible society named below have proved themselves as ignorant of the doctrines contained in the Book they profess to circulate, as they have shown themselves bigotted and illiberal to a denomination of fellow-Christians.

One word more. We copy the following from the Brockville (Upper Canada) Recorder, a secular, political paper, where it appears as a communication. From what I have seen of the Canadian papers, they appear more independent in admitting occasional articles in defence of the religious reputation or freedom of any denomination, than similarly situated papers in the States. The abolitionism advocated by an Editor in Bradford county, Pennsylvania, is much needed—he goes for the emancipation of newspaper Editors from slavery of public opinion! Such an emancipation is needed in many cases, in order to allow the persecuted, slandered and unjustly condemned to be heard—but so long as so many Editors are supported rather for their servility than their honesty, the day is distant when it will become general.

Merrickville, 27th March.

MR. EDITOR—By giving the following a place in your respected journal, you will confer a favor upon a numerous class of its readers.

To the Rev. William Smart and Joseph Wenham, Esqrs.

GENTLEMEN—On looking over the report of the Brockville Auxiliary Bible Society, published in No. 13 of the Brockville Recorder, 1837—we find the following report made by you, relative to the Merrickville Branch Bible Society, "that nothing had been done within the last year, and that you considered the station a highly important one, from the prevalence of the anti-scriptural heresy of Universalism, and therefore recommended it to the care of the future committee." Now, gentlemen, do you think you were in possession of that charity which hopeth all things, at the time you gave in this Report? have you made yourselves acquainted with the doctrine of Universalists? are you aware that they take that precious book which you are so anxious to disseminate, as the rule and guide of their faith and practice? Did you wish to impress the public with an idea that we as a Christian body, are hostile to the principles inculcated by the ever blessed Gospel.

Did you know that Universalists teach mankind to love God, with all their heart, soul, strength and might, and their neighbor as themselves?—Would it not have been more compatible with the character of Christian ministers to have proved us heretics before condemning us as such, "for after the way which ye call heresy, so worship we the God of our fathers, believing all things which are written in the Law and in the Prophets."

We do not say there are such characters in Merrickville, as described in Revelation xxi: 8; but this we do assert without the fear of being successfully contradicted, that should such be found in our little village, they are not in the ranks of Universalists.

Would you be so kind as to enjoin it upon your committee, at their next annual visit to pay a little attention to this hint, and furnish the readers of the Recorder with a correct report.

We are led to believe that the same spirit which influenced John Calvin, the Genevan reformer, when he persecuted the innocent Michael Servetus to death for heresy, gained the preponderance over your better judgment, while you were preparing the afore-mentioned report. We hope we shall not be thought uncharitable in thus interrogating you, for we do believe your unfounded assertion is more an error of the head than of the heart.

It is our exalted privilege to be persecuted for the cause of Christ, and with an apostle to suffer reproach because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, but we hope to live down or outlive mere assertions and thus put to silence the vituperation of the slanderer.

As for you reverend gentlemen, we entertain much respect, and are sorry we are necessitated to make these remarks, but we believe we are called hereto, from a sense of duty, and we trust that if at any future period we should be called upon to give a reason for the hope within us, we shall do it with meekness and fear.

We remain, reverend gentlemen, yours respectfully,

B. R. CHURCH.

THOMAS GOFF.

On the part of the Universalist society of Merrickville.

REV. ALIHU BORDMAN.

I noticed this gentleman in volume 6, p. 247, by merely calling for information respecting him, and various reports concerning him, and concluded by saying, that if those reports were correct, the subject of them is a dangerous man. On page 309, I published a letter from Mr. Bordman in reply to my interrogatories, and in defence of his character against the charges rumor made against it, and prefaced said letter with a very few remarks, in explanation and defence of my course on the subject.

I have now before me two letters on the same subject—the first from a gentleman in Utica, Michigan, the second from a ministering brother, residing in Genesee county, this State. The substance of both will be given, from which our readers must draw their own conclusions.

Dr. Schetterly, the writer of the first letter, animadvert with great severity on my conduct in the affair, and speaks as if I had charged Mr. Bordman with being guilty, etc. I made no charges, but merely stated reports and called for information. He thinks I would not have done so, if Mr. B. had belonged to an associated body. But I would have forwarded those statements to that body for information—so that I have not answered his queries in the negative, nor afforded proof that religious associations lead to persecution. I did not either persecute or denounce Mr. Bordman, unless a call for information can be called such. As a public man—an Editor—I did my duty, and feel an approval of conscience for the act, though I may regret some unforeseen consequences that will attend my doing it. So much for myself—now for the letter.

Dr. Schetterly says—"I have made numerous inquiries respecting his character, conduct and standing in society, wherever an opportunity offered and he was supposed to be best known; and the result is, that his moral conduct is altogether unimpeachable. Nor have I alone been busy in this matter. Ephraim Calkin Esq., and Rev. Thomas Wheeler, men whose veracity is unquestionable, bear me out in the above assertion."

"There are also living in this vicinity, Methodists of respectable standing, who 'know Mr. Bordman well,' and who say that the charges you have published against him are false; and have been publicly contradicted by their own denomination."

"When your publication appeared against Mr. Bordman, he considered it necessary to return and face his accusers. He then had a little home of his own, which he converted into money to defray his expenses to York State; whence he returned about a year ago, and arrived at my house, just as the weather was breaking up, in an almost destitute and forlorn situation; having travelled the whole distance on foot, and injured his health, so that he is not able to preach steadily, though he has a wife and child depending upon his exertions for bread."

One or two remarks here. It is evident that Mr. Bordman himself did not consider me one of "his accusers," for he never met me "face to face." Also—that his meeting his accusers has produced no published results, with which to meet the reports circulated respecting him. It also appears singular that so much travel (more fatiguing and expensive, too, than was necessary, if any journey was necessary) should have been made for no purpose, as the event appears to show. However, what yet remains to be offered, may serve to explain the singularity of Mr. Bordman's conduct, as well as the reasons for the numerous unfavorable reports that still are circulating respecting him, in this State and in Michigan. To that explanation.

The second letter respecting Mr. Bordman was not written for publication, and perhaps it may not be proper to give the name—but Br. Flagler's opposition to some associated bodies—his well known decision of character and firmness of purpose, as well as his unimpeachable veracity, all render it highly important that I should declare him the writer of it. On account of its closing statements, I omit a detailed statement of the charges generally circulated against Mr. Bordman, as only calculated unnecessarily to wound his feelings.

Br. J. S. Flagler says—

"On the subject of gross immoralities, and suspicions afloat concerning him, they are so many, and of such long continuance, that to write a detailed history of them, would be quite a task..... That he has been in a state of committal in regard to the above evils, is to my mind satisfactory—but then I am equally as well satisfied, that these things have had their origin from the influence of mental derangement; the commencement of which, as far as I have been able to trace it back, was at the time he made his journey to the South, to the city of Washington, the period or time he was accused of stealing a horse.....To give you a history of all the circumstances that have confirmed me in this belief, would be more than I could crowd in a single letter—let me conclude by saying, that I believe him to be an unfortunate—an abused man. In this opinion I am backed by very many respectable and impartial inhabitants of this town."

Since receiving the foregoing, I have conversed with a Methodist clergyman in high standing, who confirms the foregoing, so far as to say, that when Mr. Bordman was accused before them, of attempting to administer a dose of poison to his wife when she was sick, (a charge also named by Br. Flagler,) Mr. Bordman's friends offered in excuse that he had been injured by (my informant thinks) the fall of a limb of a tree on his head; since when he was erratic and singular in his conduct. This Methodist clergyman further confirms Br. Schetterly's statement, that the Methodists cleared him of the charge of guilt in that action.

I have thus gone through with this most painful and disagreeable duty, after one year's inquiry, some severe censure from Br. Schetterly who has mistaken my motives, and some thanks from others, who acknowledge the necessity of publicly calling for information respecting the moral characters and identity of professed preachers of Universalism, when it can be procured in no other way.

That my course was the best one I am not prepared to say—but that a call for information was proper—that it involved neither persecution nor denunciation—and that I then thought it the best, the only good course I could or should take, I do most conscientiously declare. I have published all in defence of Mr. Bordman that was offered me—I have called on the friends in Michigan not to judge him by his views of church government, but by his fruits—and I have offered all the light my inquiries could furnish whether for or against him; and in doing all this, I have done as I expect and ask to be done by. Of course having the approbation of my own conscience, the thanks I have received are dear to my heart, and the censures of Br. Schetterly, based, as they are in part, on a misapprehension of my views and motives, I can well bear, and thank him for the kindness meant, as well as forgive the injury done, unintentionally I believe.

As to Mr. Bordman I have felt, and yet feel compassion, for him—formerly as doubting his innocence—now as unfortunately imprudent in his conduct while residing in Genesee county, in this State. Had he written to me, I would have given him the sources whence I derived my information, and aided him in ascertaining its incorrectness; for truth was what I needed—all I asked. His visit to this State, not being advised by me—not even having me for its object—nor even my informant—I can not consider myself in any wise responsible for it, either in its first steps, nor in its consequences. His paper I have already noticed, save to add, that Br. E. Gage, of Bloomfield, has become a partner in it. I can not recommend it, or I would. A. B. G.

BANK BILLS.

Agents and others will please exercise a little care in remitting to us bank notes. They are now our only dependence, and although specie cannot be had for them, we must take them. Let them send those bills of good responsible banks, which are located nearest to us, or to the cities of Albany and New-York, or those on the great thorough-fare East and West.

Travellers going East and West, will find it an advantage to supply themselves with bills of banks on their route, and in the vicinity of their destined locations. We have a considerable number of Eastern, Western, Canada and a few Southern and South-Western bills, which we will gladly exchange on fair terms, for bills on good banks near to our vicinity. Will our friends aid us, by making these facts known to their travelling acquaintances who may be passing through this city? It is a time when we all need aid; and the difficulties of which may be much ameliorated if we will but "help one another."

Let our friends every where stand by their preachers and publishers, who are wholly dependent on them. Prompt ready aid is needed from every one.

STATE EDUCATION CONVENTION.

Believing that our readers will be pleased to hear some what concerning this Convention, I will briefly state that it was organized in this city, on the 11th inst. Hon. J. D. Hammond, of Cherry Valley, President—Professor Potter, Union College; Dr. J. McCall, and Rev. J. W. Mitchell, Utica; G. W. Hungerford, Esq., Watertown; H. H. Ingraham, Poughkeepsie; B. N. Loomis, Binghamton; and E. Wilson, Troy, Vice Presidents—and Professor S. N. Sweet, and G. B. Glendinning, Secretaries.

Lectures were delivered during the session, in the second Presbyterian church, as follows:—Introductory Address by Prof. Potter, of Schenectady; on the present laws relating to schools, especially common schools, by the President; on the qualifications and responsibilities of teachers by myself; on the appropriate branches of study for schools, and the order in which they should be taught, by J. W. Bulkley, of Troy; on constructing and furnishing school houses, and organizing school Lyceums, by C. H. Anthony, of Troy; on vocal music as a branch of common school education, by A. C. Carter, of Whitesborough; and on Elocution as a branch of general education, by Professor Sweet.

Various resolutions on as many various subjects were offered and passed, generally, with considerable unanimity. A State society was formed and organized, to be known as, "The New-York State Society for the improvement of Schools." An attempt made to effect a union with the "American Society for the diffusion of useful knowledge," (another national mammoth professing general Christian principles), was voted down, and an ambiguous resolution was all that was obtained in its favor in the hurried close of the meeting. The Convention was smaller than was anticipated, and though, at times, it verified my belief that clergymen, school teachers and sea captains, by being too much accustomed to implicit obedience from others, become the most dogmatic people on earth, yet on the whole, much good humor and friendly feeling prevailed among its members generally. It is to be hoped they will be cultivated more and more, and the much neglected, little appreciated cause of education—untrammelled, unsectarian education, be greatly promoted by this beginning.

Will the Universalist clergy, as well as others, show their public spirit and cordial feeling in the cause of a people's education, by heeding the following resolutions, taken from the minutes of the Convention?

"On motion of Mr. Wilson, of Troy, Resolved, That in the opinion of this Convention, the clergy do not use their influence to the extent they ought, in advancing the interests of education in this State."

"On motion of Mr. Ledlie, of Utica, Resolved, That the visitation of schools by the clergy and other professional gentlemen, is earnestly desired by this Convention." And,

"On motion of C. H. Anthony, of Troy, Resolved, That we respectfully invite the clergy, throughout the State, to preach on the subject of education on the first Sunday in July next."

There is also a resolution for the ladies, with which we will close this notice—"last, not least."

"On motion of S. N. Sweet, Resolved, That this Convention highly appreciate the influence of ladies on our social condition, and that we invite them to exert it in the cause of education, especially by the frequent visitation of schools in their several districts." A. B. G.

BUSINESS.

Mr. Hutchinson, the business partner of the firm, has been confined during the past week with the measles. I have been deeply engaged in extra business, not connected with the paper, during the same time. These two unavoidable and unforeseen circumstances must be our apology for any omissions or errors that may have been discovered during the past and present weeks.

ADDRESS TO DEITY.

BY MISS S. C. EDGARTON.

Veiled Omniscience! shall a mortal voice
Aspire to speak thy greatness? shall the soul
That knows Thee not, yet feels itself rejoice
To think of Thee—Oh! shall it dare control
Its mightiest powers, to breathe one human thought
Of what Thou art—one mere imagining
Of what Thou canst be—Thou, whose power hath wrought
The sky, the earth, the soul, and everything?

If I might dare to speak, Eternal One!
Of thy mysterious nature—if one word
Could half express Thee—Thee, of whose being none
Of all thy creatures, tho' they oft have heard,
Can comprehend the greatness—that one name,
That would define Thee best—written above,
And all around upon the earth's vast frame,
In characters of light—that name were Love!

MORNING HYMN.

BY MRS. BROUGHTON.

Tune—Araby's Daughter.

Awake, for the crimson-fringed banners of morning
Are heralding on the proud monarch of day;
The bright silver star that foretold of the dawning,
At his glances of fire, melts in glory away.
The dim, misty shadows of twilight are creeping
Along by the side of the verdure-crowned hills;
And drenched with the night-dews, the flowrets are weeping
With joy, as the sunlight streams over the rills.

How gently the breeze, from the wild woodland straying,
Bears on its soft pinions the forest notes clear;
How sweetly amid the young rosebuds 'tis playing
And scattering their perfumes abroad on the air!
The bright flashing waters now gaily are ringing
Their silvery chimes, as they dance down the vale;
And the dew-spangled leaflets melodiously singing
To the tones of the wind-harp, that sighs in the gale.

Awake, and prepare a sweet song of devotion
To Him who spread out the cerulean bright,
Above the fair earth; where with tremulous motion
"The sentinel stars" hold their watch through the night.
Roll on the loud anthem—"Thanksgiving and honor,
And glory and power to our heavenly King;
Of life and salvation the Author and Donor,"
Till the arches of light with the echoes shall ring!

CHILDREN.

BY MRS. Z. PORTER.

"Suffer little children to come unto me."

They're bright blooming treasures of earth—
How they sweeten the blessings of home!
Enlivening and chastening the hearth
Wherever their mild shadows come.

'Tis a sanctified pleasure to love
Such emblems of heaven's repose—
In innocence so like the dove,
And pure as the opening rose.

Fair plants, that adorn the world's waste—
Fresh buds, that but blossom to bless—
Making earth a bright Eden, when graced
With the charms of their loveliness.

Their pleasures give pinions to time,
"They heed not the speed of its flight"—
They know neither sorrow nor crime,
But soar on the wings of delight.

Their mirth is so holy and sweet,
That angels may list and approve—
Their hearts, of affection the seat,
Where joy is embodied with love.

They give back in vision, the hours
That never again can return—
My childhood's bless'd home and lov'd bowers,
That still in my memory burn.

Their days are a roseate dream,
They wist not that storms may arise
To ruffle life's musical stream,
Or darken its ambient skies.

O! quench not their spirit's warm glow—
To them a rich mercy 'twas given!
O! check not their soul's lively flow—
They're bless'd of their Father in heaven!

Henderson, 1837.

A FEW STRANGE THINGS.

It is strange, if, as Paul says he is, God "is the Saviour of all men," how a portion of them can be eternally damned.

It is strange, if "every knee shall bow and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God, the Father," how any can spend a ceaseless eternity in blaspheming God.

It is strange, if all shall in the resurrection be made alive in Christ, and if to be in Christ, is to become a new creature, how any can eternally remain old creatures, with all the sins and imperfections of earth upon them.

It is strange, if Christ will "destroy him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil," how he can continue to exist and unceasingly torture a portion of the human family.

It is strange, if, as Christ assures us, all "who shall be accounted worthy to obtain the resurrection from the dead" (i. e., all mankind, for all surely will be raised) shall become "the children of God and equal unto the angels," how any can be cast off, the children of the devil and the companion of fiends.

It is strange, if "the Lord God will wipe away tears from off all faces," how any can continue to mourn and shed tears of endless and unutterable anguish.

It is strange, if Paul believed the doctrine of endless misery to be true, and was possessed of the feelings of a Christian, how he could hope for the resurrection of the unjust.

It is strange, if Peter believed this doctrine to be true, how he could say, "believing we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory."

It is strange, if Paul had ever taught this doctrine to the Philippians, how he could afterwards write to them about their being possessed of "the peace of God which passeth all understanding."

It is strange, if he had been teaching the Romans that this doctrine is true, how he could speak to them of being filled "with all joy and peace in believing."

It is strange, if Christ made known the existence of a state of unending wretchedness and pain beyond the tomb, how Paul could say that he died, "that through death he might deliver them who through fear of death were all their life time subject to bondage."

It is strange, if the Gospel reveals the endless damnation of a portion of the human family unto us, why it should particularly be called "good tidings"—"the glorious Gospel"—"the Gospel of peace"—and "the Gospel of salvation," while it is never so much as intimated, that it is the Gospel of damnation—that it makes known unto us any tidings that are bad, or that it brings us any news in the least calculated to make us unhappy.—New-Hampshire Universalist.

TO FORM A VIGOROUS MIND.

Let every youth early settle his mind, that if he would ever be any thing, he has got to make himself; or in other words, to rise by personal application; let him always try his own strength, and try it effectually, before he is allowed to call upon Hercules. Put him first upon his own invention; send him back again and again to the resources in his own mind, and make him feel that there is nothing too hard for industry and perseverance to accomplish. In his early and timid flights, let him know that stronger points are near and ready to sustain him, but only in case of absolute necessity.—When in the rugged paths of science, difficulties which he cannot surmount impede his progress, let him be helped over them; but never let him think of being led when he has power to walk without help; nor of carrying his ore to another's furnace, when he can melt it down in his own.

Common swearing argues in a man a perpetual distrust of his own reputation.

MARRIAGES.

In Albany, on the 15th of April, by Rev. L. C. Browne, Mr. JOSEPH A. COUGTRY to Miss MARGARET LLOYD.

In Fort Plain, on the 7th of May, by Rev. L. C. Browne, Mr. DANIEL LIGHTHEART, to Miss MARGARET MILLER, both of Newville.

In Rome, on the 7th inst., by Rev. Mr. Andrews, Mr. HENRY VEAZIE, of this city, to Miss JANE M. DAY, of the former place.

DEATHS.

In Leyden, February 10th, of canker rash, WILLIAM P., son of Armstrong and Cynthia Malcolm, aged seven years. May He who chastens us for our profit, that we may be partakers of his holiness, sustain and comfort the bereaved parents and mourning family in this and all affliction, and render it subservient to their growth in virtue and holiness. The funeral was attended on the 12th, and a discourse tendered to the mourners and a numerous assemblage of neighbors and friends by

J. A. A.

In Turin, February 7th, of an ulcer on the lungs, LEVI, son of Mr. Wayne Collins, aged nine years. The funeral services were attended by the writer, on the 8th, and an address delivered to the bereaved relatives and sympathising neighbors. May the God of all comfort support them in this afflictive bereavement, and in all trials—and may they see the hand of a merciful Father employed "in all the good and ill that checker life."

In Boonville, February 25th, HANNAH MARIA, daughter of Thomas and Sarah Traffern, aged two years, one month and twenty-seven days. May He who wounds but to heal, apply the word of his gracious truth, that the wound caused by the departure of this interesting child, may be healed. Sermon by

J. A. A.

In Boonville, April 13th, of liver complaint in connexion with jaundice, Mrs. HEPZIBAH TRAFFERN, consort of Mr. Cromwell Traffern, aged 67 years. The funeral was attended on the 15th, and a discourse tendered to the assembled relatives, friends and neighbors, by the writer.

J. A. A.

In Boonville, January 30th, of consumption, Mr. ALEXANDER J. MURRAY. He left a wife and three children to lament their loss of an affectionate husband, and a kind and provident father. His patience and resignation in sickness, though not proof of the truth, yet speaks much in favor of the doctrine of the universal blessedness of the human race, in which he firmly believed, and from which he drew comfort in life and support in death. The following tribute of respect to his memory, by a female neighbor, will be responded to by many a sympathising heart, who knew his worth, and lament his departure.

Farewell, dear brother, thou art gone,
From sin and sorrow now released,
Thy pains are o'er, thy race is run;
Then, brother, rest in perfect peace.
Our tears now flow, but not for thee,
For well we know thy rest is sweet—
And faith and love bid us to hope,
With thee a ransomed world to meet.

The funeral was attended February 1st, and a discourse delivered to the mourning relatives, and assembled neighbors and friends, from Ps. xxxvii: 37, by

J. A. A.

In St. Johnsville, Montgomery county, N. Y., at the residence of her brother-in-law, (Moses Davis,) Miss BETSEY HEALY, aged 36 years, 2 months and 10 days. She was formerly a resident of Worcester county, Mass. Will Editors in Massachusetts please copy.

In Van Hornsville, on the 2d of April, RACHEL, daughter of C. T. E. Van Horn, Esq., aged 1 year, 4 months and 26 days. She was the youngest of a numerous and interesting group.

L. C. B.

In Fort Plain, on the 24th of April, HELEN MARIA, daughter of Peter and Eliza Valentine, aged 6 months and 24 days.

In Clinton, Lewis county, Mich., on the 7th of March, LEMUEL DELOS SWIFT, son of Philip Swift of Paines Hollow, Herkimer county, N. Y. He died in the 23d year of his age, and at the time when his prospects seemed the most promising for happiness and honor. By a view of his genius and talents his friends have long been flattered with a hope of his future usefulness and respectability, but soon after his removal to the West their expectations were blighted, for he was cut down in the morning of life as it were, and called to experience the realities of that world from whence no traveller returns. His funeral was attended at Paines Hollow, near the residence of his Father, on the 16th ult. and the consolations of the Gospel presented by Mr. Chappel of the Methodist connexion.—Com.

A VOICE TO YOUTH.....CHAPTER XI.

BY REV. J. M. AUSTIN.

TREATMENT OF RELIGIOUS ERROR.

Mankind have been created with powers of mind, so diversified, that the variety of opinions upon subjects relating to religion, is not a matter of astonishment. It would be far more surprising, when we reflect upon the various degrees of knowledge possessed by mankind, were they all to entertain precisely the same views. This disparity of opinion existing, I deem it of some importance to make a few suggestions, in regard to the treatment of those who differ from you in religious sentiment.

In the first place, let it be remembered, that by the law of nature, others have the same unalienable right to differ from you in opinion, that you have to dissent from them. And in this land of religious freedom, the liberty of entertaining and defending such religious sentiments as they deem proper, without injury to their rights, privileges or immunities, is guaranteed to all its citizens. It is both proper and necessary that you should observe the letter and spirit of these natural and political laws—they should form the basis upon which you found the principles of your emotions and actions towards your religious opposers.—Never, therefore, disparage, despise, ill-treat, or calumniate any of your fellow-beings, on account of their religious views, if you have reason to believe that they are sincere. Such conduct violates the principles of equity and uprightness, and those who are guilty of it, have no just claims to manhood or Christianity. Hypocrisy of every form and feature, it is your duty to despise and discountenance, in a decided and proper manner—but sincerity, however absurd its object, should ever be respected.

Withhold not the name of Christian, from any sect who believe in the Gospel of Jesus Christ. This concession is called for by truth, and by that charity and urbanity which denominations, believing in the same God, the same Saviour, and the same Bible, should ever exhibit towards each other. And it is an incentive to this practice, and a pleasing reflection, that in every class of professing Christians, there are many—very many—who possess the true spirit of Christ.

Avoid also attributing to any sect, doctrines or principles which they deny. They should be allowed to possess the right—which you claim for yourself—of stating their own sentiments, and the grounds upon which they rest them—and for these sentiments, and none other, should they be held accountable.

Never judge of the character of a whole sect, or of the influence of its doctrines, by the conduct of a few of its adherents. From the imperfections of human nature, all are liable to err, although possessing the purest principles. Even the chief of the disciples of Christ, once denied his Master. Judge of every man's character, by his own personal conduct, and not by the conduct of another. And decide upon the influence of doctrines by their general effects upon their believers.

It is a natural and laudable wish, to induce others to adopt our peculiar religious opinions, but to accomplish this end, certain precautions must be observed. You must avoid ridiculing those whose views you would change. This is a favorite measure with many public advocates of religion; but they who resort to it, are not the most successful in winning adherents to their doctrines. Ridicule is a dangerous weapon—it is a two-edged sword, and can be wielded as skillfully by the advocate of error, as by him who would build up truth. Ridicule seldom reaches the judgment to convince it of error; but it invariably wounds the feelings and upholds the prejudices of those against whom it is levelled. It is one thing, to expose the fallacies of erroneous sentiments in a plain, candid and forcible manner; but another, and different thing, to ridicule those who are so unfortunate as to entertain them. By pursuing the former course, you can hope to succeed in changing the opinions of those you address; but if you fail, you can not be successful in any case, by adopting the latter.

When speaking to religious opposers, or of them, never indulge in harsh epithets. Instead of saying that people are "liars," or "fools," or "destitute of common sense," it is much more polite and Christian-like, to say simply, that they are, or may be mistaken. "No person was ever reclaimed from error, by being insulted or reproached." Harsh epithets can not convince an individual of the falsity of his opinions; but they can, and will arouse his anger, steel him against conviction, and confirm him in his errors.

In all religious discussions whether public or private, never display ill-temper. This would be improper—it would exhibit a lack of courtesy and of a Christian spirit—and it would give an opposer a decided advantage over you. To give reason and judgment that full sway which is so requisite in controversy, the passions should be kept in entire subjection.

In a mixed company, of whom any are strangers to you, be cautious of what you say in regard to sentiments which you deem to be erroneous. These sentiments may be believed by some in your presence; and a harsh word or an ungenerous epithet, may not only prejudice them against yourself, but also against the sect to which you belong and the doctrine you profess—and this too, to an extent which it would be difficult to overcome, even by the power of truth.

In all your conversation and intercourse with those of different religious sentiments—in all your efforts to convince them of their errors—let your manner be characterized by gentleness, kindness and the most friendly emotions. Too much care and attention can not be bestowed on this subject. Indicate by your spirit and conduct, that you respect and love them, whatever you may think of their errors—let them perceive that you are interested in their welfare, and that you only desire to change their views, that you may enhance their happiness. I care not how strong are the arguments you call to your aid, if they are but clothed in the language of kindness and respect.—Kindness has an influence in convincing opposers, ten thousand times more powerful than sarcasm, ridicule or contempt. There was much true philosophy in the remark of the little girl. She was asked—"how is it that every body loves you?" "I don't know," she replied, "except it is because I love every body." This was the real secret. An emotion of kindness evinced towards those whom you would affect, will invariably awaken a similar feeling in their bosoms towards you. The icy bulwarks of prejudice can be melted down by the warm rays of love and friendship—and reasonable, well-applied arguments, can then do their work effectually in eradicating error. In fine, in this respect, as in all others, follow implicitly the Saviour's golden rule—"Do unto others, as ye would that others should do unto you."

It may be proper to add here, a few hints in regard to the time and place of manifesting your peculiar religious views. There are some people who are in the constant habit of obtruding their sentiments upon the notice of others. At home or abroad—in the stage, the steam-boat, the bar-room or the street—they are ever proclaiming and insisting upon the peculiarities of their doctrines, for the purpose of raising a flame of controversy. I do not say this of any one sect—for, there are, undoubtedly, those in all denominations, who are amenable to this charge.—This practice is exceedingly unpleasant, as well as ungentlemanly. Circumstances and occasions may frequently occur, wherein it is more proper to remain silent, than to urge your religious tenets. You can all conceive of such cases. I am far from desiring you to cover up, or in any way conceal your sentiments, when it is proper to express them. I would rather urge you firmly and fearlessly to declare and maintain your opinions, whenever such a course is distinctly called for. But I would have you exercise prudence as to the time, place and circumstances. Your good sense and the rules of propriety, will dictate when it would be proper or improper—polite or rude—to express your religious views, and enter into a controversy to maintain them. It may be proper to do so in all those public places above enumerated, under very peculiar circumstances—but such instances are exceedingly rare. I repeat, let prudence and judgment be your guides in relation to this subject, and you will hardly err.

[This chapter concludes the series addressed to youth of both sexes. I shall next separately address the Young Men.]

AFFECTION.

BY REV. T. J. TENNEY.

"We love to feel within us the bond which unites the most distant crans—men, nations, customs, perish; the affections are immortal."—BULWER.

Sweet is the memory of the lingering scenes of love. O, how often in the "Silly hour of night" have our thoughts revelled in the tender caresses of a departed friend? reverted to some trivial accident which fastened the affections forever? That friend may have been a mother, or a relative, or, perhaps, no otherwise related than by what arises from the tender ties that bind us man to man, and that link together the fates of community—of a world. That friend is gone, but memory still hovers around the era when and the most aged seem to live over again their lives, and enjoy the pleasures of an age long since swallowed up in eternity.

And are these attributes of the present life to have an eternal existence in the kingdom of heaven? Yes—for "God is love," and the memory of this shall quicken the devotions of his kingdom till the glad sound of "glory, and honor, and praise, and power," attests the joy of every son and daughter of Adam. We love because we were first loved, and instead of affection being lessened there, we most firmly believe it will be the nucleus of all its glories—the grand centre of happiness. It will be stronger and purer, and comprehend the whole family of mankind; "for there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth." And when the last wanderer shall be gathered in, and there is one fold and one Shepherd, then will the voices of angels announce the joyful consummation, "and the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever."

JUDGE NOT FROM APPEARANCES.
BY REV. J. WHITNEY.

It is not certain that those who make the greatest external show of goodness and virtue, possess the most piety and disinterested benevolence. It is written, "though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing."—Charity may be considered disinterested benevolence, which is implied by the following: "charity suffereth long and is kind; charity envieth not, charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil." All these appear to be properties of Christian benevolence. Let a man speak ever so many good words, or do ever so many good deeds, or be ever so zealously affected in good things; yet if it be known that he has not the happiness of his fellow beings in view, he is not admired by his impartial neighbors, nor considered worthy of reward or praise.—No external actions are of the least moral value in the estimation of the unbiased, when they are supposed to proceed from that principle which seeketh her own exclusively.

Those who, like the Pharisee, make high pretensions, and a great show of religion, are frequently like them highly esteemed among men. Such people generally lead captive the most weak and silly portions of community. There are some, however, who judge very differently. Those sects and individuals who talk much about their religion, and seem to think themselves the only true Christians, are apt to be looked upon by the serious and contemplative, as either bigots or hypocrites—as being deceived themselves, or trying to deceive others.

It must be acknowledged that men of this character are stigmatised in the Scriptures gross as hypocrites, whether ignorance is or is not the cause of their principles and conduct. But we are not always warranted to call them by such opprobrious names, nor to pass upon them so severe a censure. Our Saviour did, but we do not know who are whited sepulchres or painted hypocrites. Perhaps some who appear to us very ostentatious, may not intend aught amiss. They may be real Christians, possessing piety and virtue, and zeal according to knowledge. Vanity may be with them a constitutional failing, the sin by which they are the most easily beset.

CONTROVERSY WITH MR. CAMPBELL.

Since my last letter to Mr. Campbell was in type, and the proof taken and sent to Mr. C., we have received the following letter from Br. Montgomery, touching the challenge and other matters, more particularly relating to him and the conversation at Auburn, in June last.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

TO MR. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL.

DEAR SIR—It is with extreme reluctance I feel myself called upon to notice a few observations in your last letter to Br. Skinner; because it is not well for an individual to interfere between two parties pursuing a discussion. But in the present case, it seems necessary for me to speak, inasmuch as Br. Skinner is not acquainted with the circumstances touching certain of your statements.

1. You think that at the interview we enjoyed in the house of our mutual friend, Mr. Shepherd, I challenged you to a discussion. This is a mistake. It was not my intention to challenge you—it is not my practice to challenge, but to defend—and I did not dream of challenging you, an acknowledged controversialist, fortified by twenty-five years study. And Mr. Shepherd has since told me, that he did not, by any means, consider that my remarks to you embraced a challenge.—It was simply my desire that you would publish and answer a few letters investigating certain positions by you advanced in your reply to my first letter, which positions were not to me, full and conclusive. And when, by your permission, the subject was transferred to Br. Skinner, I expressly understood that he was to continue the correspondence in reference to the statements embraced in the letters of Spencer, myself, and in your replies.

2. Speaking of my youth, you say, "yet as one does not like to be called a coward, I got off honorably (from the combat) telling him that as I was going 'down East' to the regions of light, I would rather encounter some of the older giants, the Anakims or Zamzummims of Universalism; for if I killed him, these sons of Hercules would say I only killed a mere stripling, which would be unmanly and dishonorable." That the writer is a stripling in the cause of Zion, is true; that he is young, is also true; and if he had known that you attach so much importance to age, it would have been well for me to have painted some wrinkles on my face and worn a grey wig during our interview. You might, indeed, for aught I know, have crushed G. W. M. with one blow of your long sword and "weaver's beam"—but be this as it may, it would perhaps be as well for even Mr. Campbell to despise youth less. You remember the fate of boasting Goliath, when he combatted with David, the youthful son of Jesse.

3. You represent me as saying of Br. Skinner, that "perhaps, he was a more ready writer than any of them," i. e. Universalist preachers. Neither Mr. Shepherd nor myself remember to have heard such a remark, for such an invidious comparison was uncalled for. I told you that he was fitted for a discussion, both as it regarded learning and talents—and that he was in my judgement, well qualified to defend his faith against Mr. Campbell, is evident by my selecting him. And although I spoke in high terms of the talents of Br. Balfour, yet I do not remember to have said that he was the most learned man among our preachers, because, whether it be so or not, such a remark was not needed from me, and because such personal comparisons are not right or proper.

4. But what most excited my surprise, was, your intimation, that instead of challenging a Universalist preacher in Boston to discuss the truth of the restitution, you expected to be challenged and to be the defendant. Why, my dear sir, when in the presence of Mr. Shepherd and others, you stated that, as you believed neither A. C. Thomas nor Dr. Ely were wholly fitted for the discussion in which they engaged, and that, as you were going to Boston, you meant to examine the subject thoroughly provided you could get a person to engage with you, and I told you that you could have a choice out of fifty preachers, what were we to understand by it? Were we to understand, that when you arrived at Boston, you meant to invite a preacher of the faith to challenge you to discuss the subject with him? Why certainly, if you intended to discuss the subject, no person under heaven would have understood you otherwise, than that you intended to challenge some preacher of our order. But enough has been said by me, touching these points—the rest of the letter belongs to Br. Skinner, who will do you ample justice.

Yours Respectfully, GEO. W. MONTGOMERY.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

LETTER TO REV. MR. FISK.—NO. II.

DEAR SIR—Your defence, published in No. 6, Vol. 8, Magazine and Advocate, is in part satisfactory, and in part not so, to me. The loss of your subscription list to the "Examiner," by fire, which I learn, for the first time, occasioned the discontinuance of that paper, and which was the severest loss to our brethren in this vicinity, is a very good apology. I feel confident that no member of that Association you call "inquisitorial," knew of this circumstance before. Would it not have been well to have informed your patrons, through the medium of our periodicals, of this loss? This paper, you will recollect, was commenced in 1834, and the charge preferred against you by one of the sufferers, at our next session, in 1835.—Your publications in New-York, the "Gospel Herald," the "Universalist Preacher," and the "New York Amulet," were commenced in 1829–30.—These papers you acknowledge, ceased after they passed out of your hands. Well; did you not receive advance pay for these papers? If so; were you not morally and legally bound to execute your engagements? Had you any right to transfer such patronage to an irresponsible agent, and thus defraud your friends? You must know, that this is also the first information we have ever had of such transfers being made. It is a serious misfortune, that others did not see fit to fulfil your engagements. You are informed, that the paper called "Plain Truth," [query—"Truth Teller"? A. B. G.] which you did not publish as you proposed, but agreed with Br. Everett to supply them with the Advocate (a broken volume I suppose,) was not a subject of complaint before the Council.—The following correspondence will explain one of the charges brought against you, which I assure you, I deeply regret. I offer it, not because of any ill will toward you, but to exonerate myself from the charge of calumniating your reputation, and answer your demand for proof. No one would rejoice more than myself, to find the mystery of this unpleasant affair satisfactorily explained. Will you relieve us on the subject of this correspondence?

"Middleport, Niagara co., N. Y., July 10, 1828.

SIR—As I have been informed that you are settled in Philadelphia, under a salary of $1000 per annum, allow me to congratulate you on that happy circumstance, wishing you health, prosperity, peace in mind, and a respectable and growing congregation, if your walk through life is such as will merit it; but, at the same time, allow me to remind you of the past. You will recollect, that the last time you was at this place, you preached a discourse in the evening—at the close of the meeting you stated that you had commenced the publication of a monthly work for the term of one year, to be entitled "Truth Teller," for which you solicited subscriptions from those in favor of encouraging liberal sentiments. Accordingly, some ten or twelve inhabitants of this place became subscribers for the work, paid you fifty cents each, which was the price for one year, and received "Truth Teller No. 1, or Jonah and the Devil."—Since that time, we have not received any of the publication, neither have we had any direct information from you in any shape. Please be good enough to explain this neglect; and if satisfactory, I shall remain your friend, with sentiments of esteem.

JOHN CRAIG.

"Rev. Theophilus Fisk, Philadelphia."

REPLY.

"Philadelphia, July 18, 1828.

SIR—Your letter of July 10 is received, respecting what your letter purports to be a pious fraud! upon some of the inhabitants of Middleport. I shall only say that my coming to this place was unexpected—that the publication was delayed until it was known whether or no I should remain in this city—which was not determined upon until some two months ago—that the money would have been refunded but for the want of a suitable opportunity, previous to the present time. I must express my surprise at the tone of your letter—more in sorrow than in anger—in sorrow that those who should have known me better, could for a moment suppose me guilty of a trick—a connivance to filch from your townsmen a few cents—I only say you should have known me better—perhaps you did not mean just as you said. I have the honor to be, with suitable respect, T. FISK.

"J. Craig, Esq."

"Middleport, Aug. 4, 1828.

"Sir—Your letter of July 18th is received, and on perusing it I find it couched in a very haughty style. There was nothing in my letter that would amount to a charge against you of committing a "pious fraud" on the inhabitants of this place, as you mentioned, (but perhaps a guilty conscience needed no accuser). You say the publication was delayed until it was known whether or no you should remain in Philadelphia: but there was nothing said, at the time you took the pay for "Truth Teller," about the necessity of delaying the publication until you located yourself; but it was expected by the subscribers that the work would be published monthly, whether you were located in Philadelphia, or travelling the country. You say you would have refunded the money, but for the want of a suitable opportunity. There is an opportunity of remitting money through the medium of the Post Office (unless it has been closed without my knowledge), but if it was not convenient to refund the money, a suitable apology, stating your reason for not fulfilling on your part, and telling your intentions to be fulfilled at some future period, would have been satisfactory. But you were silent on the subject: and now, when called on for an explanation, you do not state what you intend to do. You say you "must express your surprise at the tone of my letter—more in sorrow than in anger—in sorrow that those who should have known better, could for a moment suppose you guilty of a trick—a connivance to filch your townsmen out of a few cents."

By the by, it was a few dollars, and if you were as successful in obtaining subscriptions at every place where you stopped, on your tour from Buffalo East and South, as at this place, you must have got your coffers pretty well filled; and I have understood since receiving your letter, that there is an inquiry after "Truth Teller," at different places along your track. Again you say, I "should have known you better." Now how in the name of common sense should I have known you better? It was the second time I had seen you, and how should I have known you otherwise than by your fruits? Math. vii: 16—"Ye shall know them by their fruits." Finally, I have shown your letter to a number of the subscribers for "Truth Teller," and they with myself are not satisfied with your put-off explanation of your neglect. It is not the paltry sum of fifty cents each, that we care about, but as you have set yourself about to teach the doctrine of God's impartial grace, we should like to see your back track such as would warrant the people in giving you a liberal support.

JOHN CRAIG."

"Rev. Theophilus Fisk, Philadelphia."

This letter you returned with the following note. "I trust our correspondence is at an end. If reasons were as plenty as blackberries, I'd give no man a reason upon compulsion."

Such, Mr. Fisk, is the testimony I offer you, agreeable to your demand. Will you repeat the declaration, that you "never issued proposals for publishing a paper in your life, without completing the volume for which I had received pay, or making satisfactory arrangements to have it done?"—Will you affirm in the face of your own letter, that you published "Truth Teller," "Examiner," etc. To whom were your arrangements satisfactory? I am authorized to inform you that the subscribers to the four papers I have named, are dissatisfied, that they never received the amount they paid for, in any way, and that no one was ever supplied by your "satisfactory arrangements." This dissatisfaction rose to a complaint before our Association. As I was not the complainant, I shall not debate the subject with you, nor should I have laid it before the public, but for the hope of a "satisfactory" explanation, which I expected from your demand to make it so. Neither time nor distance can absolve you from the demands of justice.—And though eight years elapsed before a legal complaint was made against you, yet, during this period, attempts have been made to bring about a reconciliation. Br. Everett was written to, who offered to write to you, and if you did not make restitution, to lay it before the Association. This, however, Br. Craig declined, hoping to settle the matter without this trouble. Besides, who knew where to find you for several years past? But, at last, after a repetition of a similar offence by the discontinuance of the Examiner, and other papers, published by you, complaint was made. No judgment, however, has yet been rendered.—You have not as yet been condemned. In conclusion, I inform you, that I accept your forgiveness, though a little in advance. I will apply it to a neglect in not summoning you sooner to answer the charge against you.

I am pleased with your exhortation to have us exercise charity, and hope that the future numbers of your paper will afford a better commentary upon it than many of the past, so far as your language toward some our New-England brethren is concerned. If I have written plainly, it is because I would have you do even so to me. I pity him who flatters, and him who loves flattery. I trust you will receive this answer to your demand as an evidence of my wish for your prosperity and usefulness, and honor "the committee of discipline" with such an answer as you may feel disposed to return. I am not disposed to honor any further drafts for testimony through the public prints, at present.

Yours,

C. HAMMOND.

NOTES ON SACRED SUBJECTS.

INSCRIBED TO ADELIA.

§ XXX. "EMMANUEL." MATT. 1: 2, 3.—Had we not met with a very lengthy and labored note upon this name, applied to Jesus in the passage referred to, we should have been disposed to suppose and to remark that the more intelligent advocates of Trinitarianism and Partialism, made little or no account of it. We were aware, that in the mouths of village theologians and petty polemics, it still passes as a satisfactory proof-text of the Trinity, and of the Deity of Christ. Let the reader refer to Clarke's Commentary, and read until he comes to that part where he puts the question—"But how could that be a sign to Ahaz, which was to take place so many years after?" After reading the Doctor's solution of this question, let him read the following, and decide for himself which is the most satisfactory. He will derive some assistance also from a perusal of the 8th Book of Milman's History of the Jews, in vol. 1st of Harper's Family Library.

It seems to be generally admitted that the words of Isaiah are not prophetic of Christ, and the name and nature he should bear; but are to be confined to the immediate event of which the prophet was then speaking; and that the Evangelist refers to the event recorded by the Prophet, only as applying remarkably to, and suiting the circumstances of the Saviour's birth and office. Ahaz, King of Judah, was in fear for his kingdom; the two Kings of Syria and Israel having come upon him; and God promised Ahaz, that before a child soon to be born, should be grown up, whose name, in token of the intended deliverance, should be called Emmanuel, i. e. God with us, the two kingdoms of his enemies should be overthrown. God would be with him, that is, give him the victory. Jesus having come as the messenger of God to save mankind from their great enemy, sin, the Evangelist recollecting the incident in the history of Ahaz, introduces it in illustration of his subject. But as God did not come on earth in his own person, to interpose in behalf of Ahaz, so neither can it be supposed that the Evangelist intended to convey the idea that because he applies the name Emmanuel to Jesus, that God had come in his own person to save mankind from their sins.

Perhaps the true answer to any argument drawn from this verse in favor of the deity of Christ, and certainly the only one to which it is entitled, is found in the circumstance that it was a customary thing among the Jews to give to their children significant names, and very often such as were composed in fact of the word Al, or El, signifying God. For example, Elijah, means God the Lord; Lemuel, God with them; Elihu, God himself, and so on, so that there is no more evidence to be derived from the name, (that Jesus was God because the name Emmanuel was applied to him,) than there is from the circumstance, that because men have been named Elijah, etc., they were each, therefore, God, by a mysterious union with the divine nature.

But supposing the prophecy to have the strictest application to Jesus, we say that he was called Emmanuel, not in reference to his nature, but the office he was to sustain, and the abundant communications of the Spirit of God with which he was to be favored. In this respect he was indeed Emmanuel. God was with him and with us, by the miracles which he wrought, by the prophecies which he uttered, by the doctrines and sublime lessons of piety and morality which he taught; and as really, too, as if mysteriously and personally united to the man, Jesus.

The above explanation does not differ materially from that adopted by Grotius, and is principally derived from the Christian Pioneer. Valeat quantum valere potest.

DR. CHALMERS.

An article in a late number of the Magazine and Advocate, describes the celebrated Dr. Chalmers as passing much of his time in hunting, fishing, etc., conveying to me an impression of frivolity and lightness of character, strongly in opposition to his habits when I knew him. He was then an indefatigable student, and pursued, in the interim of his theological studies, deep researches into the laws of nature, experimenting in chemistry, collecting in botany, etc. acquiring, indeed, that vast fund of knowledge which he afterwards so fully portrayed. He was, at the time alluded to, an assistant in the parish Church of Cavers, in Roxburghshire, Scotland. His salary was very trifling—about fifty or sixty pounds sterling, if I mistake not. But he kept himself always out of debt. By the sternly Calvinistic he was considered a skeptic. He was a man of generous mind, and his liberality was condemned by them. He was then little known, and appreciated only by a few. From Cavers he got a call to Kilmeny, in Fifeshire. He would occasionally return to preach in Roxburghshire. I remember, after a few years absence, hearing him preach,—it must be now twenty-five years ago,—and he evinced a very great increase of enthusiasm. He took the Bible for his text—held it out in his hand unopened—deposited it again on the cushion, and probably seldom has the work had a more eloquent eulogium, certainly never a more zealous, than was then bestowed. All remarked how much more orthodox he had become.

A neighboring clergyman, with whom he occasionally associated, was fond of field sports. I think it not unlikely, Mr. Smith, or his informant, may have confounded the two. Indeed, I scarcely think that Chalmers ever possessed physical strength enough to enjoy such pleasures.

DOUBLE COROLLARY.

1. Universalism is good to live by, as admitted by its opposers, as well as maintained and proved by its advocates. Partialism is the opposite of Universalism—therefore; Partialism is not good to live by.

2. Partialism is bad to die by, as is evident from the fact, that no one of human nature can be at peace, while the belief of the endless misery of a near friend, presses upon the mind. Universalism is the opposite of Partialism—therefore, Universalism is not bad to die by.

UNIVERSALIST WATCHMAN.

Br. John Gregory, late of Woburn, Mass. has entered upon his duties as editor of the Universalist Watchman, published at Montpelier, Vt.—The Watchman is an old and tried friend of our cause—a true and faithful defender of Universalism—and we pray that under the labor of Br. Gregory it may be eminently successful in the same great objects it has hitherto pursued.

THEOLOGICAL DISCUSSION.

For the Magazine and Advocate.

No. 7.—Mr. Skinner to Mr. Campbell.

DEAR SIR—After so long a silence, which has been imposed on me from the impossibility of my obtaining sight of your April letter till after my return from the South, I resume my pen. I sincerely regret that you did not forward me a copy of your letter to Virginia, agreeable to my request sent you from Richmond, or that if you did so it never reached me.*

I also regret as sincerely, to find, on the perusal of your April letter, that it is no reply, nor even an attempt to reply to my last. I did hope, my dear Sir, when I engaged in a discussion of the all important subject of controversy between us, that I had found an honorable and high-minded opponent, who would stand forth with Christian candor and manly boldness in defence of what he considers the truth and holy sanctions of the Gospel of Christ—one who felt himself above those little quibbles, and stratagems, those bandying of words about challenges, and the substitution of new and multiform questions for debate, unnecessary laws of evidence, rules of discussion, etc., etc., to the neglect of the main points at issue. And I will still cherish the fond hope that what to me appears, in your letter now before me, to be a departure from the course of the honorable and high minded Christian controversialist, is only an exception to your general character—that you will shortly return from this strange digression, resume the discussion of the points on which we are already at issue, and fairly, candidly, and fully investigate them pro bono publico. For I am fully confident that all of our readers, and I believe most of yours, are much more desirous of, and would be more essentially benefitted by seeing a thorough and candid discussion of the points of difference between us, than by seeing an everlasting controversy ABOUT a discussion.

I have too often been disgusted with long controversies about a challenge, as to which party had given it, when perhaps both parties had virtually, but neither verbally, given it.

You make a labored effort to prove that you have been challenged by the Universalists; but I think you do not succeed in the effort. For certainly I have not challenged you—Spencer did not challenge you—and though you say Mr. Montgomery did, the proof you give of it only shows that he modestly inquired of you, “Will you continue to publish letters from me, if I continue to write on the subject of my letter to you?” Suppose A. B. C. and D. to meet in social mood at the house of C.—A. converses with C. awhile on the subject of religion. He then retires, and B. resumes the conversation where A. left it. They are soon interrupted, and B. says to C. I should be glad to converse longer on this subject for mutual edification, if convenient, for I deem it of vast importance; but as it is inconvenient for me, I would like to hear you and D. converse further on the points whereon we differ. C. and D. both assent to the proposal. Now, in all this there would be no challenge given or received, or requisite. It is a mutual agreement for a conversation on a particular subject. Precisely so stands the case with us in my view.

I must however confess that, taking every thing into consideration, pertaining to this matter, you occupy a somewhat singular position. You first appear very anxious the subject should be discussed—say to Mr. Montgomery, you have fully made up your mind to canvass it—think justice was not done to it by Messrs. Ely and Thomas, and resolve if a fair opportunity presents of getting glory in the controversy, to engage at once. But as Haman of old scorned to lay hands upon Morde-cai alone, lest he should not by his death exterminate the whole race, so the celebrated Mr. Campbell scorns to re-engage in the controversy with an amiable young man “in the bloom of 25, or thereabout,” though he acknowledges him to be “a promising Goliath.” He resolves on “encountering some of the older giants, the Anakims, or Zamzummins of Universalism,” and to let “these sons of Hercules” know that he could kill something more than a “stripling.” Well, he reaches the land of the giants, the far-famed city of Boston, and there is introduced to one of these mighty men of Universalism, preaches in the presence of most of them (perhaps they hear him allude to their dogmas,) and is very anxious to start a controversy with the mightiest of them all; but—* * * as he never challenges others for controversy, only accepts challenges when others give them, he could only say to them, or hint by his actions, “Come, gentlemen giants, you Anakims and Zamzummins, just give me a challenge for a discussion—I’ll meet the stoutest of you if you’ll only challenge me to fight.” But, alas! no man challenges him—he was either not large enough to attract their notice, or else they were afraid of him and did not dare to encounter so mighty a champion, or else they had not the bump of combativeness very strongly developed! And Mr. C. returns to the shades of Bethany, without having won a single laurel in battle with any Universalist, save the little one he picked up at Lockport, N. Y.!

Having returned from the East without starting there any controversy with what he is pleased to style the “sons of Hercules,” it was expected that my friend Campbell would have so good an appetite for the prosecution of the controversy already begun, as to need no other stimulus to engage right heartily in it, but to be reminded of the engagement already entered into with Mr. Montgomery.*

Accordingly, without allowing myself to doubt your intention to fulfil the agreement on your part, I wrote you November 14, merely to remind you how I understood that agreement, and to consult you about the time of re-publishing in our paper what was already before your readers, and then continuing the discussion of the subject already under consideration. You replied November 29, tacitly admitted the correctness of my understanding of said agreement, but offered another alternative, viz. an oral debate, (which some of my friends, though I doubted it myself, supposed to be a stratagem to get rid of the discussion already commenced,) leaving the acceptance of the alternative optional with me; and saying in regard to the time of resuming the discussion, that your attention would most likely be wholly engrossed with the Catholic discussion till the first of February, and hence it would be injudicious to divert your attention from it till after that period. I answered this, December 23, informing you that I chose to adhere to the engagement already entered into, rather than accept of your proposed alternative, and should accordingly re-publish the articles from the Harbinger, in season to follow them with “my reply to your last article between the first and middle of February.” To this you made no objection, no reply. Accordingly on the 10th of February, 1837, the 5th number of the Discussion, viz. my Reply to yours in the Harbinger of February, 1836, was duly published. It was re-published in the Harbinger in March last: and now, after waiting about three months from the date of that letter, I am permitted to see your April No. of the Harbinger containing your last letter to me! And what do I see? Why, my opponent horrified at my eagerness for the debate, and at my entire want of method; nay, even more, I have no proposition to discuss, and am “without law, or rule, or stipulation in the case.” You would fain persuade our readers that I have “been too eager for the combat,” have “gone a-head as though I were hasting out of cannon shot of the enemy,” and although I have “spread the controversy over the whole face of the Atlantic,” and have “got a little of every thing” in my letter, yet I have only been beating the air, not knowing what I was about, and in all that I have said, you can not find a single proposition to controvert, not one on which you are at issue with me. Hence you very quaintly ask, “What are the propositions which we have agreed to discuss? What are the rules of this discussion? How long is it to continue? Who is to open and close it? What are the rules of evidence to be relied on? What the authorities to be admitted? etc., etc.” But my dear Sir, permit me to query in my turn. Why are these questions now propounded in the 6th letter of the discussion? Why not proposed to Mr. Montgomery when you agreed to continue the discussion, only accepting of me instead of him, as the defender of Universalism? If you forgot to put them then, why not put them to me in your letter of November 29th? Or if you forgot it then, why not propose them after you received mine of December 23d? in which I informed you I should reply to your last, early in February. But no, you never thought of these questions then, nor till after my reply had been published, nor am I permitted to see them till near three months from that time! Is it not fair, then, to infer, and will not your readers naturally infer, that not until you read my letter of February 10th, did you think of proposing any such questions?—that you then found, that in order to reply to the arguments therein contained, hic labor est, hoc opus est? And hence that you had recourse to the ruse de guerre which your April letter exhibits, in order to divert the attention of your readers from the real points at issue between us? But, Sir, “they are silly birds that are caught in such a snare.” And after the perusal of this specimen of your controversial talents, and the first question which you gravely propose for opening the discussion, viz. “Is there any punishment for sin,” I should expect you would be the last man in Christendom to accuse your opponent of having recourse to the “ad captandum style of controversy.”

What, Sir, no question at issue between us for discussion! And yet you say you are now “before the public in defence of the sanctions of the Gospel, of the basis of God’s moral government, and of all political government, against a system of religious and moral belief which makes satan a metaphor, hell a fable, and punishment after death a mere bugbear!” And pray, Sir, what are those sanctions in defence of which you stand before the public? (and, by the way, who is the advocate of the “system of religious and moral belief” of which you speak? for surely I know of no such system, and have seen nothing in this discussion thus far, that savors of it in the least.) Do you suppose our readers are all perfectly purblind, when you say, “neither of these gentlemen” (Spencer, Montgomery or myself) “were ever parties to a discussion with” yourself?—that “there was no controversy begun?” and that you “had no controversy with” Mr. M. “about terms or inferences?” Why, really Sir, did not Spencer lay down certain premises and introduce certain terms, and hence draw conclusions in favor of Universalism, and did you not controvert at least his conclusions? Did not Mr. M. controvert your arguments, and you his again in turn? And did not I formally reply again to yours? and yet there was no controversy begun!!! Why, really Sir, are we to infer from hence, that notwithstanding your pretended arguments against these Universalists, you in fact and mentally acceded to all they have said, and are yourself a true Universalist? Very well, then, come out honestly and own it, and let your readers “have no more of this lure” to lead them back into a system which you do not believe yourself.

As to your question, What are the propositions which we have agreed to discuss? I will shortly point out what propositions are already under discussion, my arguments on which remain unanswered. “Who is to open and close it?” It is already

* On arriving at New-York, I found a copy of Mr. C’s letter which had been mailed to Baltimore sometime (date not in the post mark) to the care of Rev. L. S. Everett, for me and re-mailed to New-York between the 20th and 30th of April. But as I had made no request to have any letter thus addressed for me later than March, and Mr. E. did not know whether to forward it at so late a season, I did not get it, while in Virginia.

* See “Remarks on the state of the Controversy,” and two short letters of Mr. M. relative to it, published in this paper of February 3, 1837, which Mr. C. has not yet seen fit to publish in the Harbinger.

opened—how, when and by whom, you, and I, and our readers all know: and it will be closed by whom and at such time as we shall hereafter agree. These are not necessary questions at this stage of the controversy, though I have no objections to having them settled fairly at any time. As to the rules of the discussion, the evidence and authorities to be admitted, etc., I consider that honorable controversialists never need be concerned about these, when they engage with honorable opponents. If either party should at any time depart from the common rules of courtesy and propriety, or attempt to bolster up his cause by inadmissible or disreputable authority, the other party would not fail to take advantage of it and turn it against the aggressor. The self respect of each party ought to be a sufficient guarantee on these points.

But to show you that I am disposed to accommodate you in any thing and every thing reasonable—to have distinct and well defined questions and propositions to discuss, and all reasonable rules, regulations and limits fixed, I will proceed

First, to the questions and propositions for discussion.

1. Are sheol, hades, and gehenna, (separately or together) ever used in the Scriptures to express a place or state of endless misery?

Although I honestly supposed you had relinquished the affirmative of this question, from the fact that you said, "to save time and labor, I will concede the whole," (which Spencer advanced concerning these words,) and though Mr. Montgomery appears to have understood you in the same way when he declares, "it gave me much satisfaction to perceive that you also was much pleased with it," (Spencer's letter,) "because you admit the truth of his quotation, simply excepting his inferences," yet, as you have now taken back that concession, which I am perfectly willing you should do, as you appear to have more time and labor to spare at present, you have now the affirmative of this question to sustain. I take the negative of course.

2. Do the words olem, aion, aionos, etc., when applied to the punishment of the wicked, mean duration without end? You have already taken the affirmative and I the negative of this question.

3. Is there "any word in human language that expresses duration without end, which is not applied to the future punishment of the wicked," or which can "certify us that God, angels or saints shall have duration without end?" I have already taken the affirmative and you the negative of this question.

4. "Shall eternal life (meaning thereby endless holiness and happiness,) be, according to the Scriptures, the ultimate destiny of all mankind? Here I have the affirmative and you the negative.—This question is already in discussion before our readers substantially, in your statement that this doctrine is "out of the Record and to you a new revelation," and my proof by a multitude of witnesses adduced in my letter of February 10th, that it is in the Record.

Thus we have each of us, two affirmatives and two negatives to sustain, and the laboring oars are equally divided between us, as they should be.—It is but fair and equal that each should have an affirmative as well as a negative to defend. And this you will not object to, unless your system is a system of negation and your faith consists in unbelief, especially after declaring that you are "before the public in defence of the sanctions of the Gospel," etc. This would be but fair and equal, even if a challenge had been given, though I have shown that none has been given on our side.

Secondly. As to the evidences admissible, I have no objections to the rules you mentioned, except that I would prefer that neither of us should be denied the advantages derivable from the subordinate lights of nature and reason, and the translations and comments of men of acknowledged eminence and standing in the republic of letters.

Thirdly and finally, for the rules of discussion. I will not object to any of the seven rules you propose except the first, which as you see above, is by the state of the controversy somewhat modified, and the second and fifth, of which I will offer modifications or substitutes, which I think all impartial judges will acknowledge to be fair and honorable. I object to the rule that "the respondent, (meaning yourself,) shall close the discussion," that is unqualifiedly, by occupying six pages of the Harbinger after seeing my last letter, to which I shall be absolutely inhibited from replying. For it would not only be contrary to all rules of forensic debate, but would give you great advantage, by affording you an opportunity of introducing new and labored arguments in a new field, to which you knew no reply could be made, and thus afford a plausible pretext for claiming the victory from your last broadside, when in fact the enemy had quit the field before it was fired. I propose therefore two alternatives, each equally fair for both parties—take your choice. 1. After the stipulated number of letters of equal length shall have been exchanged of the controversy proper, each party shall write one of the same length in reviewing, summing up, and making the most he can for himself of the discussion, and these two last letters shall be published simultaneously (the time being before agreed upon) in our respective periodicals, neither of us seeing the last letter of his opponent till he has published his own. Or 2. After the stipulated number of letters of the controversy proper shall have been exchanged, the first writer shall occupy, in review or reply, one-half the space of the last: the last shall then occupy one-half the space of that; the other again one-half of that, and so on till the length of the letters is reduced to half, or a quarter of a page of the Harbinger, so that no labored argument on either side should remain unnoticed.

In relation to your 5th rule, that the number of letters shall be limited to twelve on each side, I would prefer it should not be limited to so small a number: nevertheless, if you insist on it I will accede. I would prefer saying it shall not be less than twelve nor more than twenty, on each side: and either party shall have the privilege of closing the discussion at any intermediate number, by giving the other notice in one letter, that his next letter shall terminate the controversy proper, on his side.

Thus, Sir, I dispose of the subject matter of your April letter. The work is fairly before you. Gird yourself then to the task. Remember, Sir, you have "the sanctions" of your Gospel to defend, and "nine feet of argument" to refute, and that too, "spread over the whole face of the Atlantic."

I am, my dear Sir, in earnest in this discussion. I do believe it to be an important one, and that, although feeble myself, my cause is strong, for truth is on my side. I hope you are also in earnest in your declared resolution fully to canvass the subject. But, Sir, you have a hard task to perform. I really commiserate your condition—not because you are destitute of talents for the task; for I know of no man that has the requisite talents, if you have them not. In most of your former controversies, you have had greatly the advantage from the very ground you occupied: for you have contended on the one hand, with sour and intolerant bigots, whether Protestant or Catholic, and on the other, with cold and and heartless skeptics, whose aim was to prostrate the dearest hopes of humanity. Of course you had the light of nature and revelation, the voice of reason and humanity, the desires of all benevolent hearts and the prayers of all good men and angels on your side. But, now all these are against you. You have espoused the cause of endless malevolence, sin and misery, against that of endless and universal benevolence, holiness and happiness. Wonder not then, if in fighting this battle, your arms are inverted and turned against yourself. In consideration of this your unhappy condition, I am willing to make every allowance that charity itself can suggest, and really hope your courage will not flag till you have at least tried what can be done.

I shall send you a copy of this (in proof) seven or
